Filene set up an organization called the Credit Union National Extension Bureau, with headquarters in Boston, for the purpose of promoting credit unions. Roy F. Bergengren was the executive secretary. He is still the head of the national organization that succeeded the bureau.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND STATES PASS CREDIT-UNION LAWS

Under the guidance of the bureau most of the other States have passed favorable laws for credit unions, until now 41 States have them and the Federal Government as well. The bureau has also sponsored organization work, and today 44 States have these cooperative credit and savings banks, 4,000 in all.

Thirty-five States have State credit-union leagues. In 1935 the old bureau was converted into the Credit Union National Association, with headquarters at Raiffeisen House, Madison, Wis. The movement is now almost weaned away from Mr. Filene's bounty and is becoming a self-sustaining, democratic organization.

The growth has been nonsectional in character, Western, Eastern, Southern States coming in successively. At present four Eastern and three Western States have no State laws for credit unions. The membership is about 95 percent urban.

I have a table showing the development in the United States, by 5-year periods up to 1930 and by years since 1933:

Growth of credit-union movement in the United States

Year	Number of States with credit union legislation	Number of credit unions	Membership		Assets

GOOD FUTURE FOR CREDIT UNIONS

In 20 years the number of credit unions increased from 48 to 4,000; the membership from 7,600 to over 1,000,000; assets from $471,000 to $120,000,000, a truly phenomenal development. When it is considered that the adult population is only 70,000,000, this means that 1 adult in 70 belongs to a credit union. Considering only the income earners, the figures would be close to 1 in 35.

And the end is not in sight. Several new unions are being set up every day, and the old unions are growing. The growth curve is almost perpendicular, with no plateau anticipated for several years. With such a movement in our midst, we may well ask, "What is a credit union, and how does it work?"

CREDIT UNIONS—AMERICAN STYLE

Like every other institution that thrives, credit unions have been modified and adapted to fit situations in which they exist. Our American version is a combination of the Raiffeisen and Schultze-Delitsch types. Although they are referred to as cooperative banks, they deviate from Rochdale principles on several points. They could as properly be called mutual banks.

As most of the State laws as well as the Federal law were sponsored by the Credit Union National Extension Bureau, the credit unions are quite similar in the several States, the variations being minor. So a description of the set-up under the Minnesota law will be typical for the country.

MINNESOTA CREDIT UNION LAW 1925

The Minnesota Credit Union law was enacted in 1925. Supervision is vested in the State banking commissioner. Under the law a credit union may be set up by any well-defined group of people who are bound together by a common occupational, cultural, or geographical interest. The groups are usually small, such as a factory, store, church, cooperative, or employees of a municipality or State. In fact almost any group that can qualify as a defined and limited group can have one.

MINNEAPOLIS POSTAL EMPLOYEES CREDIT UNION

The membership is small, an average of 176 per union in Minnesota. The largest one in our State is the Minneapolis postal employees, with 1,400. There are only four or five larger in the United States. The largest, the New York City municipal employees, has 4,000 members. In general the idea is to keep the groups limited so that the members know each other personally. This makes administration easy, and personal responsibility a safeguard against losses. While only seven people are needed to organize, less than a hundred is not very practical unless an increase can be expected from within the group.

After the credit union is organized, incorporated, and chartered, the eligible people become members by paying a small fee and purchasing at least one share of stock, or "saving unit." The denominations are from five to ten dollars and may be paid for on the installment plan. The stockholders' liability is limited to the amount of stock or "savings units" he holds. The upper limit which a member may hold is determined by the board of directors. The shares are transferable and may be withdrawn upon notice. At any rate, all members have one vote and no more, regardless of how much stock they hold. Nor is proxy voting allowed. In this respect the credit unions are democratic, like regular Rochdale cooperatives.

CONVENIENT SERVICE

These shares or savings units are the principal source of capital for the small bank and are also the favored unit of saving for the members, although savings deposits are also accepted. The purchase of shares and making of deposits is very simple and handy, as the treasurer is present at the place of business or neighborhood in which the credit union operates. Also he is frequently available at hours when ordinary banks are closed. This handiness and ever-presence of the depository is conducive to the thrift habit. That is one of the two major purposes of the credit union. The other is credit.

Any member may apply for loans for productive or provident purposes. These purposes are rather liberally interpreted by the credit committee, depending somewhat on the financial position of the applicant. Discretion is exercised in such matters, but loans are made for almost everything from births to funerals.

SIZE OF LOANS AND RATES OF INTEREST

The loans are usually small, averaging $90.57 in Minnesota in 1935. Good character, a cosigner, or security is required by the credit union, depending on the size of the loan and the person. Losses are very small; in Minnesota, 1935, only eighteen one-hundredths of 1 percent.

The loans are usually at the rate of 1 percent a month on unpaid balances. For loans of the type made by credit unions this is very low. Installment buying usually runs around 20 to 25 percent, or more, and the legal rate on loans in our State is 42 percent. Nor is there a service charge made by the credit union. The loans are paid back by installments.

These loans make it possible for the members to meet emergencies that arise, pay cash for purchases and save the difference, or increase their earning capacity by personal or business improvements. This and thrift are the two major purposes of the credit union.

The capital which the members place in the credit union is in some cases insufficient to handle all the loans. In that case they can borrow up to 50 percent of their assets. On the other hand, if they have too much money, they can invest in securities of various kinds approved by the Government agency regulating their operation. Government bonds are favored. The credit union must also maintain a surplus guaranty or reserve fund of not less than 20 percent of its assets.

EARNINGS OF UNION GO TO MEMBERS

The earnings of the credit union go to the stockholders and depositors. The deposits earn 3 or 4 percent, usually, and the upper limit on shares in Minnesota is fixed by law at 6 percent. The rest is added to reserves. And if the earnings are too large the rate on loans is reduced. Simon-pure cooperators object that there is no regular patronage dividend feature in the credit unions. Instead, they try to operate at cost. Also, that they do not charge market price for services. The answer must be that the credit union is dealing with a service and not a commodity and some of the Rochdale principles are not so well adapted for this service.

The credit union is more like a mutual society in this respect. After all, what is the market price for credit? One and a half percent which the Government gets some credit for, or a hundred and two percent which the loan shark gets? However, it is theoretically possible to operate a credit union on strict Rochdale principles, on the basis of some arbitrary rate of interest.

DEMOCRATIC CONTROL OF CREDIT UNIONS

The operation of the credit union is democratically controlled by the members. At the annual meeting they elect three bodies: A board of directors of from five to nine members, who have general management, fix rates of interest, make investments, and so forth; a credit committee of three that passes on all loans; and a supervisory committee that audits the books, suspends officers, calls special membership meetings, and, in general, holds the organization in review.

The board organizes itself with president, vice president, secretary, and treasurer. The treasurer is the general manager and really does the work of the credit union. In some of the larger ones the treasurer is paid, in others, not.

To sum up the credit unions in relation to the Rochdale cooperatives, I have a table showing without further comment the points of agreement and differences:

	Credit union	Rochdale Co-op
Membership	Limited to group	Unlimited.
Vote (control)	By persons	By persons.
Return on capital	Limited (6 percent)	Limited (6 percent).
Price	Low (cost)	Market.
Profits	To shares and deposits (to borrowers as low rates).	To patrons.
Organization	Federations (leagues)	Federations (centrals).

STATUS OF CREDIT UNIONS IN MINNESOTA

The Minnesota State law was passed in 1925 through the efforts of Filene's organization, the Credit Union National Extension Bureau, and interested business and university men of the Twin Cities after a previous unsuccessful attempt in 1923. The first credit union in our State was organized the same year by the Minneapolis postal employees. The St. Paul Federation of Women Teachers was second in 1926.

At the end of that year there were six in the State. These had been organized by individuals with the aid of the bureau. Then in 1927 these few pioneers realized that they needed a central organization for promotion and for protection of various sorts, so the Minnesota Credit Union League was formed. It continues to this day as the coordinating body in this State, under the leadership of Clifford Skorstad, at 1954 University Avenue, St. Paul. It is supported chiefly by dues from locals, one-fourth of 1 percent of assets, with a minimum of $5 and a maximum of $300.

Principally because of the activity of this league, there are now 205 credit unions in Minnesota, all but 74 of which belong to the league.

I am presenting a table showing the growth and other salient figures as of December 31, 1935, for the entire period since 1926, when the movement really got started.

PRIVATE INDUSTRY ENCOURAGES CREDIT UNIONS

It is interesting to note that capitalistic companies have seen fit to encourage credit unions, chiefly as an employee benefit plan. Cooperative associations have been slow, but they are now taking it up in earnest as a part of the general movement. Much can be expected from this quarter in the future. The commodity co-ops expect the credit unions to loan to members so as to relieve the co-op of credit troubles.

As to the sponsoring groups for this development, we have data on hand as follows:

Employees of private firms	116
Employees of State or Federal Government	27
Cooperative associations	22
Teacher and school employees	9
Religious groups	9
Lodges and benevolent associations	8
Communities	8
Total	205

So far the development has been almost entirely urban, but work is now being done in the country, and it is planned that they will thrive among farmers here as they have in other countries.

MEMBERSHIP GAINS

As to membership, the number has grown from less than a thousand to about 35,000 in the 10-year period. It has multiplied three and eight-tenths times since 1929. The average per society is 176; the largest has 1,400. In general, the size is such that the officers know every member personally, and this makes for safety, low cost, and small loss in making loans.

Resources have grown from $125,825, 10 years ago, to about two and a half million at the present time, or four times what they were in 1929. The average per society slumped a bit during the worst year of the depression, but is now up and stands at about $13,000 per society. The assets of the whole movement have shown consistent gains every one of the 10 years.

VOLUME OF LOANS MADE BY CREDIT UNIONS

The total resources give an idea of how much has been saved by members of credit unions. That is the thrift function. The number of loans and their amounts reveal the extent to which the union serves the credit needs of its members. In 1935, 17,914 persons made 33,918 loans from credit unions. That means that just about half of the members used the credit facilities, once or more, and that those who did use the service used it an average of 1.89 times each. Some borrowed once, some twice, and a few even oftener.

The average loan in 1935 was $90.51; the average each borrower used during the year was almost double, $171.37. They all qualify as small loans, however.

The overhead is very low, and the losses almost insignificant. In 1934, $3,190 was charged off; and in 1935, of over $3,000,000 in loans, only $5,463, or 0.18 percent was charged off as loss.

After interest of 3 or 4 percent was paid on deposits, the dividends paid to stock varied from nothing in a very few cases to 9 percent. The usual rate was from 2.75 to 6 percent, with an average of 5.5 percent. Only seven paid more than the legal limit of 6 percent, but these will not continue to do this without being closed up. The average stock dividend per credit union was $253, or $1.43 per member. Not a significant sum, but the average resources per member (stock plus deposits) was only $70.80. The credit union is not supposed to be a money-making institution but a service to its members. The total amount of money saved and put into the credit unions, and the much larger sum loaned each year at a substantial saving to the borrower, fully justify the movement. It does precisely what it set out to do.

CREDIT UNION LEAGUES, ASSOCIATIONS, AND PUBLICATIONS

The credit unions follow the good cooperative practice of sticking together. In all, 37 States have credit union leagues. Their functions are similar to the one in Minnesota. Besides the regular function of promotion and education, four of the leagues, of which Minnesota's is one, have what are called league credit unions. These are patronized by officers of other credit unions (who cannot borrow from their own) and by member credit unions themselves. A central "bank", in other words. This phase of the work is expected to develop and become a real factor in regaining control of the people's money for the people.

NATIONAL CREDIT UNION ORGANIZATION

The State leagues are in turn federated into a national organization called the Credit Union National Association—C. U. N. A. for short. It is the successor to Filene's organization, dating from 1935. C. U. N. A. has headquarters at Raiffeisen House, Madison, Wis. It serves much the same function as the State leagues, but on a national scale. The association is supported by dues, 10 cents per member, collected through the State leagues.

Since 1934, when the Federal credit-union law was passed, the Federal Government, through the credit union division of the Farm Credit Administration, has been very active in organizational work. Nineteen organizers are now in the field. There is complete harmony between the Minnesota State league and the Federal set-up. The league will help organize under either State or Federal law, and Federal charter unions join the State league.

As to publications, the Minnesota league published a small periodical, Dawn, which has recently been discontinued. C. U. N. A. publishes Bridge, and the Farm Credit Administration publishes Cooperative Saving.

CONCLUSION—CREDIT UNIONS

That is what credit unions are, and that, in a general way, is how they work. It is a money service that is really in motion; and, from the way things are going, great things can be expected in the years to come. Above all, the credit unions are taking the hocus-pocus out of banking and showing the people that it is entirely possible to organize and run a financial business in their own interests. The credit unions are doing their part in taking the power away from our financial dictators.

MUTUAL AND COOPERATIVE INSURANCE IN MINNESOTA

Another field for financial service on a mutual or cooperative plan is insurance. A detailed manuscript on Mutual and Cooperative Insurance in Minnesota has been prepared by Chester Hull and Russel Lewis. In our country this method of insurance is many years older than the cooperative banks or credit unions. In some of the European countries, notably England, cooperative insurance is an old-established institution and renders a great and necessary service to the people at cost. Inasmuch as insurance is by its very nature a system of mutual aid, it is entirely proper and urgent that truly mutual and cooperative insurance be stressed in this country also. And, fortunately, just such a development is beginning to take on new form and life at the present time.

COOPERATIVE HEALTH INSURANCE

Insurance is, in its original meaning, a system for sharing losses sustained by any member of a group. In a less complicated society this could be and was accomplished in an informal manner. Among the early settlers in this country, for example, when a pioneer's house burned down the neighbors rebuilt the house. That was fire insurance, with an unwritten contract. Likewise, when sickness came to a family the neighbor ladies would take turns helping out. They knew that the service would be reciprocated, so in reality it was health insurance. It is still practiced in many parts today, a type of insurance that works best in a closely knit community.

As neighbors became more numerous, and the people more specialized in their work, a voluntary subscription list was circulated on behalf of an unfortunate neighbor. Contributions were made out of a spirit of neighborliness, but also with the knowledge of each contributor that the list would circulate for him also if the need arose. This informal insurance is still practiced. Our Red Cross acts on that principle.

THE FIRST MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

However, under this system of voluntary insurance there was no assurance that the unfortunate would receive aid. So a system was set up under which the members of a community or group pledged themselves to share each other's losses on a businesslike basis, by paying a pro-rata amount as the losses occurred. This is the assessment system, which, in a modified form, is the essential feature of mutual insurance companies today. The first fire-insurance company in this country was a mutual, organized in Philadelphia in 1730.

Out of the assessment system grew the practice of collecting the assessments before the actual loss occurred. The amount was based on the loss experience over a period of time. This is the premium system. An overcharge to cover all contingencies is purposely made at the time of collection.

In the truly mutual companies this overcharge is either returned or kept in reserve as social capital. The stock companies pocket the difference as profits. In this way the premium system has made possible the perversion of insurance from its original purpose of mutual aid to one of expropriation of people's property by the use of the people's own money.

In a stock company the premium payment covers the actual loss sustained by the company, the overhead expense, and the profits to owners of the stock. In a mutual the same is true, except that the profit item is left out. It may, however, be milked by the officers in the form of excessive salaries, expenses, and so forth.

SOME FACTS AND FIGURES ON INSURANCE

Many people think of insurance as a minor affair, a little nuisance that periodically demands attention. That is not the case, however. Minnesota's insurance bill for 1933 was almost a hundred million dollars, which is about $40 per capita. This includes life, fire, and the casualty lines of insurance. About 43 percent of this was paid back on losses, leaving 57 percent for overhead and profits.

Cooperators believe much of this expense is unnecessary. The Massachusetts Savings Bank life insurance system since 1907 has been writing life insurance for about 30 percent less than regular companies. The difference we, the people, pay.

LIFE INSURANCE

Life-insurance accounts for the largest part of our insurance bill in Minnesota. The total in force in 1933 amounted to $2,133,966,279. Premiums received were $62,660,843, on which the losses were only $23,138,797, or 36 percent. Only 10 percent of the life insurance was done by companies with home offices in Minnesota. Sixty-four percent was done by mutuals, the bulk of the rest being done by stock companies and fraternal organizations.

These life-insurance mutuals are not considered by some as good mutuals in the cooperative sense, because they are not democratically controlled, nor are they a great deal different from stock companies in business practice. A life-insurance company on more cooperative lines is now sponsored by the Northern States Cooperative League. It is called the "Cooperator's Life Association."

FIRE INSURANCE

Fire insurance in Minnesota is second only to life insurance in amount of premiums paid in, the total being about one-fourth, or $15,909,713. A little over half of this was returned on losses, which is about 15 percent more than in the life policies. Stock companies are first in the fire insurance, with 65 percent of the total, leaving about 35 percent for the mutuals. Companies with home offices in Minnesota did 38 percent of the fire-insurance business of the State. This compares with 10 percent for the life business.

Of the 38 percent done by Minnesota companies, 68 percent is carried by the township mutuals, 17 percent by state-wide mutuals, and only 15 percent by stock companies. It is apparent that within our own State the mutual fire-insurance companies dominate with 85 percent of the business, although they have only 35 percent when all companies operating in the State are considered.

These mutuals are believed to be more truly mutual than the life and casualty companies that are so in name. Of the 160 township mutuals and the 47 State mutuals, most of them live up to democratic control by the membership and insurance at cost principles. The actual cost during the last 60 years for the township mutuals has been only 17 cents per $100 of insurance per annum. The township mutuals during that period paid back 73 percent of the premiums collected, while stock companies paid back only 56 percent. State-wide mutuals did even less than the stock companies, with only 53 percent.

MINNESOTA AGAIN IN THE LEAD

This good record is mostly due to the restricted clientele and the nature of the risks on farm property. Village and small-town property is also covered, however. About 90 percent of the insurable farm property of the State is insured in this cooperative way, which makes Minnesota a leader in this respect.

Besides observing the cooperative principles of democratic control and return of excess charges, most of the mutuals are organized into the State Association of Farmers' Mutual Insurance Companies of Minnesota. It is for educational and protective purposes and is supported by dues. Through it the mutuals have connections with a national association of similar purposes. The township mutuals are serving a splendid purpose in the State, and we hope they will continue to do so.

CASUALTY INSURANCE

The field of casualty insurance is the least developed everywhere, and the same holds for Minnesota. Premiums paid in are about a million dollars less than for fire insurance. With few exceptions, the 23 mutuals operating in this field are mutual in name only, their operations and control being similar to regular stock companies. Together these nominal mutuals write about a fourth of the casualty insurance.

LAKE ELMO MUTUAL AUTOMOBILE INSURANCE CO.

However, one kind of casualty risk, namely, automobile insurance, has been handled in a small way by one local mutual, on a cooperative basis for some 15 years. This is the American Farmers' Mutual Automobile Insurance Co., of Lake Elmo. Recently it has come under the sponsorship of the Midland Cooperative Wholesale and taken on additional kinds of auto insurance. It is prospering and is due for a healthy growth in the years to come. Democratic control is maintained by a scheme of representative control through existing cooperatives. Because of selected risks it has a low loss ratio and effects a real saving to the patrons.

Outside of Minnesota the farm bureaus of Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana have gone into automobile insurance successfully in the interests of its constituents. They also operate in other States, including Minnesota.

CONCLUSION: COOPERATIVE INSURANCE

Today the insurance field is dominated by the profit motive, which cooperative leaders consider a perversion of the original purpose of insurance. This has brought many evils in its wake, the most important being the excessive cost.

In Minnesota and several other States, rural fire insurance is well taken care of. But other fields in both city and country have been scarcely touched by cooperative insurance as we define it. Other countries have gone considerably further in the solution of this problem and it might well be that we can take their lead and work insurance in with our other types of cooperatives, particularly oil and store societies, as they expand. The "cooperative insurance society" operated by the English and Scottish wholesale is a good example. It is owned and controlled by the affiliated local commodity cooperative associations through the central societies. They achieve the necessary centralized large-scale operation with maximum control by individual policyholders.

The English cooperators have developed other insurance practices, such as collective insurance for members, which can give us a lead in solving our insurance problems here in the United States.

COOPERATIVE BURIAL ASSOCIATIONS

A manuscript entitled "Cooperative Burial Associations in Minnesota", by A. J. Sprang and Russel Lewis, gives information on cooperative burial associations.

Like most other cooperative endeavors, the cooperative burial association idea originated in Europe. Only in recent years has the United States witnessed any development along this line. The first cooperative burial association in Minnesota was organized in 1928.

In order to get a perspective of the reasons for organizing a burial association, it is necessary to look for a moment at the burial industry. This is the only industry in which the limits of demand are fixed by natural causes. No amount of advertising or sales effort can increase the demand for funerals. The number of deaths per thousand of population has remained practically stationary during recent years, but during the period from 1900 to 1920 the number of undertakers in the United States increased from 16,200 to 24,464, or 51 percent. The ratio of annual deaths to the number of undertakers is a fair index of the amount of business distributed among the undertakers of the country. In 1920 the average was 56.6 deaths per undertaker. However, this business is not evenly distributed, as may be seen by the fact that not more than 15 percent of the undertakers in the Twin Cities handle 50 percent of the business. Consequently the smaller firms are obliged to set high prices to meet their costs, which results in high prices generally. It is generally felt that there is much exploitation in the burial industry.

HIGH COST OF FUNERALS

This high cost of funerals has been the chief cause for the formation of a number of cooperative burial associations in the North Central States in recent years. Those in Minnesota are chiefly in rural sections. Cooperative burial associations in Minnesota, like those of other States, are a defense against the exorbitant rates charged by private undertakers.

The usual cooperative burial society in Minnesota is a nonstock, nonprofit organization, with an average of 524 members doing business on the cost-plus basis. It allows all members an equal voice in the management and is reported as saving the members from one-third to one-half the current cost of funerals.

The first cooperative burial association in Minnesota was organized in 1928. However, the movement made slow progress up to 1932, when it began to show a marked increase. As of August 1, 1935, there were 15 incorporated associations in the State, 11 of which were actively engaged in business, and 4 were being organized. In Bemidji there is a cooperative cemetery association operating. The Clearwater County Casket Association, of Clearbrook, Minn., sells caskets only and does not conduct funerals. A forward step in the advancement of this movement is the forming of "regional" associations. One of these has as members 14 varied cooperative commodity associations consisting of 5,000 members.

STATE-WIDE SURVEY OF BURIAL ASSOCIATIONS

A State-wide survey of the cooperative burial associations in Minnesota was made, and questionnaires sent to every cooperative burial association listed as a going concern. Ten replies were received, but only seven gave detailed information.

Association no.	Number of members	Membership	Funerals		Average cost, funerals	Saving (estimated)	Total sales
			1932	1933

1	600	$5	67	30	$150	50	$14,550.00
2	304	5	42	32	175	30	11,188.93

6	511	10	41	85	150	40	18,900.00
7	100	6	4	10	100	40	1,184.58

Most of the societies furnish the members complete funeral services from embalming to actual interment.

The average cost of the 605 funerals during these 2 years was $164.49. They ranged in price from $50 to $295. It is the policy of cooperative burial associations to reduce as much as possible the cost of a funeral for members. The complete funeral and service is priced practically at cost, which results in savings of 30 to 50 percent on the price usually charged by undertakers. In a few associations the market price for funerals is charged and a patronage rebate is made to the family at the end of the year. A small fund is generally carried in reserve for indigent cases. Also a reserve for bad accounts is usually maintained, and a few societies have an educational fund.

The burial associations in Minnesota are nonstock organizations operating with funds obtained through the sale of membership certificates, usually $5. The Minnesota burial associations adhere to the cooperative principle of "one man, one vote." Proxy voting is allowed by only one Minnesota association. The societies are supervised by a board of directors, usually seven, and these elect the officers from among their own number.

REGIONAL BURIAL ASSOCIATIONS

Probably the best plan yet developed is the so-called regional one. The objective is to set up a burial association among the memberships of several existing cooperative associations, perhaps both producer and consumer cooperatives. This insures a large membership of people who know something about cooperative principles and practices. Membership is restricted to membership of a cooperative enterprise which is operating in the region.

The duties of a "regional" would be to act for all the individual society members, to take care of legal matters, to help in the purchasing of supplies, to assist the unit societies to increase their membership, and, in general, to act in an advisory capacity.

A good example of a "regional association" is the newly organized Range Cooperative Federation of Virginia, Minn. This association has as members 14 varied cooperative commodity associations consisting of about 5,000 individual members. The membership is restricted to cooperative store members, and its object is to better the service for store members and to furnish burial at as low a cost as possible. Due to the large membership a very nominal fee is charged and operation costs are reduced to a minimum.

MUTUAL AND COOPERATIVE TELEPHONE COMPANIES

Telephone service was one of the first businesses operated on a mutual or cooperative basis in Minnesota. It is not known exactly when the first mutual telephone line was established, but sometime during the early nineties is an approximate date. They developed almost exclusively in rural districts and small villages, places which private companies considered unprofitable or were slow in developing. A similar situation now exists in the electric power field. At present there are 1,558 rural and village telephone companies operating in Minnesota on a more or less mutual and cooperative basis. It is estimated that of the 80 percent of Minnesota farmers provided with telephone service, perhaps 90 percent are served by these nonprofit companies. The present write-up is based on questionnaires returned by 1,197 of these.

The mutual and cooperative telephone organizations experienced a healthy and rapid growth from 1894 up to 1914, at which period a decline began in the number of new societies set up per year. That is, the rate of growth decreased, but, of course, the total number of societies became larger each succeeding year. I have a table showing the growth. The years are in 5-year periods, and the figures opposite indicate the number of new telephone organizations established during the period.

1929–34	13

A manuscript entitled "Mutual and Cooperative Telephone Associations in Minnesota", by Clyde Buell and Russel Lewis, contains more detailed information.

The decline in rate is due principally to the fact that the saturation point has been reached in this field. Four-fifths of the rural population now have phones, and most of those that do not have installations could probably have them by connecting with an existing company.

HOW COOPERATIVE TELEPHONE COMPANIES STARTED

The movement started in the southeastern part of the State and then spread westward and north. At present the greatest concentration is in the central part of the State. All but eight counties now have at least one association. Filmore County has 136, but several counties have only 1 apiece. The average for the 87 Minnesota counties is approximately 18 per county. Their average age is 22 years.

The mutuals vary in size from a copartnership line with only 3 subscribers to an incorporated one with 4,000 subscribers. The average number of members per company is 36, making a total membership of about 56,000 for all mutual and cooperative lines in the State. The societies also do business with nonmembers, an average of 14 percent per society.

In general there were four groups interested in developing these rural telephone lines. First, stock telephone companies interested in rural lines as feeders for its other lines and for the profit in it; second, businessmen in towns favored farm lines to bind the farmers into their particular trade area; third, equipment sellers were interested for the business in it; and, lastly, the farmer and villagers themselves felt the necessity for telephone service. They are in reverse order as to time of activity.

FARMERS AGAIN LEAD IN COOPERATION

At first the farmers started up in isolated communities, without relation to other lines, frequently building and servicing their own system. Later on, if the company grew, it established switching connections with other lines, both mutual and private. In many cases they merged with other mutual lines, and in some cases even sold out to private concerns. Even today members of many mutuals take care of their own lines and have no monetary income whatever.

The service rendered is of about the same standard as on lines operated by private companies and very much cheaper. The questionnaire shows that 918 mutuals charged three to nine dollars per year, including switching charge but not repair and upkeep; 105 charged nine to twelve dollars, including switching and part expenses; and 67 charged twelve to eighteen dollars, all costs. These will be reorganized, at very low cost for year-around phone service.

ORGANIZATION OF COOPERATIVE TELEPHONE COMPANIES

In organization these mutuals and cooperative telephone companies vary considerably. Most of them started as pure mutuals, without capital stock, and on an assessment basis.

Often they were not incorporated and many still are not. Each member had one vote, and this good cooperative feature is still in force in about 80 percent of all the existing mutuals, both pure and stock. The pure mutual is a self-help, nonstock cooperative, operated for service to its members.

The other companies were started as stock mutuals. That is, they issued stock to raise funds, usually one share to each member, but in some mutuals this rule is not followed. Only five mutuals pay interest on stock and none pay stock dividends, so this issuance of stock is really just a certificate of membership. Furthermore, the stock is nontransferable, a device to prevent unscrupulous parties from gaining control. The average number of shares issued by each company is 66, less than 2 shares per member.

There are variations of all sorts within the many companies, but they all have the cooperative feature of service for cost, carried on democratically by the membership. This is done through a board of directors who serve for a small fee, or voluntarily, plus actual expenses. The board hires a manager to do the actual work not done by members. One thousand one hundred and ninety-seven questionnaires reported that $2,111,590 of telephone property is owned and taken care of in this manner by mutuals, and that their annual business amounts to $518,988. Quite a number of them are now organized under the Minnesota cooperative law of 1923 and are true Rochdale cooperatives.

NO FEDERATION OF COOPERATIVE TELEPHONE COMPANIES

The mutual and cooperative telephone companies have not as yet federated themselves together in a strong, effective, cooperative union. Many people fear that these cooperatives, in their isolation, are fit prey for private interests desiring to take them over or drive them out. It is the experience of cooperatives that this is so, and in certain States and even in Minnesota this is happening. A central organization was started in 1908, the Minnesota Telephone Association, but it is now comprised of only 182 companies, only 22 of which are real mutuals. Although some few others have mutual features, three-fourths of the member companies are privately owned. A satisfactory union could possibly be effected with the Federated Electric Cooperative, 739 Johnson Street NE., Minneapolis, A. H. Howalt, manager, a newly formed federation, uniting rural electrification projects, chiefly in Minnesota and Wisconsin. Cooperative telephone associations and cooperative electric associations could work hand in hand, as the nature of their operations is similar, and their purpose is the same—service at cost.

COOPERATIVE ELECTRIC ASSOCIATIONS

Until the last few years, distribution of electricity has not been a live field for cooperative activity, either in Minnesota or other States. Social control of power has been thought of more from the municipal ownership angle. However, such cooperative enterprises are not unknown, and there are now four rural cooperatives distributing electricity in the State. Three others were organized but are not now in operation. One more, at Two Harbors, is cooperative in name only, being a part of the municipal system there.

One of the going concerns, at Granite Falls, was set up as long ago as 1913. Another one was set up in 1927, another in 1928, and the last in 1930. They are set up with various arrangements as to control and operation, in general, following cooperative and mutual practice. The business policy is usually to buy the power at wholesale from a municipal or private company and distribute it at cost.

Needless to say, the utility interests do not look with favor on any business which encroaches on their preserves and have done little to sponsor rural electrification, even though they themselves have not found it profitable to exploit the field. But with the enlightened policy regarding electric power inaugurated by the present administration we hope the farmers are about to get a break in this respect.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION THROUGH COOPERATIVES

In addition to the T. V. A. and such projects, the Government has set aside $100,000,000 for rural electrification to be administered through the R. E. A. (Rural Electrification Administration). Through this act the Government offers to finance rural electrification lines for a period of 20 years at 3 percent. Private companies are eligible as well as cooperatives and municipal plants.

Many communities have proceeded to organize and take advantage of this opportunity. In general, the organizational activity is similar to any other cooperative. The shares are sold for $5, according to the best policy, and the usual Rochdale principles adhered to. It is planned that about $5 a month per subscriber will be sufficient to amortize the loan, run the line, and pay for 100 kilowatt-hours of electricity.

About 40 new electric cooperative associations are now being worked on in Minnesota, 25 of which are organized and selling stock, and 2 have been approved for loans by R. E. A.

MINNESOTA STATE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE HELPS

The State department of agriculture, dairy, and food is assisting the farmer in this work, as is also the Midland Cooperative Wholesale. The latter organization has also been instrumental in organizing the central federation for technical services, materials, promotion, and protection—the Federated Electric Cooperative, 739 Johnson Street NE., Minneapolis, incorporated February 1, 1935, under the cooperative law. It is hoped all rural electric cooperatives will be coordinated through this agency, which they own collectively.

The electric cooperatives are in embryo as yet. In the near future there will be great developments in this field.

COOPERATIVE TRUCKING ASSOCIATIONS

One of the latest developments in cooperative endeavor is the trucking associations. A manuscript entitled "Cooperative Trucking Associations in Minnesota", written by Clyde Buell and Russel Lewis, gives detailed information on this subject. Changing conditions of the past 20 years, and especially of the last 5 years, have been responsible for these new enterprises. Paved roads and modern high-speed trucks give quicker service than railroads, and in most cases the cost of shipping by truck is less than the combination of truck-rail-truck necessary to transport merchandise from shipper's place of business to consignee's door.

A cooperative trucking association is usually an organization among cooperative associations to engage in a trucking enterprise on a cooperative plan. The general nature of such a business is to develop and promote transportation facilities by truck for the members and patrons.

TYPES OF TRUCKING ASSOCIATIONS

There are different types of trucking associations in Minnesota, practicing different degrees of cooperation. They range from one which is organized among private businessmen to do their hauling, to truly cooperative trucking associations, which have cooperative associations only as members. In between are those which have both cooperatives and private businessmen as members; others which do cooperative hauling as a side line; and still others which are operated as trucking departments of cooperative federations.

One good arrangement is a trucking association composed of producer cooperatives, such as creameries, cheese factories, livestock-shipping associations, and farmers' elevators, to haul their products to market with return loads for cooperative stores, oil associations, and sidelines for farmers' elevators and creameries. Trucking associations can compete more effectively with private truckers if they have a full load both ways.

Those interested in this movement hope to organize intercooperative trucking associations similar to those now in operation at Benson and Detroit Lakes, Minn., to haul the products of the producers to market and bring back the merchandise needed by cooperative stores, oil associations, and other consumers' cooperatives.

Seven trucking associations were in active operation in Minnesota in June 1935, and 12 were operating as of February 14, 1936. Others are in process of organization. Oil associations and cooperative wholesales are especially active in helping to form new trucking associations. Minnesota has taken the lead in trucking associations and very little seems to have been done outside the State, although undoubtedly the movement will spread.

PRESENT TRUCKING ASSOCIATIONS IN MINNESOTA

Cooperative trucking associations actively operating in Minnesota as of February 14, 1936, have their headquarters at Benson, Cambridge, Fergus Falls, Detroit Lakes, Grand Marais, Ada, White Bear, Thief River Falls, Montevideo, Askov, and Vernon Center. The federations are not listed, as their trucking is done as a department of the federation.

West Central Cooperative, Inc., Benson, Minn., has 21 members, all of them creameries. The Federated Cooperative Trucking Association, Cambridge, Minn., includes a livestock-shipping association, a creamery, and an oil association. The Farmers' Cooperative Trucking Association, Detroit Lakes, Minn., includes in its membership 14 cooperatives, 9 of which are creameries, 1 a potato-growers' association, and the others oil associations. The North State Transport Co., Fergus Falls, Minn., has 20 members, mostly creameries. The North Shore Businessmen's Trucking Association is only partly cooperative, being composed of cooperative fisheries on the North Shore and businessmen who provide the back haul. A so-called trucking association at Morris, Minn., is not cooperative, as its members are private businessmen.

LIVESTOCK SHIPPING ASSOCIATIONS

Trucking is done as a side line by many livestock-shipping associations which haul to the South St. Paul market, and bring back supplies for their own members and for other cooperatives. The Central Cooperative Association of South St. Paul has been particularly active in organizing or reorganizing livestock shipping associations so that livestock haulers can take feed and other supplies back to cooperatives. Seventy-one such associations had been so chartered as of February 1936. The Farmers' Union Livestock Commission Co. of South St. Paul has also shown some activity in this line. But such associations cannot be called trucking associations, as they are organized primarily for shipping livestock, the return haul being a side line.

Cooperative store federations have organized a number of trucking association departments for the use of members. These departments are financed by the federations, and if a profit is made, the member societies are rebated on the basis of patronage. Examples are the Range Cooperative Federation, Virginia; and the Maple Farmers' Cooperative Association, Maple, Wis. The store federations are connected with the Central Cooperative Wholesale, Superior, Wis.

Such wholesale or regional organizations as the Land O'Lakes Creameries, Inc., Central Cooperative Wholesale, Midland Cooperative Wholesale, and the Central Cooperative Association of South St. Paul, have been active in helping to set up and develop trucking associations and are members of the trucking associations.

LEGISLATION AFFECTING TRUCKING ASSOCIATIONS

In 1935 trucking associations were placed under the control of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission and subject to the provisions of the common-carrier acts, which provide standard rates. When standard rates are charged by cooperatives, the earnings can be prorated back to members on the basis of patronage.

So far as can be ascertained, no attempt has been made to set up an overhead organization among the trucking associations for promotion and protection.

However, the way is open for all consumers' and producers' cooperatives to organize intercooperative trucking associations to handle their transportation problems. Both consumers' and producers' cooperatives are necessary to provide two-way hauls. The cooperative trucking associations at Benson and Detroit Lakes are by some considered as models for any groups which plan to organize cooperative trucking associations.

MILK

Although Minnesota has an extensive system of cooperative creameries for marketing dairy produce, not a great deal has been accomplished from the consumer angle. The dairy products regularly sold through cooperative stores are, of course, retailed by the consumer cooperative method; and a few dairy producers' cooperatives push the retail business from their angle. But the general business of retail milk distribution over the whole State has been left in private middlemen's hands for profit. As a result the milk distribution in our State is chaotic. The consumer pays a large price and the farmer gets a low one. This situation is neither desirable nor necessary.

THE FRANKLIN COOPERATIVE CREAMERY

The Franklin Cooperative Creamery in Minneapolis is the only large attempt to solve the problem from the consumers' angle. It was organized in 1919 as the result of a milk drivers' strike. It operates today as a labor copartnership in the interests of the employees. The board is composed entirely of employees, which puts the employees in position as both employer and employee.

The Franklin was an influence in bringing other companies to task on several matters, including quality and standards. At present it is the largest distributor in Minneapolis, with 30,000 patrons, only 4,000 of whom are members, however. It also sells about a fourth of its products to private dealers. The dollar value of sales in 1934 was $2,259,934.33—more than any consumers' cooperative in our country. It operates two large plants, handling fluid products, butter, and ice cream.

The Franklin paid patronage dividends of 5 percent in 1922. Interest on shares is frequently declared. Since 1922 net earnings have been kept down by relatively high wages and competition. Shares have a par value of $100.

COAL AND FUEL OIL

Many of the farmers' elevators and about 10 percent of the co-op stores carry coal as a side line. One store society handled $37,000 worth in 1935.

However, there is only one separate cooperative coal association, and it also is about to be merged with the Minneapolis Cooperative Oil Association as a department. At present this Minneapolis association is controlled by the Midland Co-op Wholesale, which organized it with the intention of turning it over to consumers. The first year it made no earnings, but in 1936 its earnings will run around 75 cents to $1 a ton. It has a good volume, and prospects are excellent.

One fuel-oil cooperative also operates in the State—the Allied Cooperatives of the Twin Cities. It was sponsored by existing Twin City cooperatives, especially the Park Co-op Oil Association and the Minneapolis Co-op Oil Association. It is a rapidly growing concern and has paid substantial dividends the 3 years of its existence.

Plans are nearing completion for the coal association, the Allied, and the Minneapolis Oil Association to merge into one association.

BOOK STORES

There are two cooperative book stores on the University of Minnesota campus, the engineers' book store and the law book store. One for medical students has some cooperative features, but is a branch of a downtown store. The so-called "co-op book store" on the edge of the campus is in no sense cooperative.

The law store was organized in 1934, but the engineers' store has been going successfully for 14 years. Most of the engineering students are members, 1,600 in 1935. Shares are $5, which are returned upon leaving school. Patronage dividends, 15 percent in 1934, are paid to members. A real saving to students. Anyone wishing to carry this work further would do well to study the Harvard Cooperative Society, at which university the students have one large society that provides everything for students "from coonskins to sheepskins."

BOARDING HOUSES

Among the Finnish people of northern Minnesota are found cooperative boarding houses. In 1930 there were 25 in all. They cater to single people and generally operate on a cost-price policy. Cloquet, Virginia, and Duluth have good examples. Most of the Range towns have them.

CARLETON COLLEGE COOPERATIVE BOARDING CLUBS

Thirty-five to forty years ago at Carleton College cooperative student boarding clubs flourished and enabled many a financially embarrassed student to make his way through college. I had the pleasure of sharing in the management of these clubs and took my turn as club buyer. Of course, our clubs could buy very advantageously—we always bought in considerable quantities. Sales people were glad to see us and we furnished excellent food to a large number of students at unbelievably low prices.

CAFES

The only known independently organized cooperative restaurant in the State is in the State Capitol Building, set up by a group of employees in 1935.

The employees of Land O'Lakes plant, in Minneapolis, operate a cafeteria for themselves. The Franklin Co-op Creamery also has a cafeteria for employees.

LAUNDRIES AND DRY CLEANING

So far as known there are no active cooperative laundries in the State at present, although several have been started. However, a dry-cleaning establishment, the Crystal Cooperative Cleaners of Minneapolis, has been in operation since 1931. It grew out of a strike in 1931, and the 50 or so shareholders are mostly members of the Dry Cleaners' Union.

GARAGE

Apart from the incidental garage work by the oil associations, only one cooperative garage operates in the State. That is at Hibbing. A move is on foot to make it a department of the Range Cooperative Federation, a group of stores. It appears that the garage business would be an excellent department for oil associations.

HALLS

Some of the cooperative societies in the Finnish districts have separate halls for meetings, both business and social. Others are looking forward to having one. The central organizations, and even some of the larger locals, have large rooms or halls in their regular buildings for cooperative business and recreation.

PARKS

In addition to halls, some districts have cooperative parks. One at Brule, Wis., is owned by a group of cooperatives and used for educational and recreational purposes. There are also several in upper Michigan, and in Minnesota there is one near Ely, up in the Finnish territory.

PAPERS

Besides the official organs of the several wholesales, there are several newspapers in the State more or less cooperative. There is one each at Foley, Bagley, Thief River Falls, and St. Paul. It would seem that the best approach would be through a central body, assuring democratic control and disinterested management.

MEDICAL

Little has been done in the State in the medical field, and most of what has been done pertains to hospitals. The Northern Pacific hospital service is probably best. It is controlled by employees of that railroad. The Omaha Railway has a similar plan. There are several other joint hospitalization schemes, but none of them are strictly cooperative in principle. Here is a large field that ought to be developed in the interest of public-health service.

AUDITING

Cooperative auditing calls for specialized auditors, due to the entirely different business motive than in ordinary business. The C. C. W. of Superior, Wis., maintains one service; the Northern States Cooperative League, another; and the Midland Cooperative Wholesale Houses, a third, which is, however, a separate association, known as the Cooperative Auditing Association. The Minnesota Department of Agriculture, Dairy, and Food has a cooperative auditing department. In the interests of economy and uniformity of accounting methods there should be more coordination between these various agencies.

OTHER COOPERATIVES

No useful service or commodity has gone unnoticed by the cooperative movement somewhere in the world. Doubtless many others could be found in our own State, but enough have been mentioned to indicate the breadth of the field. Cooperative housing, of which we have none in this State, is a particularly fine field in some other countries and in some cities in the United States. There may be considerable development in this field in the near future.

CONCLUSION

Many people are surprised to learn the ramifications and the extent of Minnesota's cooperative movement. That in itself is a commendation, for it demonstrates that a new economic system can be inaugurated without violently disrupting our social structure. The process is gradual, producing a minimum of maladjustment, less indeed than the usual strain of capitalistic competition. Yet the final result will be a changed economic order, wherein production will be for use and service and not for profit. The result will be full capacity production, not partial production and artificial scarcity.

The cooperative method has the added advantage that it is effective immediately, in direct proportion to the extent it is put into operation. It does not require full support of all the people to be effective. It does not await political power. It grows more rapidly in States and countries where labor parties function and give aid. It depends entirely on voluntary action. Democratic control of business and industry is permanently rested in the people's hands. For this reason it should commend itself to the American people, who cherish voluntary action and democratic ideals.

Consumers' cooperation demonstrates to the individual and the world the feasibility and the desirability of working together for common purposes. The practical, material benefits, now and here, are convincing to practical people.

The present need of the cooperative movement is understanding, action, and perseverance.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am prompted to make just a few remarks because I became interested in some of the remarks made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. He is talking about suspending the patent monopoly on improvements of labor-saving machines. Labor-saving machinery adds to the wealth and to the production of wealth in this country. To my mind, suspension of invention is no solution whatever of our problem. What we need in this country is fair distribution of the product of the machines. We want all the labor-saving devices we can invent and that we can use, and we want to add to the wealth of this country, so that every person may have a greater share in the production of this country. I feel that the solution we must finally seek is fair distribution.

Now, coming to this employment situation in the country, there are millions of men out of work. The machines of the country are able to produce all that we can consume, because we do not have buying power among our people. If you can put machinery in the hands of idle people so that they can produce and supply their own needs, you have made an advance on that problem. We have had considerable discussion in California with respect to the cooperatives for the unemployed. If we can set up cooperatives so that these idle people can provide their own work, produce their own food and clothing and their own shelter, we can put those people to work and add to the wealth of the Nation. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN] mentioned cooperatives. That is a great movement. It is sure to become a factor in our national economy. But the idle people of this country today do not have the capital to provide themselves with the tools or machines that are needed. I feel we should have some governmental agency, because there is no other agency to provide this set-up so that these people can either take a piece of land or machinery and produce what they need.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLDEN. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Does not the gentleman believe that the benefit of these labor-saving devices can be distributed to labor by cutting down the hours of labor without decreasing wages, such as is provided in the 30-hour-week bill?

Mr. COLDEN. I think that is one of the solutions; yes.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLDEN. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. As I understand the gentleman, he is in favor of the Government financing these cooperatives or making finances available to them?

Mr. COLDEN. I do not see any other way out.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I will say that the administration has given great encouragement along that line and deserves credit for it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. COLDEN] has expired.

SEVENTIETH NATIONAL ENCAMPMENT OF GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC IN WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 465, to amend the joint resolution of July 18, 1935, relating to the Seventieth National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, to be held in the District of Columbia in September 1936.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I shall not, but, of course, it was understood we were not going to take up any more business this afternoon. However, the gentlewoman from New Jersey explains that this is an emergency and there is no opposition whatever, so I cannot see any objection to bringing it up at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 1 of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution giving authority to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make special regulations for the occasion of the Seventieth National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, to be held in the District of Columbia in the month of September 1936, and for other purposes, incident to said encampment", approved July 18, 1935, is amended to read as follows:

"That the Commissioners of the District are hereby authorized and directed to make such special regulations for the occasion of the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, which will take place in the District of Columbia in the month of September 1936, as they shall deem advisable for the preservation of public order and the protection of life and property, to be in force 1 week prior to said encampment, during said encampment, and 1 week subsequent thereto. Such special regulations shall be published in one or more of the daily newspapers of the District of Columbia, and no penalty prescribed for the violation of such regulations shall be enforced until 5 days after such publication. Any person violating any of the aforesaid regulations or the schedule of fares hereinafter provided for shall, upon conviction thereof in the police court of the said District, be liable for such offense to a fine not to exceed $100, and in default of payment of such fine to imprisonment in the workhouse (or jail) of said District for not longer than 60 days. This resolution shall take effect immediately upon its approval, and the sum of $20,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, payable from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and from the revenues of the District of Columbia, in equal parts, is hereby authorized to be appropriated to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to carry out the provisions of this joint resolution, $1,000 of which shall be available for the construction, maintenance, and operation of public comfort stations and information booths, and $5,000 of which shall be available for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property, under the direction of said Commissioners. The balance of the aforesaid $20,000 appropriation, or as much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be used for all expenses incidental to the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, such as has heretofore been provided in other cities where the encampments have been held, and for all other purposes in connection with said encampment."

SEC. 2. That portion of section 5 of such joint resolution of July 18, 1935, which precedes the first proviso, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the Superintendent of National Capital Parks, subject to the approval of the Director of National Park Service, is hereby authorized to grant permits to the citizens' executive committee for the entertainment of the Grand Army of the Republic for the use of any reservation or other public spaces in the city of Washington on the occasion of the seventieth national encampment, in the month of September 1936, which, in his opinion, will inflict no serious or permanent injuries upon such reservations or public spaces, or statuary therein; and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may designate for such and other purposes on the occasion aforesaid such streets, avenues, and sidewalks in the said city of Washington as they may deem proper and necessary for the erection of reviewing stands, platforms, or other structures, and that no person or corporation shall be authorized to erect or use such stands, platforms, or other structures without permission of said committee."

Page 1, strike out all of lines 3 to 8, inclusive; on page 2, strike out all of lines 1 to 25, inclusive; and on page 3, strike out lines 1 to 14, inclusive, and insert:

"That section 1 of the joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution giving authority to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make special regulations for the occasion of the Seventieth National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic to be held in the District of Columbia in the month of September 1936, and for other purposes, incident to the said encampment', approved July 18, 1935, is hereby amended to read as follows:

" 'That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to make such special regulations for the occasion of the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, which shall take place in the District of Columbia during the month of September 1936, as they shall deem advisable for the preservation of public order and the protection of life and property, to be in force 1 week prior to said encampment, during said encampment, and 1 week subsequent thereto, such special regulations shall be published in one or more of the daily newspapers of the District of Columbia, and no penalty prescribed for the violation of such regulations shall be enforced until 5 days after such publication. Any person violating any of the aforesaid regulations or the aforesaid schedule of fares shall, upon conviction thereof in the police court of the said District, be liable for such offense to a fine not to exceed $100, and, in default of payment of such fine, to imprisonment in the workhouse (or jail) of said District for not longer than 60 days. This resolution shall take effect immediately upon its approval, and the sum of $15,000 or as much thereof as may be necessary, payable from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and from the revenues of the District of Columbia in equal parts, is hereby appropriated. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized in conjunction with the Citizens' Executive Committee of the Grand Army of the Republic, who shall be appointed by the said Commissioners, to expend the said sum of $15,000 to carry out the provisions of section 1 of this joint resolution, and for such expenses incident to the encampment as the said Commissioners, in their discretion and judgment, may deem advisable.'"

The committee amendment was agreed to.

VETO MESSAGES RECEIVED FROM THE PRESIDENT DURING RECESS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Senate, which was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, May 7, 1936.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
President of the Senate.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: On Friday, April 24, 1936, the Committee on Enrolled Bills of the Senate presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bills (S. 713) granting jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to hear the case of David A. Wright, and (S. 929) for the relief of the Southern Products Co., which had passed both Houses of Congress and been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate.

The Senate, at 3:25 p. m. Monday, May 4, 1936, took a recess until 12 noon on Thursday, May 7, 1936.

During the interim the President of the United States sent by messenger two messages addressed to the Senate, each dated May 5, 1936, giving his reasons for not approving, respectively, Senate bill 713 and Senate bill 929. The Senate not being in session on the last day which the President had for the return of these bills under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, in order to protect the interests of the Senate so that it might have the opportunity to reconsider the bills, I accepted the messages, and I now present to you the President's veto messages, with the accompanying papers, for disposition by the Senate.

Sincerely yours,

EDWIN A. HALSEY,
Secretary of the Senate.

DAVID A. WRIGHT—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 202)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Senate:

I return herewith, without my approval, Senate bill no. 713, entitled "An act granting jurisdiction to the Court of Claims to hear the case of David A. Wright."

This act provides that the Court of Claims be given jurisdiction to reinstate, reopen, and rehear the case of David A. Wright, of Winona, Mo., against the United States, numbered 261–A in said court, and to readjudicate the same and determine the amount of costs or expenditures, if any, which the said David A. Wright may have expended or incurred in 1918 in the rehabilitation of a manufacturing plant at 1150 Washtenaw Avenue, Chicago, Ill., and in the beginning of production of heavy-duty lathes, to meet the needs, or the then anticipated needs, of the Ordnance Department for any gun-relining or gun-manufacturing project initiated and under way in the Ordnance Department of the United States Army, in reliance in good faith upon any promise or assurance given him by Maj. Charles D. Westcott, Ordnance Department, United States Army, or Howard Abbott, an engineer in the plant section of the production division of the Ordnance Department, that the said David A. Wright would receive a contract, or contracts, for the manufacture of heavy-duty lathes that would absorb such costs or expenditures, notwithstanding such Ordnance Department projects may have been contingent upon the continuance of the war and may have been abandoned because of the signing of the armistice of November 11, 1918.

During the World War David A. Wright undertook negotiations with two representatives of the War Department for the purpose of entering into contracts for the manufacture of lathes for the United States. He claims that at their request he secured an additional building and enlarged his plant for the purpose of performing the prospective contracts. He later received one contract from the Ordnance Bureau for the manufacture of three lathes at $20,000 each, but the armistice precluded the making of any further contracts with him.

Mr. Wright later brought suit against the United States in the Court of Claims under the so-called Dent Act, which authorized suits to be maintained against the Government on contracts informally executed. In his suit Mr. Wright claimed a sum in excess of $92,000 for moneys expended in enlarging his plant and in preparing for the performance of contracts which he never received. The Court of Claims rendered judgment in favor of the United States, on the ground that the representatives of the War Department with whom he might have dealt, had no authority to contract in behalf of, or to bind, the Government (Wright v. United States, 60 C. Cls. 519).

The bill under consideration proposes to grant to the Court of Claims jurisdiction to rehear the case and to render judgment in favor of the claimant, if it is of the opinion that the expenditures were incurred by him in good faith in reliance upon the belief that the representatives of the War Department, with whom he dealt, possessed authority to bind the United States, and provided that he was justified in doing so under the circumstances. In other words, this bill proposes to abolish for the purposes of this case, the rule that the Government is not bound by an agreement, unless such agreement was entered into in its behalf by a representative having actual authority to make the contract.

Sufficient reason does not appear to exempt this claimant from the operation of the above-mentioned rule, and I, therefore, do not feel justified in giving my approval to this bill.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 5, 1936.

SOUTHERN PRODUCTS CO.—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 203)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Senate:

I return herewith, without my approval, Senate bill S. 929, entitled "An act for the relief of the Southern Products Co."

This act provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Southern Products Co., Dallas, Tex., the sum of $13,051.19 in full settlement of all claims against the Government, for the cost of removal and of the cost of reconditioning 9,097 bales of good, merchantable cotton, from its place of storage in the Bush Terminal Co. warehouse, Brooklyn, N. Y., the damage being caused to the cotton by climatic and other causes during its enforced removal and while it was exposed to the weather after removal from the Bush Terminal warehouse, Brooklyn, N. Y., as result of the commandeering of the entire storage warehouse on January 3, 1918, by the Secretary of War. The settlement amount represents the net cost to the claimant of removal of the cotton.

The claim involved in this bill was carefully considered by the appraisal section of the War Department claims board which functioned as a board of review in such matters and was rejected for the reason that it was not of the character of cases coming within the purview of the so-called Dent Act, which finding was approved by the Secretary of War.

Thereafter the claimant filed suit in the Court of Claims under the said Dent Act and other acts of Congress, and the court held that the case did not fall within any of the acts relied upon by the claimant.

It is apparent that awarding relief in this case would constitute a discrimination which would be unfair to many other potential claimants in similar situation, and would undoubtedly result in the presentation of claims for relief after such a lapse of time as would make it difficult, if not impossible, for the Government to secure adequate evidence in such cases.

For the above reasons I do not feel that I would be justified in giving my approval to this legislation.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 5, 1936.

A. RANDOLPH HOLLADAY—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 206)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed, as follows:

I return herewith, without my approval, S. 1110, "An act for the relief of A. Randolph Holladay."

This act authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to A. Randolph Holladay the sum of $11,172.15, as a refund on income tax paid by him for the year 1927, which now cannot be refunded because of a closing agreement executed by him under the provisions of section 606, Revenue Act of 1928.

For the past 15 years the several revenue acts have contained provisions authorizing the execution of a closing agreement enabling taxpayers and the Government by voluntary action to set at rest the question of the amount of tax liability for any given taxable year. Under such an agreement neither the Government nor the taxpayer can reopen anew the question of such tax liability except for reasons of fraud, malfeasance, or misrepresentation of a material fact. In this respect, therefore, a taxpayer seeking to obtain relief notwithstanding the execution of a closing agreement, is in a position identical with one who seeks to obtain a refund notwithstanding the expiration of the period of limitations for obtaining such refunds. The taxpayer in the instant case failed to file any claim for refund and to pursue his statutory remedy upon rejection thereof. I do not see where this act differs in any material particular from various acts recently submitted to me and which I disapproved, to except certain taxpayers from the operation of the statutes of limitation pertaining to the revenue laws by extending the time for the refunding of taxes to such taxpayers for the reason that the closing agreement executed by A. Randolph Holladay was in the nature of a voluntary invocation of the statute of limitations.

In every case where the execution of a closing agreement works to the advantage of the Government, either the double payment or overpayment of tax legally due is involved. A corresponding advantage results to the taxpayer executing a closing agreement where subsequently it is discovered that additional tax is due. The present legislation would thus discriminate against the Government in that it would open the door to relief in such cases in which the statute operates to the prejudice of a particular taxpayer, while leaving the door closed to the Government in those cases in which the statute operates to the disadvantage of the Government.

ART METAL CONSTRUCTION CO.—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 205)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed, as follows:

I return herewith, without my approval, S. 1138 (74th Cong., 2d sess.) a bill for the relief of Art Metal Construction Co.

This bill would extend to October 1, 1936, the period for filing suit by the Art Metal Construction Co. and would authorize and direct the Court of Claims of the United States to hear and determine on the merits any suit commenced therein against the United States prior to that date for the recovery of income and profits taxes paid for the calendar year 1918. The bill would grant the Art Metal Construction Co. the right to file such suit notwithstanding the fact that, in a prior suit for the recovery of such taxes, a United States circuit court of appeals determined that the company did not file a valid claim for refund within the period of limitations provided by law.

On several occasions there have been submitted to me other bills which proposed to except certain taxpayers from the operation of the statutes of limitations pertaining to the revenue laws by extending the time for the recovery of amounts paid by such taxpayers. On those occasions, I expressed my accord with the enacted policy of Congress that it is sound to include in all revenue acts, statutes of limitations, by the operation of which, after a fixed period of time, it becomes impossible for the Government to collect additional taxes or for the taxpayer to recover an overpayment of taxes. I pointed out in each instance that such legislation selects a small class of taxpayers for special treatment by excepting them from that policy, thus discriminating against the whole body of Federal taxpayers and establishing a precedent which would open the door to relief in all cases in which the statute operates to the prejudice of a particular taxpayer, while leaving the door closed to the Government in those cases in which the statute operates to the disadvantage of the Government.

In this regard the instant measure (S. 1138) does not differ in principle from the bills which were under consideration on those prior occasions. I know of no circumstances which would justify the exception made by S. 1138 to the long-continued policy of Congress. Again I must express my belief that the field of special legislation should not be opened to relieve special classes of taxpayers from the consequences of their failure to protect their claims for the refund of taxes within the period fixed by law.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 7, 1936.

ANTON W. FISCHER—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 204)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed, as follows:

I return herewith, without my approval, S. 1846 (74th Cong., 2d sess.), entitled "An act for the relief of the estate of Anton W. Fischer."

This bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the estate of Anton W. Fischer, late of Owatonna, Minn., the sum of $275.98, under existing rules and regulations, said amount representing an overpayment of taxes, the recovery of which is barred by the statute of limitations. The bill would authorize and direct the refund notwithstanding the fact that the estate failed to institute suit for the recovery of such taxes, thus neglecting to avail itself of the remedy provided by law, and the period within which such suit might be filed has long since expired.

On several occasions there have been submitted to me other bills which proposed to except certain taxpayers from the operation of the statutes of limitations pertaining to the revenue laws by extending the time for the recovery of amounts paid by such taxpayers. On those occasions I expressed my accord with the enacted policy of Congress that it is sound to include in all revenue acts, statutes of limitations, by the operation of which, after a fixed period of time, it becomes impossible for the Government to collect additional taxes or for the taxpayer to recover an overpayment of taxes. I pointed out in each instance that such legislation selects a small class of taxpayers for special treatment by exempting them from that policy, thus discriminating against the whole body of Federal taxpayers and establishing a precedent which would open the door to relief in all cases in which the statute operates to the prejudice of a particular taxpayer, while leaving the door closed to the Government in those cases in which the statute operates to the disadvantage of the Government.

In this regard the instant measure, S. 1846, does not differ in principle from the bills which were under consideration on those prior occasions. There appears to be no valid reason why the claimants in this case should not be bound by the provisions of the law, as are other taxpayers and the Government. I know of no circumstance which would justify the exception made by S. 1846 to the long-continued policy of Congress. Again I must express my belief that the field of special legislation should not be opened to relieve special classes of taxpayers from the consequences of their failure to invoke, within the period prescribed, the legal remedies provided by the law.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I present and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a resolution adopted by the town of Waterford, N. Y., favoring flood control.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the dam in the Hudson River at Troy was maintained by the State of New York from 1820 to 1915 at a crest elevation of 13.2 feet above sea level, barge canal datum; and

Whereas the Government of the United States in 1915 replaced the said State dam with a new dam, one-half of which has a crest elevation of 15.2 feet above sea level, barge canal datum, and one-half crest elevation of 17.2 feet above sea level, barge canal datum, making an average increase in the height of this dam of 3 feet; and

Whereas the consequent increase of 3 feet in the elevation of the surface of the Hudson River above that dam has caused, during floods, hundreds of thousands of dollars of damage in the town of Waterford, in the northern section of Troy, and in the lower sections of Cohoes, including the washing out of the dike between Cohoes and Green Island; and

Whereas this increase of 3 feet in the elevation of the water above the Troy dam during the flood stages of the river is of benefit to no one, because the river is not navigable at such times and water power is useless: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President of the United States and the Congress thereof be, and they hereby are, respectfully requested to install in said dam floodgates of such size and capacity that, during flood stages of the river, the elevation of the river surface above the Troy dam will not be raised higher than it would be if the dam had an elevation of 13.2 feet above sea level, barge canal datum; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND, to Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER, to Hon. WILLIAM D. THOMAS, and to Hon. PARKER CORNING.

LOW-COST HOUSING

Mr. WAGNER. I also present a resolution adopted by the American Federation of Hosiery Workers favoring the pending housing bill, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the bad, obsolete, and inadequate dwellings in which the majority of American workers are forced to live constitute a mockery of this country's vast resources of land, labor, materials, and technical skill; and

Whereas an absolute shortage of all kinds of dwellings is rapidly approaching both here and throughout the country, and is forcing rents to exploitive heights and forcing families to "double up"; and

Whereas continued severe unemployment in the building industry is inexcusable in view of the great and urgent need for new dwellings; and

Whereas ordinary private enterprise is not able and never has been able to meet the housing needs of average American workers; and

Whereas only a long-term program of Federal aid combined with local initiative will meet this situation adequately; and

Whereas labor has a double interest in the construction of low-rent dwellings, as the representative both of the unemployed building and material workers and of low-income families in need of better housing; and

Whereas labor's housing program is substantially embodied in the Wagner-Ellenbogen housing bill; and

Whereas this administration must keep its oft-repeated promises to the American people to improve housing conditions and increase employment in the building trades, which promises can be fulfilled only by the immediate enactment of the Wagner-Ellenbogen housing bill, preferably with larger appropriation and bond issues; and

Whereas the American Federation of Hosiery Workers is vitally concerned in securing the passage of the Wagner-Ellenbogen bill which will make it possible, we are convinced, to work out an arrangement with the Government regarding our own project, the Carl Mackley houses, which will enable us to reduce rentals to the point where most hosiery workers can live in the project and the financial problems of the undertaking can be solved: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Federation of Hosiery Workers hereby actively endorses and supports the Wagner-Ellenbogen housing bill and urges both the President and every Member of Congress to be likewise, and to make this bill into law at this session.

SALES OF MUNITIONS TO INDUSTRIAL CORPORATIONS

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs an editorial from the Great Falls (Mont.) Tribune of April 26, 1936, the leading newspaper of the State of Montana, entitled "Disturbing News."

There being no objection, the editorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Great Falls (Mont.) Tribune of Apr. 26, 1936]

DISTURBING NEWS

It is not only organized labor, but all classes of workers, who will read with resentment and suspicion the information given in the Senate investigation of large sales by a great manufacturing concern of machine guns and gas bombs to large industrial corporations.

When Liberty Leaguers and others of their frame of mind talk resoundingly of the American plan, it is fair to inquire what the implications are of what they call Americanism. The issue of labor relations is being forced into this campaign by those who oppose legislation intended to give to workers the opportunity and right of organization for collective bargaining. The company union is not the final word in the problem of labor relations, despite the determined fight by great mass-production industries to prevent national organization of their workers.

When disquieting testimony is gathered in Congress that in important industrial communities preparations are being made for actual war to prevent unionization, the issue takes a most sinister aspect. It is not the spirit of the age that we should maintain as the final American principal in labor relations an economic feudalism that puts all decision and power in determining standards of working conditions in the hands of a few managers of great corporations.

Labor wars and strikes are not a satisfactory way of settling questions involving such relations but some democratic principle must be introduced in their place in this social situation. If the Wagner Labor Act should be found unconstitutional the decision certainly would not settle the question. The necessity will then still exist for some other method of regulating the conditions under which great masses of our people are to work than the unregulated desires of a few managers of big industrial combinations.

Fascism and nazism abroad marked their advent to power by wiping out the right of workers to unite for their own protection. The attitude of such groups as those of the steel interests and the Liberty League supporters is in that respect decidedly facist in its trend. Their activities are disturbing the people of this Nation greatly and the recent hearings on armaments sales in certain industrial quarters will give a sharper edge to the apprehensions of millions of wage earners.

It has neither authorization nor appropriation attached to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Whereas there is to be held at San Francisco, Calif., during the year 1939 an international exposition which has for its purpose the celebration of the completion of the San Francisco-Oakland Bridge and the Golden Gate Bridge, and which is designed to depict and exhibit the progress and accomplishments of the Pacific area of the United States in science, industry, business, transportation, and culture, and which, because of its world character, will contribute to cordial relations among the nations of the world; and

Whereas, because of its location and purpose, its scope and aims, said exposition is deserving of the support and encouragement of the Government of the United States of America: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and respectfully requested by proclamation, or in such manner as he may deem proper, to invite all foreign countries and nations to such proposed exposition with a request that they participate therein.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 260) was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

other matters, submitted by Mr. WHEELER on February 4, 1936, and I submit a report (No. 2005) thereon. I understand the resolution automatically goes to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. If it does not automatically go to that committee, I ask that it be referred to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received; and, under the rule, will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

PRINTING OF PROCEEDINGS IN THE RITTER IMPEACHMENT TRIAL (S. DOC. NO. 200)

On motion by Mr. ASHURST, it was

NIAGARA DIVERSION AND ST. LAWRENCE PROJECTS (S. DOC. NO. 201)

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document a portion of the report submitted by the Power Authority of the State of New York which deals particularly with the Niagara diversion and the St. Lawrence project.

I ask this privilege because there is now pending before the Foreign Relations Committee a proposed treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada which deals with the restoration of the scenic beauty of Niagara Falls and also an increased diversion of water. I have opposed the ratification of that treaty, and this particular section of the report throws light upon that subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the portion of the report referred to will be printed as a Senate document.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on certain amendments of the Senate to House bill 12098, the State, Justice, etc., appropriation bill, which was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
May 6, 1936.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9 to the bill (H. R. 12098) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice, and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes, and concur therein; and

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58 to said bill and concur therein with the following amendment: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert:

"SEC. 3. That in passing upon applications made for compensation under the provisions of the item for 'Payment to cotton ginners', contained in title I of the Supplemental Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1936 (Public Law No. 440, 74th Cong.), and upon payments pursuant to such applications, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Comptroller General of the United States are authorized and directed, in the interest of saving as much administrative expense as possible and in order to avoid delay in passing upon such applications, to assume that the additional expenses incurred in connection with the administration of the act of April 21, 1934 (49 Stat. 598–607), equaled 25 cents per bale, counting round bales as half bales, during the period June 1, 1935, to February 10, 1936, inclusive: Provided, That no payment shall be made on any application for such compensation unless the application is filed prior to September 1, 1936."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there is so much confusion in the Chamber I am unable to determine what report is now before the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this is the action of the House of Representatives on the appropriation bill for the Departments of State and Justice, and so forth. There were practically no disagreements. On two amendments the House conferees desired to have a vote of the House. One was agreed to and the other of the amendments, numbered 58, was changed somewhat in language without changing its substance.

I move that the Senate concur in House amendment to Senate amendment numbered 58.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. I move that the Senate concur in the various amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate in question.

The motion was agreed to.

STATE SALES TAXES AND FAIR TRADE PRACTICES

Mr. BENSON. Mr. President, we have passed the Robinson-Patman bill with many amendments, and anticipate having it before us again in the form of a conference committee report.

Aside from agriculture, relief, and unemployment, I do not believe any two economic issues have attracted more attention and interest on the part of the people of Minnesota than have the issues of fair-trade practices, and the peril of State sales taxes. In order that the Members of this body may be informed of the attitude of the people of my State on these matters, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD certain statements, which I send to the desk.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEGISLATIVE RESOLUTIONS PASSED BY THE MINNESOTA RETAIL HARDWARE DEALERS AT THEIR ANNUAL CONVENTION JANUARY 1936

Unalterable opposition to sales tax, on the grounds that it would relieve large companies and trusts of a large amount of taxes, would not be a replacement tax, would work a hardship on small salaried people and farmers, would increase expenses of hardware merchants and would make dealers tax collectors.

Definite opposition to constitutional amendment to be submitted to voters in 1936, which would abolish State real-estate taxes. This would strike a serious blow at present tax system and would cause substitution of unfair and discriminatory tax system.

Advocating increase in chain-store taxes.

Urging passage by legislature of fair trade bill, which has for its main purpose the establishment of a fair price merchandise distribution system and the prevention of selling below cost.

Favoring principles of Patman bill and other legislation in Congress designed to strengthen Clayton Act, to prevent discriminations against independent merchants.

RESOLUTIONS PASSED BY THE STATE PHARMACEUTICAL ASSOCIATION IN ITS MEETING FEBRUARY 1936

1. Opposition to the sales tax.
2. Support of a chain-store tax.
3. Support of the Robinson-Patman antidiscrimination bill.
4. And a fair trade act.

STATEMENT BY GOV. FLOYD B. OLSON IN HIS KEYNOTE ADDRESS TO THE FARMER-LABOR PARTY CONVENTION MARCH 27, 1936

The Congress should, by adequate legislation, protect the independent merchant whose continuation in the merchandising field is being more and more jeopardized by the growth of the chain-store and mail-order house systems. Congressional investigation has shown that unjust, discriminatory price practices have been existing for many years, under which manufacturers have given chain stores price advantages over independent merchants. Legislation designed to outlaw this discriminatory practice and aid in price stabilization will be of great benefit to the independent merchant.

PERTINENT PLANKS IN THE PLATFORM ADOPTED BY THE STATE CONVENTION OF THE OFFICIAL ORGANIZATION OF THE FARMER-LABOR PARTY OF MINNESOTA, ON MARCH 28, 1936

We propose and recommend legislation by Congress making illegal the granting of price rebates and advertising credits by manufacturers to chain stores in discrimination against independent merchants, and ask for further appropriations for the investigation of these and other unfair trade practices against independent merchants.

We are unalterably opposed to a sales tax.

We advocate an improved chain-store tax for the benefit of the independent merchant and the consumer.

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY AND INTERNATIONAL SANCTIONS—ADDRESS BY SENATOR THOMAS OF UTAH

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address delivered yesterday, May 6, before the joint session of the Sections on International and Comparative Law and the American Foreign Law Association by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] at the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Before considering the subject assigned, it is essential to state a few premises which will reflect the background for my conclusions:

1. Our neutrality law is domestic law. It is not treaty law. The present neutrality law sets out certain prohibitions governing the actions of American citizens in the event of a war while we remain at peace. The important point for our consideration today is that in spirit and in word it recognizes one of the old neutrality fundamentals, that belligerents shall be treated with impartiality.

2. Sanctions, as we shall use the term this afternoon, refer to those penalties which may be imposed upon a state as a result of international action rendered through an agency set up to speak a joint will. It is not a reprisal, for most states which are parties to the sanctions have received no injury. It is a penalty for lack of respect for an ideal, rather than a punishment for a wrong. The penalty is not primarily to punish the wrongdoer; it is rather to protect the peaceful process of joint action by placing restraints upon states to desist from lending indirect aid to a user of force. If sanctions call for force, then they do become penalties against the disturber of world peace. We have now the first real attempt to experiment with peaceful sanctions. The force sanction has not yet been tried. The right comes from the League of Nations Covenant.

3. We must remember that the League is not a universal league, and that as far as the imposition of penalties is concerned, there is no unanimous agreement even among League members respecting Italy. Whether sanctions will be attempted against Germany remains to be seen.

4. There is no relationship between the American law of neutrality and the League sanction either in law or in theory. In fact, the two are definitely out of harmony with each other. One acts only against a previously determined wrongdoer among belligerents, or, to use the League term, the aggressor, and the other acts impartially against all belligerents. The League sanctions impose restrictions upon the member states and their citizens. The American neutrality law imposes restrictions upon those persons under American jurisdiction. The aims of sanctions and neutrality are alike in that both attempt to gain their objectives by self-restraint. But the League cannot act directly, as there are no persons under League jurisdiction. There are no citizens of the League of Nations. Its acts, therefore, are only recommendations. If sanctions are respected by the member states, it is a moral reaction because enforcement is impossible. The American neutrality restrictions are enforced by American enforcing officers upon the citizens directly. The American neutrality is law. The League sanction is recommendation.

There may be times when a neutrality restriction may have the effect of a sanction upon a belligerent state; for example, if a League sanction recommended against the granting of loans to the aggressor and our neutrality law prohibited loans to a belligerent, the practical effect of both actions would be the same, and the American neutrality law would be sustaining a League recommendation or vice versa.

5. The neutrality law is a unilateral action. Sanctions are a result of multilateral recommendations.

6. The primary object of sanctions is to stop or to prohibit war. The primary object of our neutrality is to keep America out of war.

7. The sanction theory is based upon an acceptance of a moral attitude that war is bad, that it is of universal concern, and therefore should be prohibited. The neutrality theory does not consider the moral question, nor does it accept the idea of war's being a matter of universal concern. It definitely assumes it is not our concern. War is not condemned by the law; it is merely assumed to exist. Our neutrality's purpose is one of expediency.

Critics have assumed that our Neutrality Act should be used as a cooperating act to enforce collective security. This is hardly a logical deduction, because under the collective theory there is in reality no place for the neutral. Although many thinkers have pointed out that League members may remain neutral when the League attempts a coercive action, logically the League theory is based upon the theory of preponderance; that is, that all unite against an erring member and that the force of the united action should be spent against the one condemned. Neutrality smacks of aloofness. Sanctions are the result of joint action.

All that I have said above is commonplace to the thoughtful, and therefore probably has no place here, but the world moves so fast that even the thoughtful have trouble keeping up with it. The speed with which we enacted our two neutrality resolutions and the fact that the world has been changing and acting so rapidly, justifies me in attempting to remove confusion at least from my thought.

The sanction idea as used by the League is, as I have said above, new; but a sanction thought of in the sense of penalties is old. The sanction instrument as used by the League of Nations is related to the boycott. Its success will depend upon the same factors, therefore, upon which the success of a boycott depends. The boycott was invented in ancient China. It was a political instrument, used primarily by those taxed, against an unjust assessment. It can be successful only when it represents the will of the majority or the many againt one or the few. When it has been a minority movement it has always failed. It cannot be successful whenever it cannot command the moral and actual adherence, in a peaceful way, of all parties to the boycott. If force is used against it, it is helpless unless it resorts to force. Thus in a sense it is an instrument of public opinion, and tensely democratic in its final analysis. It is moral rather than legal, and its aim is to restrain or to convince. It wins by nonaction. If it attempts coercion, strife, bloodshed, and war result. It is primarily a peaceful process.

Now, apply these theories internationally and call the boycott a sanction, and let us see what we have. First of all, we have the will of the many against the one or the few. Secondly, we have an attempt to win by nonaction or self-restraint. A sanction in League theory is a peaceful process, and a state of war does not exist as a result of a resort to sanctions.

In the enforcement of the sanctions a state's leaders may be convinced that the sanction is proper, but such a state's citizens may not be convinced. Assume that the sanction is one curbing trade, and the curb is placed upon oil. With the highly mechanized instruments of warfare today, everyone knows that no war can be successfully carried on without oil; therefore there is an apparent medium available for the stopping of any war. If all the nations, with the exception of the erring one, in the League agree to an oil sanction and they recommend such a sanction to the respective states, the question is by no means settled. There yet remains a leading factor. These states themselves are not traders in oil. The oil trade is carried on by citizens of the various states, and sometimes by international corporations. These citizens have gained through national law many rights and privileges. Thus the curb which the various nations have decided to place is, in its final analysis, dependent upon the willingness and ability and the right of the states to force that curb against its own citizens. Thus we see there are tremendous barriers and real conflicts in law which must be overcome before this peaceful process can be successful. To this particular we must give thought; for a sanction is not just a boycott. In a boycott the persons placing the restrictions are the persons concerned. In sanctions the restrictions are placed by representatives of States, not by representatives of those restricted. Thus sanctions are more difficult to enforce than a boycott.

Some might assume that uniting for sanctions is no more difficult problem than the uniting for war, but it is very much more difficult. It is a peaceful process, and the laws governing peace are complex, while the laws governing war are simple. War encourages every economic activity, while a sanction is a restriction upon economic activities. In war, too, economic activities are encouraged by huge profits. In sanctions profits are not only cut off, but losses may result. Thus governments cannot help but have very much greater difficulty in curbing or directing citizens through a peaceful process than through a warlike one. That is a real problem, and it is in this that we are definitely in an experimental stage. War as a matter of propaganda, is easy propaganda, because it is a long habit of men. Propaganda for peace is in its experimental stage. The will for war is easy to arouse, the will for peace is hard.

If men had long vision, they would realize that the war process is destructive and the peace process is not, but men are not of long vision. Especially is this the case with men who buy to sell.

The League sanction, even when restricted to the simple process of acting against a predetermined aggressor, in its culmination is anything but simple. The members of the League are sovereign entities. The League itself is not sovereign. In theory the League has but one interest, that is to maintain the peace and to serve its members. League members have many interests; therefore there can be many kinds of sanctions, the success of any one of which will depend upon any number of factors, such as the geographical situation of the war area, the size, the importance and purpose of the aggresor state. The world is by no means a unit of interest. Territorial propinquity does give special interest. There are regional understandings, and even among neighbors there will be of necessity more good neighborliness in some cases than in others. Still the fact remains that more and more the realization that unilateral action is not enough becomes evident. To fight for collective security seems absurd, but to be without the collective guaranty would produce fears so great that nations probably could not stand. The guaranty without fighting for it is the task, and America has probably taught the way.

Now I am going to make you smile. When Woodrow Wilson and Henry Cabot Lodge advanced their respective theories about sanctions, both were right. Thus their clash in opinion was like a war clash, two rights contesting for supremacy. Both used logic, but each built his logic upon a different premise. Woodrow Wilson thought of sanctions as a weapon against aggression. Lodge thought of sanctions as a defense of the status quo. Each failed to realize that the sanction idea was not a simple one, and each refused to accept the premise of the other. Today we know from actual experience that both were right and both were wrong.

To illustrate: We have an example of each of these types of sanction before us. If sanctions are attempted against Germany for moving an army into the Rhineland, that will be a sanction in defense of the status quo. That is the type of sanction Senator Lodge objected to because it presaged the inability of nations to rectify wrongs done as a result of imposed treaties. Sanctions against Italy are different. They are sanctions against the aggressor. Italy herself realizes this fact because, while she objects to the sanctions against her, she recognizes the fact that Germany's disrespect for treaty promises are worthy of a penalty. The sanction against Italy is the type of sanction Woodrow Wilson thought of, one to stop war and to curb an aggressor. The proposed sanction against Germany was the kind Lodge foresaw. Sanctions against Germany would be definitely in defense of the status quo under the treaties of Versailles and Locarno, and France would support such an action, although she is cold toward making the sanctions against Italy more severe.

The same difference between these two types of sanctions is apparent and is proved by British public opinion. The people of Great Britain generally supported the sanctions against Italy, the aggressor, but they are cold toward the idea of using the sanction as a medium in the pressing of treaty provisions against Germany.

From these experiences which the world today is having will come proper modifications. I cite them this afternoon in defense of the statement I have made that the peaceful process is a difficult one.

Before leaving this line of thought, the practical aspects of the attempt to use sanctions as an assertion of international control do not greatly concern us in this discussion, but in the light of the Ethiopian and the Rhineland decisions, the League is assumed to have failed. Shall we then mark the instrument of sanctions down as a failure? That will depend upon the meaning of the word "failure." History will show that the boycott has not failed when properly used. Sanctions, whenever properly used as a peaceful international instrument to command a "decent respect for the opinions of mankind" will not fail.

As I interpret the Stimson doctrine of nonrecognition, that was merely an instrument used to command a decent respect for the opinions of mankind. Nonrecognition in the minds of many has failed, but we do not witness nations breaking any records in competition to be first to recognize Manchukuo. The end is not yet. In both Ethiopia and the Rhineland cases there is an element of self-determination. Public opinion today seems to imply that the League has failed in either case. Assuming this to be so, it still does not mean that Italy and Germany have succeeded, just as the nonrecognition stand against Japan may have failed, but this failure does not mean that Japan has succeeded. Time is an essence that must be taken into consideration in other things besides money contracts. Aguinaldo failed, but if the independent Philippines become a fact it will be his picture and not General Funston's that will hang in the schoolrooms of that land 150 years from now. I have already forgotten the name of the commander of our troops in Nicaragua during our difficulties with Sandino, but our policies toward that land today are not the same as they were. When I say what I have in regard to Nicaragua and the Philippines I do not wish to be thought disloyal to the past. I merely want to emphasize the fact that there is a logic of history which, some way or another, seems to have its way.

We must be conscious of actualities. No matter how great the idea, it must rest its success or its failure upon actualities. We must not expect nations which have selfish interests to be more concerned about principles of behavior than they are about those interests. Our task is to emphasize the fact that the long-range approach is the important one.

I have shown that the American theory of neutrality and the League theory of sanctions are not related. Still, one theory can be used to modify the other. Both may be developed into helpful aids toward better world control for peace, but each must be modified to do this. Neutrality must be broadened by attempting to get nations friendly to American aloofness to accept the same restraint in the curb on their citizens which our new neutrality has placed on our citizens. The key to this is for the American States to logically follow the theory of refusing to apply neutral restraints against American republics when they are at war with non-American states, and encourage them to implement our stressing of neutral duties by declaring for the same restraints upon their citizens whenever war exists. This will bring the Americas into harmony on the score of condemnation of belligerency. Then the League should assume the theory as expressed in our neutrality law, of condemning all belligerents at the outbreak of hostilities and stopping the fighting by sanction pressure. The fighting stopped, then is the time to determine the aggressor.

It can be argued that the League should attempt to restrain all violence between its members without waiting to determine which is the aggressor. This does not deny the principle of neutrality; it merely suspends the use of violence until a decision can be made as to which is the aggressor. This is what the policeman does in domestic government. He is not empowered to determine which is the aggressor; it is his duty to prevent the use of violence by either party to the dispute. The court will later decide, first, which was the aggressor and what should be the penalty, and, second, if decided, what were the merits of the dispute over which they were fighting. This should be more acceptable to the United States, which has in its legislation refused to determine the aggressor, but is willing to put an embargo upon both belligerents. There would in this way be a clear condemnation of war, and the troublesome questions of guilt and penalty may be left to future expediency without mixing the issues.

We shall never get clear-cut cases of success or failure of any peaceful process. Court processes are not successes or failures; they are merely mediums of arriving at the nearest approach to justice which men can come in settlement of differences. Our process of judicial review cannot honestly be acclaimed as either a success or failure, but no one here, I am sure, would suggest doing away with it. A peaceful process does not mean unanimous agreement. No one in America wants to see a single will in our country. We surely do not wish to see it in the world. Even our very venerable nine Justices disagree. Their disagreement does not mark our Supreme Court or our constitutional system a failure. The American way is unity of action after discussion. That is exactly what the League is attempting.

Let us remember that peace is maintained among our 48 States by certain guaranties—call them sanctions if you wish. Labor is guaranteed by law its right to strike, yet when strikes come there is not labor peace. Democracy rests upon the right of rebellion, yet when rebellion comes democracy ends, because democracy is first of all a peaceful process. It rests on the concept of live and let live. Our Constitution guarantees a republican form of government in all the States, but the American Union has persisted because we have never done much about that. You know what the Supreme Court said in the Rhode Island and Oregon cases on this score. You also know how our whole system failed in bringing agreement between Virginia and West Virginia in that long-drawn-out case. When certain citizens of Louisiana petitioned the Senate to do something because it was charged a political faction in that State had deprived the citizens of Louisiana of a republican form of government, you know what the Senate did. If President Roosevelt had set out to collect the processing taxes as Washington did to collect the whisky taxes in western Pennsylvania, we would not have needed to have bothered with the Soil Conservation Act. Shall we say that Roosevelt failed where Washington succeeded?

These are the dilemmas of peaceful processes. Their very inefficiency is what gives a Mussolini, a Hitler, and a Lenin logical support. The single will is pretty, but it ends in making man a victim of the state. Our concept of the Government as an agent of men has no place under this theory. Let us be slow in condemning that which makes us what we are.

Peaceful processes are complex, in fact our Government seems very inefficient and constantly against itself. We have peace in America, but no one would describe life in America as one continual round of bliss. World peace can be no more blissful than American peace. Sanctions represent an experiment with a peaceful process in an attempt to put law where law has not been before. That aim is worthy of the interest of all, if you believe as I do that a government of law is man's most advanced political concept in guaranteeing man those blessings which we consider worth while under our theory of liberty. To those who pin their faith on neutrality I ask, why not attempt to stop war rather than attempting to stop the legitimate acivities of American citizens? To those who pin their faith on sanctions I ask, why not stop the fighting first, then prove the wrongdoer afterward? To both I ask, if it is peace you want, why not honestly unite for peace?

THE MERCHANT MARINE—ADDRESS BY SENATOR GUFFEY

Mr. BACHMAN. Mr. President, on the 4th of May the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] delivered a radio address, arranged by the Washington Star, on Our Merchant Marine Problem. It presents a most concise and comprehensive statement on the subject. I desire its incorporation in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR MERCHANT MARINE PROBLEM

The question as to whether the American people shall have a merchant marine to meet the needs of our commerce and to serve as a naval auxiliary in time of national emergency, was answered in the affirmative 20 years ago during the administration of Woodrow Wilson.

No patriotic citizen should question the advantages of having an adequate merchant marine operating under the American flag. Those of you who live in the interior do not come into everyday contact with maritime matters, but, 20 years ago, our lack of a merchant marine was forcibly brought to the attention of the wheat grower, the cotton farmer and the factory worker. Europe was engaged in a bloody conflict. Merchant vessels of the nations at war were withdrawn from trans-Atlantic trade routes. Farm and factory products of all descriptions were forwarded from the interior of our country to the congested seaports, where no ships were available for transporting our goods across the waters to foreign consumers. Foodstuffs rotted at the docks. Our foreign trade was paralyzed. And when we were forced into the war—foreign ships carried our troops to France. Foreign ships transported food and equipment for our armies. Foreign ships even furnished auxiliary services to our battle fleet. For all of these services our Treasury later paid at war prices. This was not the first time that our Navy was forced to rely upon merchant vessels of foreign nations. Thirty years ago, the White Squadron was sent on a voyage around the world. The fact that the American battle fleet, on that cruise, was supplied with coal and food by foreign vessels is a black mark upon our maritime history.

We did not have a merchant fleet 20 years ago. Worse than that, we did not have adequate shipyards in which to build new vessels. In 1917, our few shipyards were crowded with vessels under construction for the Navy. In almost equal degree, that is our situation today. Because of the unsettled condition of the world, the United States is now engaged in building up its Navy to the full strength permitted by the exising naval-limitation treaty.

Do you listeners in the radio audience think we should wait until another emergency confronts the Nation before we start to rebuild our merchant fleet? Should we wait until our Navy is ordered out on active duty before we make provision for the supply vessels required for our warships and for our foreign commerce? I think you will agree with me that this "do-nothing" policy is both dangerous and costly.

The American people have not forgotten the lessons learned during the early years of the World War. Neither has this Government forgotten the costly solution. There is nothing mysterious or complex about our merchant-marine problem. Simply and plainly, the vessels comprising our merchant fleet have grown old and they are obsolete. They cannot compete effectively with the vessels of foreign powers which are equipped with modern and efficient machinery. The great majority of our merchant vessels must be replaced. There is nothing strange or unusual in that situation. It differs in no respect from problems that periodically confront every farmer and every businessman in conducting his affairs. It does not differ in kind, only in magnitude—in the amount of money and property involved—from the problems of everyday business life. It now confronts us collectively as a Nation. It will be taken in stride and solved, just as our people meet and solve all their problems.

We have today about 380 vessels—excluding tankers—engaged in foreign trade. Only 31 of these merchant vessels are truly modern. Therefore, a comprehensive program calls for the construction of approximately 350 modern ships.

Realizing that a ship normally cannot be built in less than 10 months to a year, and realizing further that 90 percent of our freight ships will be obsolete within the next 3 or 4 years, the Congress should not hesitate to take immediate steps to carry out the recommendation of President Roosevelt, expressed in the closing sentences of his recent message to Congress. I quote: "The American people want to use American ships. Their Government owes it to them to make certain that such ships are in keeping with our national pride and national needs."

Our merchant-marine problem is not a question as to whether we shall have a merchant marine but our problem is, How shall we maintain a merchant marine worthy of this great Nation? So long as the American lives and works on a higher scale than his foreign competitor, whether he be engaged in a shipyard or on board ship, just so long will construction and operating costs of an American merchant marine be higher than the costs of merchant vessels under foreign flags. This simple fact gives rise to our problem. In seeking a solution, there are three alternatives from which to choose. The first course of action open to the Congress might be to remove all of the standards from American shipping. This would mean that a ship built with coolie labor in China, or financed by the depreciated mark and built in Germany could operate under the American flag. It would mean that seamen of any nationality would be eligible for employment on American ships. This could result in nothing else than low wages and intolerable living conditions. Furthermore, our few existing commercial shipyards would stand idle henceforth. I do not think any American citizen would seriously consider this as an answer to our problem.

The second possible solution to our problem is Government ownership and operation. The traditional American policy is to foster private initiative. I favor a privately owned and operated merchant marine. I am of the firm conviction that American ingenuity, native ability, and shrewd business sense can, and will, result in a privately owned American merchant marine in which we may take pride, if the Government does its part in placing the American shipping industry on an equal footing with our foreign competitors. However, should private capital be unable or unwilling to assume its share of the burden of building and operating vessels, then, and then only, do I favor direct action by the Government to protect this Nation's position on the sea.

This third method of solving the problem is the honest, straightforward program recommended to Congress by our great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt. In his message to Congress of March 4, 1935, recommending shipping legislation, the President recognized the necessity of an American merchant marine and recognized the further fact that building and operating costs, and subsidies paid by foreign governments, place the American shipping operator at a distinct disadvantage in comparison with his foreign competitor.

The President made certain concrete recommendations, the first of which was that Congress make provision for meeting the threefold handicaps between American and foreign shipping costs. He recommended that the Congress can well afford honestly to call a subsidy by its right name instead of appropriating large annual sums under the guise for payments of ocean-mail contracts. He urged that improper practices and abuses should and must be ended. He referred to improper operating of subsidiary companies. The payment of excessive salaries and bonuses, and other widely known abuses which have made for poor management, improper use of profits, and scattered efforts. It is not my intention to dwell this evening on these wrongdoings of the past. Cures for these evils will be included in a constructive law which has as its main purpose the rebuilding of our merchant fleet in accordance with the recommendations of our Chief Executive.

The disclosure of these improper practices is not the major reason for repealing the Merchant Marine Act of 1928. Since that act was passed we have increased our merchant fleet by the pitiful total of 31 ships. There is need for constructing this number during each of the next 7 or 8 years. It would be impossible to realize that objective under the 1928 act, which has not met with the success that was hoped for when it was enacted. Prior to 1928 the Government had little experience with subsidies for the shipping business. In amount and in manner of application the subsidies authorized by the 1928 act were faulty. For example, some steamship lines have been paid a subsidy at the rate of $8 per mile for vessels capable of making a speed of 18 knots on mail-contract voyages. Recent speed tests have shown, however, that some of these vessels cannot make the contract speed. Hence, their mail pay has been reduced. This reduction, like the original contract, does not take into account competitive factors which should be considered in extending financial aid to the steamship operator.

It is better to seek an adjustment of the system than to stand by and see our merchant marine rapidly disappear because the technicalities of the system would prevent proper Government financial aid. Commenting on this precise situation, the President said: "Given under this disguised form it is an unsatisfactory and not an honest way of providing the aid that Government ought to give to shipping. I propose that we end this subterfuge." Several subsidy measures are now pending before Congress. One bill, sponsored by the Honorable SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND, passed the House during the last session of Congress. It is now before the Senate. Three other measures are also before the Senate. One of these was introduced by Senator COPELAND, of New York. Another was offered by Senator GIBSON, of Vermont, and another was introduced by myself. Thus we find four measures before the Senate, representing divergent viewpoints on the ways and means of rebuilding and operating our merchant fleet in line with the President's announced policies.

It has been the desire of the President that these divergent views be brought into harmony. I undertook this task, and today introduced in the Senate a proposed amendment to the Bland bill. This amendment is the result of an earnest desire to compose the different ideas which have been advanced as possible solutions to our problem. I will discuss briefly some of the features of my amendment which, I think, are of interest to every one of you. Before doing so, however, I wish to assure my listeners that the delay in Congress since President Roosevelt urged a change in our merchant marine laws does not indicate a lack of appreciation by Members of Congress on the subject. There have been differences of opinion as to how to proceed. The Members of both Houses of Congress know that previous legislation has not attained its objectives. We have taken time for a study and deliberation with the hope that we can pass a good bill. I believe a careful analysis of the amendment introduced today will prove that fact to the satisfaction of each of you.

The provisions of my amendment fall into four classifications: First, the recommendations made by President Roosevelt are fully carried out. A threefold subsidy would be authorized to meet higher American construction costs—higher American operating costs—and subsidies paid to foreign steamship companies by their governments. Existing ocean-mail contracts would be terminated on March 31, 1937. It is believed that this period of almost a year will permit equitable adjustments of the present contracts, and will provide enough time to study carefully the needs for direct subsidy payment. All present ocean-mail contractors would be given the opportunity of negotiating a settlement of their contracts with the United States Maritime Commission. If a settlement cannot be agreed upon, any dissatisfied contractor is given the privilege of seeking redress in the Court of Claims.

The second classification embraces numerous basic principles contained in the bills offered by Senator COPELAND and Congressman BLAND—including a recognition of the desirability of having commercial shipyards on the Pacific coast. To that end, a 6-percent greater cost would be allowed for the building of new vessels on that coast. This additional allowance is necessary to cover the higher cost of materials and labor on the west coast. A heavy penalty is provided against any combination, understanding, agreement, or arrangement which would prevent full, free, and secret competition in submitting bids for Government contracts. The measure would include also a limitation of profits that can be earned by shipbuilders. This limitation is an absolute maximum of 10 percent on all construction cost.

Referring now to the ship operator—my listeners all know of the risk and hazards of marine operations. This has been taken into consideration in allowing a possible profit of 10 percent, which is slightly greater than for ordinary business enterprises. If operating expenses should decline after the Government has agreed upon the amount which is to be paid as an operating differential, or if some other fact would result in a steamship company earning more than 10 percent profit per year, the taxpayers would share in the higher earnings. All profits earned by a steamship company in excess of 10 percent per annum would be shared with the Government on a 50–50 basis. The whole Nation is keenly alive to the urgent need for a safety of life at sea program. The first duty of the United States Maritime Commission includes a positive direction that all new vessels shall be designed to afford the best and most complete protection for passengers and crew against fire and all other marine perils. Also, the President of the United States would be authorized to transfer the Steamboat Inspection Bureau to the United States Maritime Commission.

The third classification embraces certain principles included in a bill which I previously introduced. These include a positive mandate for a long-range program for replacements and additions to our merchant fleet. This mandate guarantees that the American merchant marine will have new, modern ships, even if the Government is forced to build them and then hire them out to private operators. The only reason for shipping subsidies is the fact American labor cost is higher than foreign labor cost. The Government and the seamen are equally interested in knowing that the subsidy reaches its intended beneficiary. I submit that labor regulations rightfully belong in the Department of Labor. These labor provisions would not only include enforcement of fair wages but would also include regulations as to working conditions, hours of labor, and number of seamen required to properly and safely man a vessel.

I also believe that the provision which requires all ship officers to be members of the United States Naval Reserve will meet with the hearty approval of everyone in my radio audience.

At the present time a considerable amount of insurance on our merchant ships is underwritten in foreign countries. These merchant ships are naval auxiliaries. Insurance underwriters naturally have access to blue prints and specifications of ships insured by them. My amendment would prohibit foreign insurance underwriting. This will protect the plans of our ships from foreign observation. The fourth class of provisions in my amendment meet certain recommendations made by a special committee of the Senate which investigated existing ocean-mail contracts. These include the creation of a new independent establishment for the administration of direct subsidies, and a provision calling for a uniform system of bookkeeping in the shipping industry, and for Government inspection of books, files, and records in the offices of shipbuilders and ship operators. The measure also contains administrative provisions to guard against the recurrence of evils disclosed by the Senate investigating committee.

In closing, it is well that my listeners be advised as to whether any unreasonable burden would be imposed upon them through the enactment of the measure I introduced today. The cost element in any legislation is of vital concern to the taxpayers. The proponents of some subsidy measures believe that the subject is too complex to place a limit upon the amount of money which may be spent. I do not hold with this view. The measure, concerning which I have addressed you this evening, contains a limitation of annual expenditures which closely approximate the present annual cost for our disguised ocean-mail contract subsidies.

Although future expenditures would not be materially greater than those at present, I am of the firm conviction that the results would be much more satisfactory. The amount of the subsidies would be based on actual requirements to accomplish a definite purpose rather than upon an arbitrary allowance bearing no relationship to that purpose.

If these recommendations, as I have outlined tonight be enacted into law during the present session, I am confident that every American citizen will, in a few years, again see the flag of the American merchant marine triumphant on the seven seas.

SOIL CONSERVATION IN THE SOUTHWEST—ADDRESS BY SENATOR CHAVEZ

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very interesting and timely address on the subject Soil Conservation in the Southwest, delivered over the radio on Tuesday last by my colleague the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ].

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My friends, ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, first, I want to express my keen appreciation for this opportunity of speaking to so many of you. The subject that I have chosen for discussion is one in which I have always had an inquiring interest. It is a subject which perhaps every citizen of my own State has thought of many times, but one which in the past has had very little thought from the citizenship of the country as a whole. However, the subject has become so acute that it is now receiving the attention of all serious and sincere minds throughout the Nation. The problem is one of national import and cognizance is being taken for once by a national administration that is conscious of the situation and of the economic and human values involved and is making a determined effort to remedy the devastating losses of the past and conserve what is left for the future.

Captain Bonneville, who traveled throughout the West for the original Astor, sent back glowing reports of the verdant forests standing in seemingly inexhaustible supplies of timber and abounding in valuable fur-bearing animals of every description; of the richness and fertility of the soils; of the rivers and streams teeming with fish and fowl; and of prairies on which there was green grass as high as a man, with countless buffalo and a vast number of wild game—actually the land of plenty.

A modern traveler headed for this region would see an entirely different picture. He would find rivers clogged with silt; fowl, once so plentiful, reduced to a minimum; the streams biological deserts which periodically flood their banks, doing damage to life and property; aquatic life gone or disappearing; and further West, the plains once so abundant in rich grass and foliage of every description, which later had been transformed into the greatest agricultural area in the world and rightfully recognized as the "Bread basket of the World", today would present a very apparent contrast. He would see howling clouds of black dust taking tons of the richest topsoil and depositing it as far east as the Atlantic Ocean; tributaries choked yellow with silt roaring into the Mississippi or the Colorado and finally depositing their load into the waters of the Atlantic or the Pacific.

But I wanted to speak particularly of New Mexico and the Southwest. New Mexico is directly responsible for its very existence upon the conservation of water, the soil, and the resources underlying it. In New Mexico and adjoining parts of the Southwest our civilization and existence is predicated upon the uses of the land. The prosperity of a vast area in this Western region depends absolutely upon the productivity of the soil. We know that our livestock industry and farming activities owe their very existence to the soil and consequently our treatment of the soil determines the success or destruction of our life as a State.

It is needless to remind you of the terrible depression that has beset our country in the last several years, but long before the general economic depression those who earned their livelihood from the soil knew something about hard times. The man on the range, as well as the man on the farm, knows the full meaning of falling prices and the scarcity of markets for his products. The farmer and rancher knew long ago something of the ever-increasing difficulties encountered in the production of crops and livestock. The overgrazing of range lands, the loss of fertility in the valley farms; the hardships encountered in securing water; the difficulty in obtaining loans for operations, were familiar to the people of the Southwest even before the crash of the stock market. No one living in that part of the country could have failed to see that.

Those living on the eroding lands of the United States are facing a problem so severe and so far-reaching in its significance that almost the entire population is now greatly concerned over its solution. The problem of erosion has become so urgent that it now calls for national planning. Various agencies and organizations are now actively combating the evil. Perhaps at no time in American history have the eyes of the people been turned toward the land as is the case today. The problems of the land are manifold, but conservation of the soil unquestionably stands far out in front of all the other pressing land problems combined. We are confident that as a Nation we are finding some of the causes of the trouble, and the Federal Government is attempting, as never before, to solve those problems.

Erosion is as old as the land itself. It was erosion that carved the great canyons, the picturesque mesas, and most of the valleys and pleasant glens of the world. But this age-old process proceeding under the stabilization of a cover of vegetation—forest and grass and other forms of vegetation—was so slow that the soil was maintained in adequate depth for all natural purposes. We are not concerned about that slow natural process, but we are alarmed at the depredations of the enormously speeded-up erosion now taking place over millions of acres where Nature's protective cover has been cut down or plowed up or grazed to the grass roots. In my part of the country we frequently do not have to go beyond our front doors to see what man-induced erosion is—the erosion that has been accelerated by man's unwise treatment of the land, his destroying the mantle of vegetation that protects the soil.

The entire Nation, from Canada to Mexico and from the Pacific to the Atlantic, feels its effects also. Not until recently was very much known about the great damage done to the crop lands of America by man-caused erosion. True, millions knew something of how the canyons had been cut out by erosion. The outstanding, spectacular effects of the process were known, but the unnoticed type of erosion that affects even the slightly sloping lands in the highly cultivated regions was not generally understood to be a serious menace. Not until good land began to be scarce did the attention of the American draw itself to soil erosion and its control. A few soil scientists had studied the problem and had warned us of its consequences if not controlled. One of my friends over in the Department of Agriculture, Mr. H. H. Bennett, of the Soil Conservation Service, tells me that he argued for 25 years about the necessity of getting a program of soil-erosion control under way before anyone would pay very much attention to his ideas about the subject.

Let us look at the situation from a national standpoint. According to the Soil Conservation Service, there are 50,000,000 acres of erstwhile farm land that have been essentially ruined for further practical cultivation. Another 50,000,000 acres are in almost as deplorable a condition. Something like 100,000,000 additional acres, still largely in cultivation, have lost all or the greater part of the topsoil, with a direct decrease in crop yields that is appalling. It has been estimated that if the farm land already ravished and ruined by soil erosion could be divided into 60-acre farms, and restored to its former productiveness, it would easily support more than a million families. The destruction is going on at a rate of at least 300,000 acres each year, and the annual direct cost to the farmers of the Nation is estimated at not less than $400,000,000. Probably no nation or race has been more wasteful of its land than the United States; yet the land is the most indispensable asset of our country.

The problem is all the more serious when we realize that soil erosion affects not only the farmer and rancher but all of society as well. The water that is washed off the farmer's land carries with it his valuable topsoil—his principal capital. This waterborne soil—this debris of erosion—goes on into the streams and reservoirs and irrigation ditches, where it causes still further costly damage. The increased rate of run-off from eroded slopes, together with the clogging of stream channels, causes ever higher floods. The reservoirs that were built to hold water are being filled with mud washed out of the hills. The land of the Great Plains, formerly protected by grass, has been plowed up and worked until the soil became powdery, and now it blows across the continent in great duststorms. So you can see what an important problem erosion is, and why we are all so interested.

Today our land is far more depleted than the land of those who came before us. Today we are facing two major problems, both caused by soil erosion which set in after the vegetative cover was destroyed. One of those problems is that of the depletion of range lands. The other is the silting or filling up of our storage reservoirs.

The Government has spent millions in constructing great dams, such as the Elephant Butte Dam on the Rio Grande, the Coolidge Dam on the Gila River, the Roosevelt Dam on the Salt River, and the recently completed Boulder Dam on the Colorado. These investments are damaged at an alarming rate by the soil that washes into the reservoirs as the result of erosion from thousands of slopes up and down the watersheds. Instead of penetrating the soil, much more of the rainwater and melting snow run rapidly into the valleys and down the erosion-made channels, to be entirely wasted. This has led to the lowering of the water table and consequently reduced or destroyed the grazing values.

Although the ranges are sparsely populated, it has been estimated by specialists that the grazing value of numerous localities is less than half what it formerly was. If present conditions are permitted to continue, two-thirds of the people undoubtedly will be driven out of large sections of the Southwest, or even all of them from some of the worst eroded areas. The situation must be corrected, and without delay, otherwise there is no hope for those now living there.

Since those who live on the irrigated farms below the costly dams are also imperiled by the suicidal process of uncontrolled erosion the problem is even more acute. The water supply is being steadily diminished, and much of the water delivered to the farms is silt-laden, so that irrigation ditches are filled and must be cleaned out, and troublesome soil is piled up in the fields. The people below the dams are therefore at the mercy of those using the lands above the dams.

Obviously, therefore, erosion must be controlled over the watersheds draining into the water-storage reservoirs, from which the farmers below are dependent for irrigation. The ranges must be put on a sustained-yield basis. This depends upon the adjustment of livestock to the carrying capacity of the ranges—a condition which must some day be brought about if we are to survive. This job of controlling erosion on the ranges and of stopping the silting of the life-giving reservoirs is what the administration is attempting to do. The success of such work will depend largely, of course, upon the cooperation received by those using the land.

To my mind, the various pressing problems of our Nation are all interrelated: Our present problem of depressed farm prices arose out of overproduction, which, in turn, arose out of the plowing under of natural grazing areas and the use of inferior soil localities. The depleted soil and reduced yield and consequent misery of the people in those areas calls for resettlement on a businesslike basis on lands which are productive, water conservation in reservoirs and lakes by which the economic value of the water can be utilized, soil conservation through the adoption of scientific treatment for the soil. This in turn calls for the planting of soil-repleting crops, the retarding of waters of the little streams and arroyos so that they will flow less rapidly and not pour down in floods to menace the valleys below. These little dams and big dams holding back the valuable waters will constitute a nationally perfected plan of flood control. Lastly, it will reduce unemployment by utilizing those less fortunate members of our population in public labor of this type. Their self-respect will be maintained; they will be performing a laudable and necessary task and in addition they will be providing for themselves and families.

This story of erosion, its cause and results in the Southwest, can be summed up briefly like this: First, the land was partly or completely denuded by overgrazing; secondly, the rains ran rapidly down the slopes, carrying the soil with it into the Rio Grande, the Gila, and other streams; and, finally, we are left with the depleted soil, unable to support the population living thereon. It is an economic, moral, and patriotic obligation of the Nation, the State, the county, the community, and the individual to preserve our remaining areas of good farm land and grazing land, to restore vegetation to the land of the West, not only to provide needed forage for livestock but to protect our reservoirs and irrigation projects and to stop this new evil of disastrous blowing away of the priceless topsoil from our semiarid lands of the plains. I know of no effort before the Nation more worthy than the soil-conservation movement now getting under way through the Nation. The job certainly is one of great difficulty; time will be required to complete it, and it is going to cost us something. It is my belief, nevertheless, that it is a job which we have to perform, regardless of the difficulties, if this is to be a permanently prosperous Nation.

The Sahara and other desert areas of the world, which scientists tell us were once luxuriant, cultivated regions, and China's former forest area, now denuded and bare, are vivid examples of what happens when man disregards Nature's balance.

Let us hope that partisan minds, interested only with election returns, may not describe as boondoggling the administration's patriotic efforts for the conservation of national resources, human as well as natural, which involve in this particular instance the preservation of life-giving and wealth-producing soil with its many attendant benefits. This program is of great value to the Nation and must of necessity go on.

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION—ADDRESS BY SENATOR DAVIS

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, my attention has been attracted to an address delivered by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] at Pittsburgh on March 14, at a dinner given there in honor of the district attorney of Allegheny County, Pa., Mr. Andrew Park. The address is interesting, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In discussing the problems of work relief, I wish first to say that I have voted for it consistently. Work relief has been necessary to provide for those who have suffered because of the depression. My words should not be construed in any way as against the principle of work relief. I am now concerned chiefly with the way it is being administered.

Early in the present session of Congress I introduced a bill calling for the local administration of local work-relief projects. I am convinced that long-range administration of work-relief projects from Washington is inefficient, unsatisfactory, conducive of partisan politics, wrapped up in red tape, and incapable of meeting our present unemployment needs. My bill has been approved by most of the mayors and county commissioners of the State of Pennsylvania. It has not, however, been voted out of the Senate committee to which it was referred. Under these conditions I am now bringing this issue to the people of the Nation, because this is a national issue of major importance. I have confidence that, once informed on this subject, the American people have enough common sense to solve this problem. I believe that a thoroughgoing investigation of the W. P. A. will show the necessity for administration of local work-relief projects by regularly elected local governmental officials.

An appropriation of $1,200,000,000 from the unexpended balance of the work-relief fund, Federal money already in hand but not yet spent, would enable local officials to sponsor substantial construction projects, create jobs for the unemployed in their respective communities, create markets for materials and equipment necessary to carry out the program, thus starting the wheels of private industry, creating additional jobs in a normal and orderly manner. I need not say that $1,200,000,000 is a tremendous sum of money. Rightly expended and properly administered, it can do much to provide honest work, stimulate private industry, and solve our unemployment problems.

The administration of the work-relief program and funds by locally elected officials, irrespective of party affiliation, would save millions of dollars in the cost of overhead, wipe out partisan politics as the dominant factor in employing men, put an end to red tape and delay in getting projects under way and result in projects of a more substantial character.

The purpose of the Federal Government to provide relief for the unemployed has been clearly demonstrated. The chief difficulty has been that an attempt has been made to administer this program exclusively from Washington. Work-relief projects of a local nature cannot be satisfactorily administered by a central bureau in Washington. They must be administered locally.

Every effort should be made to stimulate private business and build up private pay rolls. This can be accomplished more effectively when there is a local coordination between relief administration and private business enterprise. It is impossible for Federal officials working in and out of Washington to meet local needs as satisfactorily as local officials who have to rub shoulders day by day with the taxpayers who foot the relief bill. Democratic processes of government are more responsive in small areas than in large ones.

It is generally agreed that the purpose of work relief was not to give employment to those who were already employed, or to provide larger salaries for those who already had jobs, or to serve as an instrument of political patronage. This viewpoint is held by all who voted for the $4,800,000,000 work-relief appropriation as a public-welfare measure. However, it now becomes apparent that the original professed purpose of work relief has been prostituted to serve the partisan political purposes of those to whom the administration of these measures have been entrusted. With the W. P. A. administered centrally from Washington as at present, I believe these abuses are inevitable and inherent in the system which by its very nature is unworkable, out of touch with local needs, and a bludgeon in the hands of those who thirst for power.

I had hoped that the bill which I introduced in the Senate calling for the local administration of local work-relief projects, would receive favorable consideration in view of the fact that it was a nonpartisan suggestion. In the speech which I gave in the Senate when I introduced this bill, I stated that its acceptance by the present administration would show the desire to regard work relief as a public-welfare measure and not as a political weapon. However, no action was taken on this bill. Therefore, I felt impelled to introduce a resolution in the Senate asking for a thorough investigation of the work-relief administration. The resolution reads as follows:

"Whereas it is impossible to obtain accurate information concerning the work being done by the Works Progress Administration; and

"Whereas no reports are available showing the names, number, or salaries of employees of such Administration; and

"Whereas the press and citizens of the United States are denied access to and refused official information concerning the employment and other records of such Administration; and

"Whereas many and varied charges have been made in reports published as to the work of such Administration and of the political appointees and employees thereof; and

"Whereas the Works Progress Administration is surrounded by an air of mystery and secrecy: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Committee on Executive Expenditures, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of the Works Progress Administration. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation."

When offering this resolution in the Senate, I stated that I had voted consistently for work relief, and that nothing which I should say should be construed to reflect upon the character of men and women on work relief. I expressed a desire to verify certain startling statements which had been made to me by responsible persons as to the number of political appointees serving as supervisors of W. P. A. projects in Pennsylvania, receiving salaries far above the average. I have not the names of these political appointees. If these appointments be in the interest of public welfare, I see no reason why they should not be available for newspaper publication and the public generally, as in the case of all other officials in the State of Pennsylvania.

I wish to state now as I said on the floor of the Senate that I do not desire the publication of the names of men and women on work relief whose income is in the lower brackets in accordance with prevailing wage standards. I know how difficult are the problems which face the ordinary worker in his attempt to make a dollar reach as far as possible. I am seeking information only about those who are collecting fancy salaries because of political appointments and those who seek to coerce workers to vote as they are told lest they lose their jobs.

Since I introduced my resolution I have been bombarded with information as to conditions in the W. P. A. I have detailed descriptions, accompanied by affidavits in some cases, of employment situations which are almost unbelievable because of the cruel way in which bread has been taken out of the mouths of hungry children for no other reason than that the father of the family refused to abandon his political convictions and hence lost his W. P. A. job. Practically all who have written me, with the exception of those who have sworn to affidavits, have asked that I make no specific mention of their names or situations for fear that they would lose their jobs. They may be sure that I shall keep faith with them and shall not make public their letters. This applies to all letters of this nature which I receive. But it must now be evident to every thoughtful person that these letters coming not alone from Pennsylvania but from all over the United States reveal a campaign of terrorism for political purposes which is unspeakably wicked and subversive of the most sacred principles of our American democracy.

In the light of these facts we are told that Mr. Harry Hopkins, Relief Administrator, orders investigations of his own bureau activities. If the situation were not so tragic, this would be humorous. No matter how good the intentions of Mr. Hopkins may be, and I am not questioning them, it is obviously impossible for any investigation which he may make to answer the crying need of an impartial Senate investigation of the entire W. P. A. at the earliest possible moment. I understand that Mr. Hopkins investigated the conduct of the chairman of the Indiana County Democratic committee of Pennsylvania asking a woman employee of the Emergency Relief staff for a contribution of $27 to the Democratic campaign committee as a token of her appreciation for the position she held. I understand that following this investigation Mr. Hopkins said that he could not be responsible for the actions of dumb politicians. This, of course, may sound explosive but it does not change the situation. It does make evident a pressing need for an early investigation of the Works Progress Administration.

One of my correspondents, whose name I cannot reveal, because he is an employee of the W. P. A. and I do not wish him to lose his job, writes me: "The conditions on the local W. P. A. work are most humiliating. Republicans are only placed in 'key' positions when Democrats are not available or through personal influence cultivated by sincere friendship or business association between a Democratic and a Republican leader, which is very rare. On all other occasions the Republicans are placed in 'minor' positions or 'demoted' to make room for a Democrat."

The same correspondent writes: "I am enclosing a letter that I received from David Lawrence, chairman of the Democratic State committee, to which was attached 24 subscription blanks for the new publication entitled 'We the People.' According to 'suggestions', I am to fill in the blanks and mail to Harrisburg with the $24 remittance." I wish to say that forced contributions to partisan newspapers or a political party cannot successfully be concealed today and will inevitably act as a boomerang on those who persist in these practices. Forced contributions to campaign funds are not in keeping with American principles. Political parties which resort to such tactics are soon discredited in the eyes of honest people. Of course, under pressure, some W. P. A. workers may say that they will vote the Democratic ticket but their votes may reveal an entirely different action on election day.

The present administration plan of the W. P. A. has done much to wreck the civil-service systems of our municipalities, the States, and the Nation. Competent men and women, long registered on civil-service lists, have remained unemployed while the positions which rightfully belong to them have been given to political favorites.

Thousands of good men, real executives, men of practical business experience, are walking the streets today when the entire Nation should be having the benefit of their ability. It is an intolerable situation when capable executives of this type go unemployed while the administrative positions in the W. P. A., which call for marked business ability, are given to those whose sole passport consists of political influence. Many white-collared executives are today unemployed. They have lost their homes through foreclosure, not through any inability of their own but solely because the business firms with which they were connected folded up when the storm of depression swept the country. These capable businessmen were the first ones who should have been summoned to give direction to work-relief projects at the very first call, irrespective of party affiliation. Today W. P. A. is still in swaddling clothes, with no promise of maturity, and yet these men remain unemployed.

We do not escape our responsibility to those who want work by declaring that we have too many white-collared workers. It would be just as plausible to say that we have too many bricklayers, plumbers, steamfitters, miners, farmers, and artisans generally. Our problem is to provide the necessary work. Suitable work for all qualified workers can be found no matter whether they wear white collars, blue collars, or no collars at all.

The poor quality of artificially made work on Government projects is often an insult to business intelligence. Moreover, it stands as a challenge to the imagination of American business executives. I do not say that we have too many workers. I do say that we shall make ourselves the laughingstock of the entire world—ridiculous in the face of history—if we do not speedily learn how to set ourselves to useful tasks.

In the face of the present unemployment situation it is amazing and almost unbelievable that the United States is importing steel from abroad. Imports of semifinished and finished steel products for the month of December 1935 amounted to 24,570 net tons. This would provide more than 1,000,000 man-work-hours. At the present time the operations of the iron and steel industry in the United States is but a little above 50 percent of capacity; 450,000 persons are now employed in the industry, which is slightly less than in 1928 and 1929. Imports of steel, however, are constantly increasing, having practically doubled in 1935 over 1934.

Another startling fact concerns the stoppage of work on work-relief projects in practically every State of the Union because of lack of skilled labor. If skilled labor is not recruited for these projects, they cannot be completed, and yet there are many skilled workers unemployed. Perhaps a partial explanation of this situation is found in the fact that work-relief jobs have been opened almost exclusively to those who have been placed on home relief rolls after having declared themselves entirely destitute. Many skilled workers have objected to a system whereby this is the only way to get a job. This is a tragic situation. It stands condemned by the American Association of Social Workers, who have advocated that the public-works program be entirely divorced from the assistance program of home relief.

No discussion of unemployment problems could leave out of account the fact that 6,000,000 citizens of other countries are holding jobs in this country.

The facts are as follows: In this country there are over 14,000,000 persons who were born abroad. Of this number it is estimated 7,000,000 have not been naturalized. It has been charged on the floor of Congress—I am of the opinion that the estimate is too high—that more than 1,000,000 of these are in this country illegally. Of our 7,000,000 alien residents, 1,500,000 are on relief, costing the taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars annually.

This is a problem which we cannot refuse to face. It is now apparent to everyone that this large number of illegal aliens now holding jobs in this country deprive American and legally admitted alien citizens of these jobs, and this in itself accounts for a major share of our burden of unemployment. We have more unemployed in the United States than in all the countries of Europe combined. No other nation acts on the policy which we have adopted. We are paying the work-relief bill not only of our own country but of the other nations as well.

Added to this we suffer losses because of our foreign-trade policy. Last year we imported millions of dollars' worth of foreign food products, while at the same time we were paying our farmers to plow under and create a scarcity of various agricultural items. Go into the leading groceries of New York today and you will find English hams, Irish bacon, Polish sausage, and New Zealand butter. I am not advocating that we abandon foreign trade. Foreign trade is necessary, but I insist that we have no right to buy from abroad products which compete unfairly with American products, thus defeating American agriculture and industry and adding millions to our unemployed. During 1935 more than one-fourth of the food and agricultural products which we consume here were produced and paid for abroad. This does not include the $180,000,000 which we paid for coffee, tea, and cocoa.

When relief was first set up, 9 out of every 10 people who accepted it wanted work rather than a dole. A large majority of them want work today, although there are some people who, having learned how they can eat without work, will never work again. That is indeed an unspeakable tragedy. When men go to battle some are killed, and some come back home wounded and permanently disabled. This terrible war of depression which we have been fighting has killed some, and there are many others who have been permanently crippled in mind and body.

But the large majority of the working people of this country want work just as they always have. This is the sovereign right of every able-bodied man—the right to work—and we have no business planning to establish a system of society where the right of the worker to work is taken away from him. I well remember back 40 years ago when for a dollar a day I trudged back and forth from South Pittsburgh to Highland Park to do duty with a pick and shovel. Even a dry lunch at noon tasted mighty good those days, and the habit of working has clung to me all my life. Honest work means health and self-respect as well as wages for the worker. This is the right of the worker, and if I know the working men and women of this country, they are going to claim that right and will not be satisfied with anything less than honest jobs, honest work, and honest wages.

THE AMERICAN HOME MARKET—ADDRESS BY SECRETARY WALLACE

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, on last Monday the Honorable Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, before a meeting of farmers at University of Nebraska, Lincoln, Nebr., delivered an address which I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The United States has long been proud of its home market, as the broadest and wealthiest single market for goods in the world. The achievement of this great, undivided market was not an accident. Since 1787, no idea has been more precious to the American people than the idea of a nation undivided in its economic and political life. The statesmen of 1787 had got their stomachs full of sectional and State warfare along economic lines. Under the Articles of Confederation, States could set up tariffs and issue money by themselves. New York could and did put a duty on firewood from Connecticut and cabbages from Pennsylvania. The whole thing resulted in confusion. The framers of the Constitution erased these State economic barriers and conceived a government which would insure national economic unity for all time.

The United States grew to continent-wide size, and still this idea of a country without economic or social barriers of any kind remained our most precious heritage. No single concept so distinguished the United States from older countries as this vision of a great area of land, hospitable to all races and classes, uninterrupted by political or economic barriers. The concept was so precious that it was considered worth the sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of lives during the Civil War to preserve it.

Sectional and selfish interests from time to time have tried to break down or whittle away this idea of economic unity and interdependence. Industrial sections have tried to increase their advantages at the expense of agricultural sections, and vice versa. One class has tried to stir up jealousies of other classes and to put across the idea that prosperity for itself could be advanced if other classes had fewer benefits. Some sections or classes have benefited for a time at the expense of other sections or classes, but never for long. During the 1920's, some industrial leaders began to think that industry could remain prosperous in spite of, or perhaps even because of, low prices and income to farmers, but this idea was exploded with the general depression of the 1930's. Since 1932, the Nation has returned with greater conviction than ever to the idea of balanced and interdependent welfare of all sections and classes.

This precious idea of Nation-wide economic unity has, I repeat, given the home market of the United States a place of tremendous importance in our economic thinking and practices. We have properly striven to make the most of this rich, free, continent-wide market to the end of increasing and protecting the American standard of living.

There has been one difficulty, however, in working out equably the ideal of the preeminence of our home market. While industry looked almost entirely to the domestic market, agriculture has had to look in considerable part to the foreign market. Industry has asked and obtained high protection for its goods in the home market, while agriculture, even if it wanted and got such protection on paper, could get very little benefit from it except temporarily following a year of unusually bad weather. Industry, too, succeeded in obtaining great advantage from the corporate form of organization as a means of exploiting its markets more efficiently while agriculture in its very nature could make little use of this mighty instrument.

Agriculture, I insist, has a right to some equivalent to the tariff and the corporate form of organization as used by industry, and I believe that to give agriculture such an equivalent is in the best interests of the Nation. Let me assure you that I shall not cease to work for such an equivalent to be made available to agriculture.

We know what we are talking about when we demand equality for agriculture with respect to the tariff. Since 1920, farmers' troubles have largely been the result of difficulties growing out of their unprotected export position. The collapse of the war market, coupled with a high industrial tariff policy and great foreign indebtedness to the United States, and coincident with a shift on the farms from animal to tractor power, left farmers with some 50,000,000 excess acres under cultivation. The products of these acres could no longer be sold profitably abroad, and piling up at home, they smashed prices for the home market as well. No adequate effort was made to meet this situation prior to 1933. Since 1933 the Government has grappled with the task of helping farmers to make the needed adjustment. This aim has been to adjust exportable surpluses to demand, and thus to keep those surpluses from weakening the home market as well as the foreign market. Surely no reasonable person, believing in the American ideal of a high standard of living, could deny the right of agriculture to a program which would put it on a level with industry in being able to participate in the benefits of the home market. And in the face of declining foreign markets, this could be done only by adjusting exportable surpluses to actual export opportunities.

Difficulties with the farm export situation have continued. Many nations have felt it necessary to adopt nationalistic policies, setting up quotas, embargoes, domestic subsidies, and the like on farm products. Through its high-tariff policy, the United States has been guilty with other nations of making international trade difficult. In our case, there has been little excuse for this policy, since we are now not a debtor nation but a creditor nation, and we need to enable foreign nations to send us goods to pay their debts and pay for our exports. Recently a beginning has been made through reciprocal-trade agreements toward increased foreign trade, and I should like to say right here that farmers more than any other group have the most to gain through this policy if wisely carried out. The progress, however, has necessarily been slow. In view of continuing difficulties in international trade, many Americans have lost faith in expansion of the foreign market as a way to renewed prosperity. They believe we should concentrate on the home market instead. Many of them are suggesting that agriculture as well as industry take the nationalistic view, that the time has come for the United States to become self-sufficient in every way possible.

It is entirely reasonable that farmers should want to make the most of our great home market. In a time of troubled international conditions, we may well sympathize with those who shrink from the risks and difficulties of foreign trade. The question remains, however, how can farmers really make the most of the domestic market?

A number of answers are being suggested at this time. I will mention them briefly first, and then discuss each one at more length. Some people, observing the increase in farm imports during the last 2 years, are saying that the thing to do is cut out all imports of farm products that can possibly be grown in this country. Give the American farmer exclusive right to his home market, they suggest, even if it means an embargo on all competitive imports. Nationalism for the farmer, they say, is the way to farm prosperity.

Another suggestion is that we set up a two-price system with no production control and sell the export part of our crops at low prices abroad and the domestic part at a higher price at home, with the Government or the farmers themselves absorbing the difference.

Other people have another suggestion. They point to the traditional ingenuity of American industry in developing new industrial products and methods, and they say, "Encourage new industrial uses for American farm products, and we won't have to worry about foreign markets or domestic surpluses." They present maps and charts showing the acreage that would be needed to produce for these new industries providing that they can be successfully launched.

There is undoubtedly a great deal of sincerity in the support behind all these suggestions. Certainly no plan that holds any real possibility for increased markets and income to farmers is to be neglected. Let us examine the proposals I have mentioned.

What about imports? Are farm imports serious? Have they damaged the domestic market and domestic prices? What is the relationship between farm imports and farm prosperity? Would farmers benefit if, by high tariffs or an embargo, we cut out all imports of those products which farmers themselves can produce? How much, in short, could farmers gain if the country adopted a nationalistic policy toward agriculture—not just keeping the status quo, but going all the way to 100 percent nationalism?

First, let us look at the record of farm imports during the last year or two. The Department of Commerce records that during 1935, we imported a total of $1,100,000,000 worth of products which are classed as agricultural. This is a large sum, though a good deal less than the 10-year average of one and two-thirds billion dollars or the 20-year average of one and three-fourths billion. In 1929 we imported over $2,000,000,000 worth of agricultural products, and in 1920, nearly three and one-half billion dollars' worth. The 1935 total, like the other figures, included of course coffee, rubber, raw silk, tea, cocoa, spices, and bananas, all of which American farmers do not produce at all.

These products amounted to nearly one-third of the total, or about $334,000,000 worth. Occasionally some persons who raise an alarm about farm imports cite figures which include these tropical products. They neglect to identify them, and hence create an impression that farmers are being hurt instead of merely being supplied with coffee, tea, and rubber. Until the American people decide to forego coffee and tea, and until they are ready to pay three or four times as much for domestically produced rubber made from goldenrod or guayule in place of the tropical product, these noncompetitive imports will not, I think, become a controversial issue. This being a campaign year, however, almost anything can happen.

Taking out these items then, there is left some $600,000,000 worth of agricultural products imported in 1935 which were partly or wholly competitive. The largest item in this total is sugar, amounting to $133,000,000. We are supporting the sugar industry in this country with a high protective tariff. Likewise, high duties protect producers in the United States against the imports of many other items, such as wool and some of the oils.

The increased imports in the competitive list, including those items on which we have high protective duties, are partly on account of the improvement in the purchasing power of consumers in the United States, resulting in a return toward normal in the importation of items that we regularly imported before the depression. The most important single factor in the increased importation of many items, however, has been the drought of 1934.

I need not recall to this audience the seriousness of that drought. Suffice it to say, it was the worst drought in our history. It caused a reduction in our total feed supply, compared with normal, of some 50,000,000 tons, or about one-half. The corn crop alone was cut down by a billion bushels. The adjustments in corn and wheat acreage through the A. A. A. were negligible in comparison with the reduction due to the drought, and so far as feeds were concerned, these adjustments actually helped to improve the situation.

Those of you here today who had to buy feed at that time to carry your livestock through the emergency surely would not have chosen to bar out imports of these commodities which you yourselves needed. Yet those who now raise their hands in horror at the tables showing farm imports in 1935 invariably include these feedstuffs in their shocking figures, and they conveniently fail to mention that farmers were helped and not injured by the fact that moderate amounts of such products came in over the tariff wall.

Indeed, it is surprising that in the 18 months from July 1934 to December 1935, during which time the drought shortage was most felt, feed imports represented only about 7 percent of the drought reduction.

All of these imports, of course, paid the usual tariff duties—25 cents a bushel for corn, 16 cents a bushel for oats, 10 percent ad valorem for wheat unfit for human consumption, and so on. Only in the case of hay was the duty removed. But this free entry applied only to hay brought into the drought-affected area at the urgent request of farmers in the Northwest. The North Dakota Legislature, by the way, asked for removal of the duty on feed grains as well, but this was not considered necessary and the request was not granted.

The peak of imports caused by the drought was reached last year, the time varying with different products, depending on when the new crops were harvested. Since then, imports have greatly receded, and are now practically normal for most products. Imports of oats have been negligible since May 1935. Imports of corn have rapidly receded since last November; in March of this year they were 66 percent less than the same month last year. While rye tariffs are proportionately lower than tariffs on other grains, rye imports have been insignificant since August. Imports of butter reached their peak in the late winter of 1935; in the last half of the year they amounted to only a little over a million pounds, which is below the 10-year average. Imports of wheat have continued into 1936, because the drought shortage was not made up by our 1935 spring-wheat crop, which was greatly reduced both in quantity and quality by serious rust damage. The bulk of present wheat imports is hard spring wheat, brought in to meet our domestic requirements for this type of wheat. These wheat imports, of course, pay the usual duty of 42 cents a bushel.

One might go on to show the extremely small size of farm imports, even in the face of the terrible drought of 1934, as compared with our normal production. It is truly surprising that twice the worst drought since the Civil War should result in imports of corn representing only about 2 percent of our average production; wheat, a little over 3 percent; beef, including canned beef, 3 percent of average slaughter; pork, one-tenth of 1 percent of average production; and butter, 1 percent.

The main facts to bear in mind, however, is that these increased imports were due to an absolutely unprecedented situation. I suppose the same situation is not likely to occur in the same degree for another 100 years, unless our climate is changing drastically. There is simply no point in viewing the farm imports of 1935, which were caused by the drought of 1934, as reflecting a normal situation facing the American farmer.

Of course, if one wants to compare the situation in 1935 with the situation in 1932, some rather striking facts can be brought out. Certainly imports were low in 1932; farm imports as well as industrial imports, in fact, were the lowest in a generation. When you start down near zero you can work up to some very handsome percentages, and this goes for other things as well as imports—farm prices and farm income, for example.

This leads us to consider the relationship between farm imports and prices and between farm imports and farm income. When farm prices drop following a period when imports have been coming in, it is sometimes thought that the imports caused the decline in domestic prices. This is almost never the case. When the price of oats dropped last summer the decline was not caused by the imports which previously had come in. It was caused by the sudden increase of domestic supplies with the harvesting of the new oats crop. Imports of oats amounted to less than 1 percent of normal production. Obviously their influence on the supply-and-demand situation affecting the domestic price was negligible compared to the coming in of a new crop of near normal size.

The same relationship holds true for other commodities, whether corn, wheat, beef, or butter. Imports are called in, over the tariff, by unusually high domestic prices, and to keep on attracting imports the price has to remain high. The tariff is really working for the farmer during such a situation.

But what about the tariff and its usefulness to farmers during a year like 1932? Well, in that year imports certainly were kept out, if that's the main thing we want. Imports of corn were 400,000 bushels, an amount which could be produced on a fraction of a Nebraska corn county. But corn was selling for as low as 10 and even 5 cents a bushel in Nebraska, and of what use was the 25-cent tariff on corn then? Wheat sold for 28 cents in Nebraska, and of what use was the 42-cent tariff in that situation? Butter sold as low as 14 cents, while being "protected" by a 14-cent tariff. Hogs sold for $3 a hundred and less, and of what use was the $2 tariff?

In 1935, following a year of extreme drought, it is true that some imports came in. But farmers also were receiving an average of 58 cents for corn, a dollar for wheat, over $10 for beef, $8 for hogs, over 30 cents for butter. Cash farm income stepped up from less than four and one-half billion dollars in 1932 to almost $7,000,000,000 in 1935. Back in 1932 I believe farmers would gladly have let in a few imports if at the same time they could have increased their cash income by 60 percent.

Whether the tariff for any farm product is at exactly the right point is another question. When there is excessive protection, so that prices rise to very high points, the result, of course, is either reduction in consumption or the coming in of more producers and eventual overproduction, so that the benefit is only temporary. The $2 tariff on sugar hurt the sugarbeet farmers in the continental United States by expanding production in Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines. But in view of the hold the tariff system has in this country, and in view of the fact that sweeping downward adjustments in industrial rates cannot be made suddenly without causing dislocations in industry and consequent injury, I feel that moderate protection for agriculture, so that an unusual situation may be taken care of without undue harm to consumers, is a reasonable policy. Any protection ought to be applied equally to both agriculture and industry and in such a way as not to harm those branches of agriculture which have long been in the export market.

But even for those farm commodities on which import duties can help farmers at times, the tariff method as a solution for the problem of producers of those commodities is extremely unwieldy. Under our form of government it involves a great number of agencies and interests and cannot be used as promptly and efficiently as farmers might wish to meet a given situation. This cumbersomeness of method is one of the prices which we must pay for the privilege of having a democratic system.

The tariff question on farm products comes down to this. For most American farmers 90 percent of the time the farm tariff does not mean a thing either way. During the other 10 percent of the time, following unusual weather, the tariff works as shown by the coming in of a few imports, and it means farmers are getting good prices for their products.

The real question is not whether we want a tariff for farm products; we already have one. The real question is, Are farmers going to accept the high-tariff idea as a cure-all for agriculture?

If they do, I tell you frankly farmers are going to be sold down the river again. Need I remind you how often in the past American farmers were sold down the river on this tariff issue? All through the twenties farmers asked for a real program for agriculture, a program that would enable them to meet the situation of surplus acres following the war. And what did they get? They got high tariffs. That is, the industrialists dominating the Government gave agriculture whatever ineffective and meaningless tariff increases they thought necessary to induce the farmers to stand for stiff and effective boosts in industrial tariffs. The result was that agriculture was not helped but harmed. Farmers had to buy in a protected market and sell in an unprotected one. Again and again a real program for agriculture was shelved, and farmers got this fake one instead. We came down to 1932, with surpluses three times the normal amount, corn at 10 cents, hogs at $2, wheat at 30 cents, and what did our tariffs mean then?

The kind of program that farmers and those of us who were working for farmers' interests wanted was one that would really make the tariff work for agriculture. Farmers wanted a program that would protect their home market from the price-smashing weight of surpluses that could not be sold either here or abroad. They wanted an equivalent to industry's tariff. In 1933, I think they got at least a start toward the kind of program they really wanted, with adjustments in acreage financed by processing taxes that were somewhat the equivalent of industry's tariff. They began to see their way to a balanced relationship with industry, so that agriculture as well as industry might obtain just benefit from the home market. Though the processing taxes have been taken away from farmers, I think they are not going to stop fighting for a real program for agriculture.

The high protective tariff is not agriculture's baby; it is industry's baby. If industry is to keep its high tariff, farmers want equivalent help, but they can get it only by protecting themselves from excessive exportable surpluses. And no high tariff, or even an embargo will do that.

By all means, let us make the most of the home market. But I want you to think seriously about the fact that farmers have more to lose through nationalistic policies than any other group. In the present year, 1936, farmers are cultivating probably thirty-five to forty-five million acres that are going to produce things which will be sold abroad. The most additional land they could use by cutting out imports would be perhaps 10 million acres. It just wouldn't be good sense to risk having to leave thirty-five or forty-five million acres idle in order to try to gain a market for 10 million acres. I don't think farmers are foolish enough to trade dollars for quarters, no matter how strong the pressure may be by those who are busy grinding their own axes.

The situation caused by the drought of 1934 is now pretty well over, although the effect of the drought on livestock marketings will be felt for another year. Imports brought about by the situation are receding and will soon be back to normal. With normal producing weather this year and next, extraordinary things could happen to supplies and prices of farm products. This is the central farm problem, and I am confident that farmers will not be misled by side issues, but are resolved to deal with the central problem through a real farm program.

We don't want to give up our remaining foreign markets—rather, we should like to see those markets improved—but we are all anxious that great surpluses of exportable farm products are not going to wreck the domestic market in the future.

To take care of this situation, some are suggesting that we discard all checks upon production and adopt a two-price system, or export bounty, which would be a straight subsidy of production. This, they believe, would enable farmers to send surpluses abroad at lower prices, while selling the domestic part of the crop at home at higher prices.

I believe this plan can work for a given commodity when certain foreign conditions are favorable and for a short time. In 1933, we were able to promote the sale of a quantity of wheat in this manner. However, as a long-time policy applied on a large scale, the dual-price or export-subsidy system would be certain to bring more grief than benefit to farmers and to the Nation, particularly if the system were used in place of some sort of control over production. If the export market should be underwritten in this manner, it would surely bring into production an increasing acreage of the commodity affected. Increasing production would mean increased export surpluses which in turn would require higher and higher subsidies to maintain price. Finally, it would result in the economic insanity of virtually giving away to foreign nations a large part of our wealth and soil fertility—very much as we gave away our crops and our soil fertility during the 1920's by lending to foreign countries money which they could not repay. I don't think we want to return to that kind of insanity. The pain of heavy surpluses and low prices when the thing finally crashes is too great.

Besides, it is extremely probable that we could not get rid of huge surpluses in this manner, no matter how big the subsidy, especially if at the same time we refused to accept imports. And, in passing, let me call your attention to the fact that many of those who argue for an export bounty are also vociferous advocates of embargoing imports. Other countries do not want to accept our products if we will not accept some of theirs. They are able to put up trade barriers overnight to keep out any of our products that they do not want to accept. Let us face the fact that the use of export subsidies by the nations of the world is really international price cutting. It is a form of cutthroat competition which ruins everybody if it is carried far enough. The only kind of international trade which is worth anything, on a large scale and in the long run, is the kind which trades goods and services for goods and services.

We do want to increase in every sane way possible the chance to sell more farm products abroad. And, by the way, it is worth mentioning here that the trend in exports of cotton and tobacco is once more upward, both of these being products less affected by the drought than other export products. As supplies of wheat and pork and other export products increase with normal weather, we should regain a part of our foreign trade in these products, too; the situation is far from hopeless.

Of course, to sell abroad we must buy abroad. We ought to buy particularly more industrial products on which tariffs now are so high as virtually to create domestic monopolies. It seems to me that farmers interested in the tariff situation, if they really want to work for a more intelligent arrangement that would react to their benefit, might well look into our tariffs on aluminum, electrical equipment, chemicals and dyes, and certain other industrial products. They will be interested, I think, in following the results of the resolution recently adopted by the Senate which, while asking for data on A. A. A. benefit payments over $10,000, also requests the Tariff Commission for data on the benefits obtained by corporations from the tariff on such industrial products as these.

The real tariff issue, so far as farmers are concerned, it seems to me, lies in the question of monopolistic privileges enjoyed by some corporations and groups of corporations shielded from competition by a tariff wall. The use of tariffs by such interests hurts farmers in two ways. It helps to cut them off from markets for their products abroad, and it makes them pay higher prices for the things they buy at home.

As you know, efforts are being made by the State Department to work out better foreign-trade conditions through the reciprocal trade agreement policy. I have been interested to see just how this new approach might compare with the old approach of congressional tariff making. My conclusion, on the basis of what has been done to date, is that it is a much fairer approach, from the standpoint of agriculture at least, than the old logrolling method. In the new approach careful and painstaking study is made of each and every item on which it is proposed to reduce our import duty. This study takes into account the significance and effects of any duty reduction from a national point of view as well as from the standpoint of the particular industry involved. Under the old approach the height of the duties on particular items was determined primarily by relative political strength and bargaining skill of the various contending interests. In such a set-up it is evident that agriculture is at a great disadvantage from the start since most of the major branches of agriculture are, in general, on an export basis or so close to it that they are not in a position, under ordinary weather conditions, to benefit from increased import duties.

I believe that agriculture has obtained real benefits through the reciprocal trade agreement policy. Though temporary adjustments may need to be made by certain producers, I believe that farmers as a whole have very much to gain from the policy. However, I can assure you that wherever it seems to me that farmers as a whole are not getting a square deal in proposed trade agreements. I hope to be the first to point that out and seek for a remedy.

Among other suggestions for bettering the market of farm products is that of encouraging greater industrial use of farm products. This is a program which any friend of the farmer wants to encourage in every way possible. Industry, of course, is a big customer of the farmer even now. It buys more than 40 percent of its raw materials from the farmer today. It buys cotton for making clothes, it buys tobacco, it buys some of our corn for starch, for sirup, and other products, it buys a certain amount of soybean oil for paints, varnishes, and other industrial uses. The Department of Agriculture has long been experimenting in new industrial uses for farm products and has made important discoveries in this field. The Department, in cooperation with experiment stations of the leading Corn Belt States, has recently established a soybean industrial utilization laboratory at Urbana, Ill. It is also supplying funds for experiments in the use of cotton in road building. It will continue to explore such possibilities, I hope, with even increased facilities. Mr. Chester Davis was engaged in exploring the possibility of blending of corn-made alcohol with gasoline just before he took up his duties with the A. A. A., and he has continued an alert interest in the subject. I, myself, as a farm editor in 1932, sought to stimulate interest in this particular plan. I believe that no avenue should be left unexplored that may add to the uses of farm products and the wealth of the American people.

I am sure that farmers welcome the interest of industrialists in this experimental work. Time and money spent by them in opening up new uses for agricultural products is a fine contribution to the general welfare. However, I believe that this industrial-use program is not in itself a solution to the farm problem. Experimental activities are slow; something may come of this this year, or next year, or maybe in 10 or 20 years. I do not think we should rely exclusively on the possibility of a sudden industrial discovery opening up the need for the products of 30 or 40 million acres as a solution to the farm problem overnight. Here again it is a question of putting first things first. I do not want to belittle industrial experiments, but I do want to be sure that American farmers count no chickens before they are hatched.

Grim experience has taught agriculture the necessity to be realistic about the problem of achieving and maintaining the home market for its products. A healthy market here among the 125 millions of our own people is the farmers' first consideration. Nothing could be more vital to them than that. It is so vital that farmers have learned to apply the test of practicability to all the new proposals touching the problem.

Applying this test, farmers have learned that they themselves and the industries directly dependent upon agriculture comprise a large part of the home market. They now know that nothing is gained but everything is lost by extreme tariff measures, which in the name of protecting the home market, actually bring retaliatory amputation of our export outlets. They know this backs up farm products at home, wrecks American farm prices, cripples farm buying power and instead of building up the home market actually ruins it.

Having applied the test of practicability to the suggested alternatives, I think we may fairly classify into two main groups the workable measures to permit agriculture to make the most of the home market.

The first of these two groups of measures includes those designed directly to maintain a balanced agricultural supply situation in this country, to avoid piling up price-breaking surpluses, and to substitute sound and economic land use for exploitative methods which exhaust the agricultural plant.

The second of the two groups, bearing on the demand side of agriculture's problem, includes those measures designed directly to build up and maintain the purchasing power of the people of the towns and cities.

I have already touched upon measures comprising the first group. Farmers know a great deal about them. They understood the functions of the Agricultural Adjustment programs. These functions included reducing surpluses, restoring balance to supply, raising farm prices and helping to restore a home market to American industry. I believe most of them understand that the reciprocal-trade agreements are part of the general effort to remove barriers to international commerce, to revive world trade, reopen foreign outlets for farm products and improve supply conditions for our basic farm crops.

In the present agricultural-conservation program of the A. A. A., farmers are making another approach to the supply problem, although from a long-time as well as an immediate point of view. Farmers know that the reasons for ruthless exploitation of soil have often been economic—that under pressure of extreme supply and price fluctuations they have been alternately forced by ruinously low returns and induced by boom conditions to mine and sell soil fertility, or to expand the farm plant by turning under millions of acres of grass lands which should have remained in sod. I believe that farmers understand the public and private importance of stabilizing production, stabilizing prices, and of maintaining the productivity of farm land for years to come.

I think they also appreciate that, while the A. A. A. conservation program will be of immediate help in stabilizing supplies, still the program is not a direct production-control measure. It is well fitted to present needs, because the drought helped to dissipate surpluses. But farmers know that normal weather would bring surplus problems again, and will look forward to utilizing the method which the Supreme Court left open to them. The year 1938 is sure to see an interesting experimental effort by farmers to meet their supply problem through cooperation of the States. The Supreme Court did not abolish the farm surplus problem, nor did agriculture's interest in a balanced supply situation evaporate with the Hoosac Mills decision. But farmers were forced to look forward to using the method of cooperating through the States that the Court has left open to them. Agriculure will fight against recurrence of the surplus condition that ruined farmers in 1932.

I spoke of a second great group of measures available to protect and increase agriculture's stake in the home market. These measures include those which bear heavily upon the demand side of the farm problem. They comprise all those means by which this country is attempting to extend buying power to vast groups of our citizens who now have little or no buying power.

I wonder if the farmers have an adequate appreciation of the size of the market which could be opened to them in this country if the 10 or 11 millions of our people who now are unemployed were working, had incomes, and could become buyers of the goods of farm and factory. Besides the jobless, vast numbers of others have incomes so low or so uncertain that they can buy only meagerly.

The great problem of an industrial nation is to find methods which will assure distribution of the fruits of industry back to the masses of workers. Mass producing industries can function steadily and successfully only on a basis of mass consumption. Otherwise goods pile up, purchasing power becomes concentrated in a few hands, and civilization is shaken by recurrent plagues of unemployment and depression.

Our people have not yet solved this crucial problem of distribution. They are not expecting that a utopian solution will materialize from nowhere overnight. But the terrifying experiences of 1932 convinced them that the time has come to make serious and constructive efforts in that direction. In 1933, our Government undertook to cope with the problem before it was too late.

There is not time here to recite details about all the Federal measures which have sought to distribute purchasing power among masses of people who had none in 1932. People hungry or starving for want of money to buy food were placed on relief rolls, and surplus farm commodities were distributed among them. Increase in employment has been sought through public works, stimulation of home building, and through encouraging resumption of industrial activity by lending. Other labor and social-security measures have sought to replace the children and the aged in industry with able-bodied and mature people out of jobs, and to increase and maintain workers' income. Agencies have been set up to protect the savings of the people from being drawn into the hands of speculators by sale of shaky securities. And right now Congress is considering tax reforms which will encourage redistribution of profits among the people through wages and dividends.

Admitting frankly that such efforts as these will need modifying and improvement, and that the degree of future reliance upon them will wane or grow from time to time as activity in industry rises or declines, still it is clear that they serve a tremendously important function.

Such measures use some of the technique successfully employed by the A. A. A. We know that revival of the purchasing power of 30 million farming population has resulted in great improvement in activity and employment in a good many industries.

Farmers should be quick to appreciate the significance for themselves of the converse of that situation. For them, the successful revival of industrial activity, the distribution of the products of industry among the masses of the people, the protection of the people's savings, and the stabilization of employment mean a healthy and growing home market for the products of the farm.

Gains have already been made in this direction. I have often indicated the importance of this factor in current farm improvement. A year ago, in my annual report to the President, I said that with prices then at a relatively high level, due to the improved supply situation, further improvement in farm income would have to come chiefly from improved industrial activity and better buying power among city workers. Such improved purchasing power has come about, not so rapidly as we would like, but fast enough to have effects exceeding our expectations. National income, exclusive of agricultural income, was higher in March than for any month since the third quarter of 1931.

During the first 3 months of 1936, farm income from the sale of products was over a billion and a half dollars, an increase of 20 percent over the income for January, February, and March of 1935, not including benefit payments. The recession in farm income and rural retail business that followed the Hoosac Mills decision has been succeeded by new gains as farm confidence has been restored, as benefit payments have been resumed, and the price situation has been strengthened. This increase in farm income came about not through increased prices, but through the ability of consumers to absorb a larger amount of farm products at a reasonable price through increased purchasing power. Even so, the improvement in farm income was about twice as great as the improvement in consumers' income. This was due in part to the fact that farmers receive approximately half of the consumer's dollar spent for food, so that when a consumer benefits from 10 percent more income the increased expenditure on food, if it all goes to the producer, means a 20-percent increase in the receipts of farmers.

I have pointed out before how very closely the trend of income to farmers follows the trend of factory pay rolls in the cities. In the case of dairy and livestock products, the income of consumers and what they spend for these products follow an almost identical trend. Both reached a low point in 1932, and both had increased by approximately one-third by the beginning of 1936. The same general rule holds, though with variations, for other farm products. Now that factory pay rolls and consumer purchasing power are increasing, farmers are benefiting in a rather striking way, since the margin taken out by middlemen tends to remain fairly constant, and additional consumer expenditure therefore goes quite largely to the producer.

Now, I think we can all see where the real hope of attaining and maintaining a great home market for American agriculture actually lies. It lies in keeping a healthy farm supply situation; in opening and keeping open the channels of international trade, so that surpluses of our great basic commodities will not back up on the farm; it lies in conservation of soil resources by sound production of sufficient supplies, not in the waste of these resources by reckless production of price-breaking surpluses.

On the demand side, agriculture's interests are served by building up the home market. Agriculture benefits from increased industrial activity and from measures designed to put purchasing power in the hands of the large numbers of people who still have almost none. This is agriculture's great stake in the national welfare.

What agriculture wants is customers with money to buy the products of the farm. For we all know that farmers with large quantities of stuff which they can't sell for want of customers with money, may be nearly as poor as people who need that stuff badly but who can't buy it. We all remember the milk strikes in the Middle West at a time when millions of city people needed milk and butter. Their need of itself didn't help dairy farmers because it could not then become a real market demand for dairy products. Agricultural markets are much improved since the farm strikes of 1933. We want more improvement such as we have already had in the South's demand for dairy products and in the North's demand for cotton.

We want to have a chance to sell the products of those three additional million acres which could be used, on a basis of improved wage scales and employment, by New York City's potential customers of agriculture. Think of the home market farmers might have if the distribution system were improved to give buying power to the millions of people who now have little or none. Such considerations are a hundred times more important than imports as a factor in broadening agriculture's home market.

Of course there are some rich and powerful interests in this country which reject and obstruct every Government undertaking, whether it falls in the first or the second group of measures I have named.

These people fought the Agricultural Adjustment programs first in Congress and then in the courts. They have created subsidized organizations pretending to speak for the farmers in opposition to the farmers' adjustment and conservation programs, and to talk up regimentation, imports, chemical salvation, or anything else that happened to come in handy in their efforts to arouse the farmers, or persuade the country that the farmers were aroused against measures which, for reasons of their own, these interests disliked.

The attacks on agriculture's programs have been accompanied by assaults directed against every effort of the Government to provide relief, create employment, and spread buying power among more people. The technique already familiar to farmers has been used in creating and subsidizing organizations to speak, in the name of liberty, or Constitution, or independence, or Republic, but always to speak for those interests which are fighting the Government's reemployment, relief, and recovery efforts.

The welfare of American agriculture is inseparably linked with the national welfare. The long depression that beset agriculture in the decade of the twenties was an important factor in the national depression of the thirties.

Agricultural improvement from 1933 to 1936 has made an important contribution to national economic recovery. Conversely, the Government's employment and other measures for industrial revival have helped in the improvement of the domestic demand for farm products.

The interests which fight against the farmers' programs are really striking a blow also against industry's markets. Those which fight industrial reemployment and recovery measures are striking a blow at the farmers' home market, and retarding the development of that market to its full potentiality.

The outlook for agriculture is bright. But keeping it so will depend upon maintaining the present healthy supply situation, reopening further the channels of world trade, conserving the fertility of the farm plant, and developing the latent home market. This last can only come from increasing the buying power of the large groups of people who now have little or nothing to exchange for goods. To give them employment and earning power is a problem challenging the best leadership and the sincerest thought of industry, of agriculture, and of government.

To meet this challenge we need more than ever the spirit of interdependence and unity in which our Nation was founded. Without this spirit we will be defeated by selfish pressure groups and narrow legalisms. With it we can go forward to new national achievements securely founded on the general welfare.

REGULATION OF TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, an editorial appearing in the New York Post of Tuesday, April 21, forcefully calls attention to the action of an employers' association which is actively advocating adoption of certain regulatory measures for the textile industry which are contained in the National Textile Act introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman ELLENBOGEN.

It is probably of some historical importance to note the declaration of one organization of businessmen supporting those legislative principles which are essential to natural economic recovery. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Post of Apr. 21, 1936]

WONDERS NEVER CEASE

Can business prosper by pulling down labor standards? It cannot. Is a certain measure of Government supervision a help or a hindrance to business? A help.

At least that's the opinion of the National Federation of Textiles, Inc., expressed by its president, Peter Van Horn. The federation is the trade association of the silk and rayon industry. It joins textile labor organizations in calling for enactment of the Ellenbogen bill to establish a little N. R. A. in the textile industry.

The federation hasn't suddenly gone altruistic. It isn't talking through its hat. It made a survey of what happened in 100 silk and rayon mills after the Supreme Court threw out N. R. A.

Hours of work were increased 13 percent. Employment was cut 13 percent. Wages were reduced 5 percent. Production was stepped up 30 percent.

Did that spell prosperity?

On the contrary Mr. Van Horn says that prices fell 5 to 7 percent and sales increased only 9 percent. The difference between that 9 percent increase in sales and the 30 percent increase in production raised the specter of new overproduction, further declines in employment, renewed deflation, more shrinkage in sales—the whole vicious pre-N. R. A. circle all over again.

So the federation wants the Ellenbogen bill. It speaks not the language of the past, but of the future. Its president talks of a 35-hour week as a desirable reform. He points to the estimated $67,000,000 increase in purchasing power if a $13-a-week minimum is established for a 35-hour week. He says that 100,000 new jobs can be created and that the cost of maintaining 100,000 unemployed will thereby be saved to the taxpayer.

All this to the federation means stabilization of its market, an end of cutthroat competition, and some protection against unfair practices.

It sounds strange in a time of unrestrained and often irrational attack on the New Deal to hear businessmen acknowledge some of its basic principles.

The silk and rayon industry may be the first, but we hope it won't be the last to do so.

Business is waking up to the fact that in order to have a market it must maintain purchasing power and that to maintain purchasing power a certain measure of Government supervision over minimum wages and maximum hours is necessary.

LINCOLN, THE IDEAL PROGRESSIVE—ADDRESS BY DR. JOHN WESLEY HILL

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, February 12, 1936, before the Los Angeles Lincoln Club, Dr. John Wesley Hill, chancellor of the Lincoln Memorial University, Cumberland Gap, Tenn., delivered an inspiring address on the subject of Lincoln, the Ideal Progressive. I ask unanimous consent to have Dr. Hill's address printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Toastmaster and friends, in my last conversation with Uncle Joe Cannon I asked the retiring Congressman about his religious faith. Jerking a stogy from his lips and exuding a column of smoke from his vocal chimney, he exclaimed: "I believe that when God Almighty organized this big corporation known as Humanity and capitalized it, He became responsible for the maintenance of its parity, and I'll be hanged if I part with my holdings in a panic!"

That was the gospel of St. Joseph.

It was likewise the gospel of Father Abraham, who in a letter to his friend Joshua Speed, written amidst the political problems and prognostications of 1860, said: "My text just now is 'Stand still and see the salvation of God!'"

If Lincoln were here today, he would reaffirm the inscription on our coin, "In God we trust", and emblazon it on our economic sky, knowing that the slogan stamped there was so sacred that even the versatile Robert G. Ingersoll suddenly turned orthodox and declared, "A dollar is not worth the paper it is written on if it cannot take the witness stand and swear 'I know that my Redeemer liveth.'"

This confession of faith is still our most precious patrimony.

If we neglect this inheritance, it will fall into alien hands.

The representatives of agitation and revolution are attempting to appropriate it.

There are over 200 revolutionary publications continually invoking the words of Lincoln in justification of their un-Americanism.

Lincoln, anticipating this distortion, said: "If I should die tomorrow, my obscurity alone would protect my principles from distortion."

That prophecy is fulfilled today in shameful misuse of Lincoln's name, in fragmentary and mutilated quotations of his words, in misapplication of his principles, in grotesque imitations of his democracy, in demagogic strutting in his livery, and in shocking perversions of his character.

The hour is opportune for a Lincoln renaissance, a revival of his letters, a return to the principles for which he lived and died, the integrity of the Constitution, equality before the law, religious tolerance, racial amity, industrial and social justice, sound money, a "lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations", national preparedness, and the solution of every problem "With malice toward none and charity for all, and with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right."

There is nothing Utopian or obsolete in these articles of faith. They are instinct with life, applicable today and adaptable through all time because truth is timeless, not irridescent baubles of political vacuity, nor preambulatory advertisements of political nostrums, but a body of faith, built upon the cornerstone of law, rather than tumult, expediency, or passion!

Lincoln was a constructive progressive; destruction had no place in his creed. His was a forward-looking program. He was not a dreamer nor a haloed illusionist.

He knew the difference between progress and motion.

The little boy on his hobby horse imagines he is making a two-ten record, when he is only wearing out the carpet. That is not progress but friction.

Lincoln was neither a reactionary nor a revolutionary. The reactionary would worship the devil on account of his antiquity; the revolutionary wearies of God because of His eternity.

Lincoln stood midway between the extremes.

In his address before the Historical Society of Connecticut, Charles A. Dana said, speaking of Lincoln: "He was never a step too late nor a step too soon."

If he were here today, he would not be a stand-patter but a steady-stepper.

Lincoln's progress was not in experiment, but by experience!

A surgeon advised his patient that an immediate operation was necessary.

The patient pled for time, insisting upon knowing whether the operation would be a success. "Certainly it will be a success", said the surgeon. "How do you know?" asked the patient. "Because", replied the doctor, "I always save 1 out of every 10, and the other 9 are dead!"

Lincoln knew how to bide his time.

He remembered the little couplet, "He who plants a seed beneath the sod, and waits to see it mount above the clod, he trusts in God!"

"A man", said Lincoln, "watches his pear tree day by day, impatient for the ripening of the fruit. Let him attempt to force the process, and he will spoil both fruit and tree, but let him patiently wait, and the ripened pear will at last fall into his lap."

Lincoln did not attempt to rebuild the world overnight. He built upon history; he likewise believed in posterity. If he were here today, he would plan for the protection of posterity from the unescapable burden of taxation awaiting future generations. In his zeal for the "forgotten man", he would not neglect the unborn.

To the radicals of his day, he said: "You are united in your determination to break with the past, but you are utterly divided among yourselves as to where you are going. You remind me of the little steamboat on the Sangamon, which had a boiler 3 feet long and a whistle 5 feet high, and every time it whistled it stopped. It exhausted its power in noise."

Lincoln did not mistake noise for growth, nor phosphorescence for illumination.

For a steady light a tallow dip makes a better light than a skyrocket.

Reason was the lamp by which he was guided. He was not controlled by impulse.

The impulsive man is the little chap who runs a private wire from the depths of his vacuity to the peak of his egotism, and because it is so high, he thinks he is talking with God, when he is only soliloquizing. Lincoln was not a soliloquist, but a syllogist.

If he were here today, he would make haste slowly! He would think problems out. He would not mistake a cerebral concussion for an idea! He would not be most undecided when he had made up his mind.

He would not mistake revolution for evolution!

He said, "Revolutionize through the ballot box", and again, "He would sooner have the fowl by hatching the egg than by smashing it."

To a committee from the Working Men's Association of New York, he said, "The strongest bond of sympathy outside the family relation should be one uniting all working people, nor should this lead to a war upon property, or the owners of property. Let not him who is houseless pull down the house of another, but let him labor diligently and build one for himself, thus by example assuring himself that his own will be safe from violence when built."

Lincoln had no room for Marxianism in his political philosophy.

Socialism is not reform.

Robert Hunter, the placid philosopher of Marxianism, in his book entitled "Socialists at Work", says, "No reforms satisfy them. Their ideals and aims are beyond any immediate attainment, and national, State, and municipal ownership, social insurance, the demolition of slums, the abolition of child labor, the reduction of hours of toil, receive scant approval from Socialists for the reason that socialism is not a reform, but a revolution."

When, therefore, it is proposed to transfer property from private to public ownership, the credulous devotees of this obnoxious doctrine are ignorant of the fact that this revolutionary program includes land, mines, tools of industry, the home, the school, the sanctuary, and the most sacred institutions of civilization.

Government ownership may be a capitivating program to the ignorant and indigent who feel that it is the duty of government to feed them; but to the thrifty and self-reliant who understand that government derives its rights and resources from the governed, and that its function is to protect these rights, the doctrine of the dole is abhorrent.

It is State slavery built upon the principle that the citizen is the ward of the State, thrusting its meddlesome nose into the most sacred rights and relations of the citizen, subjecting him to its belittling and bedeviling espionage.

No less authority than the versatile H. G. Wells declares that: "Socialism is the State family, and just as privately owned utilities must be changed from private to public ownership, so the home, which is an institution of private property, must be transformed into public ownership, resulting in a widely extended communism."

Ah, the secret is out! The socialistic scorpion carries its sting in its tail.

The widely extended communism advocated by Wells is the promiscuous sexuality acclaimed by Lenin and Stalin.

Marriage is no longer a sacrament but a sacrilege. The home is scrapped and the cradle is transformed into a bolshevistic eugenic incubator.

Against this proposed nationalization of the home, its scientific mating, eugenic breeding, and moral degradation, Lincoln directs every power and passion of his head and heart! "The home", he declared, "is the cornerstone of our civilization", and recalling the scenes of his childhood in his cabin home, he exclaimed: "All that I am, or ever hope to be, I owe to my angel mother. I remember her prayers. They have clung to me all of my life."

In the midst of the bewildering problems of the Civil War, he said: "I am driven to my knees over and over again because I have nowhere else to go."

In a letter commending his dying father to the mercy of God, writing to his stepbrother, he said: "Tell father to put his trust in God. He notes the sparrow's fall, and numbers the hairs of our heads, and will not forget the dying man who puts his trust in Him."

Compare these sublime sentiments with the licentious doctrines of the Communist manifesto, and the putrid preachments of Stalin and his retained assassins.

Lincoln believed in individual initiative, freedom of conscience, and worship, the bill of rights, and representative democracy. He would not clothe Government with paternalistic functions. To Lincoln there was no twilight zone between public and private ownership. He boldly declared: "The legitimate object of Government is to do for a community of people whatever they need to have done, but cannot do at all, or cannot do so well in their separate or individual capacities. In all that people can individually do for themselves the Government ought not to interfere."

The wisdom of this utterance is seen in the debacle of every Government venture in the field of paternalism, notably Government control of the railways during the World War, which left the railroads in the condition of the old pawnbroker on the Bowery, who, having accidentally swallowed a dollar, threw up his hands in excitement and exclaimed: "I am a dollar in and a dollar out, and I cannot balance my books."

And the books are still unbalanced!

Upon the institution of private property civilization rests.

It has seen order and organization supplant savagery, anarchy, and disorder; freedom repress tyranny, and the principle established that a man's "home is his castle", and cannot be invaded except by due process of law.

"If there is any one thing", Lincoln insisted, "which can be proved to be the will of Heaven by external nature around us, without reference to revelation, it is the proposition that whatever a man earns with his hands, and by the sweat of his brow, he shall have the right to enjoy in peace."

When a man can no longer say of that which he has acquired through sweat of brain or brawn: "This is my own", when he becomes a nonproductive parasitical consumer, the mainspring of civilization snaps, incentive to progress ceases, life becomes a game of grab, and men will be reduced to beasts of prey.

The hour is at hand, therefore, for a reapplication of the principles which are fundamental to our national life: The Constitution without mutilation; liberty without license; equality without uniformity; prosperity without monopoly; ownership without communism; government without bureaucracy; patriotism without demagogism; business without regimentation; and progress without revolution.

The iconoclast has done his work, the burblers have exhausted their noise.

The hour for the builder has arrived!

We are surfeited with experimental legislation! "All kinds of twisting and turning done here" is the magic sign over the door of the new order of political prestidigitators!

The time is ripe for a return to sanity. Lincoln said: "True views are better than new views." Bills of lading should take priority over bills of legislation.

The Government should not make the fashion plate of the French milliner its model. That artistic genius goes into seclusion at the close of the season, and by some process of integral calculus, or special spectrum analysis discovers that changing styles cost our American ladies million of dollars for the shape of a crown, the color of a ribbon, or the attitude of a feather.

Business should not be regulated by political fashion plates.

It should not turn upon the attitude of a Government commission, the contortions of a shadow-dancing "brain truster", or a socialistic somnambulist.

Prosperity cannot be built upon the caprice of the moment; it cannot thrive in the dark.

Blind alleys are poor terminal stations for transcontinental systems.

Business should not be kept on the witness stand indefinitely.

If our Government is to continue as the embodiment of representative democracy, if it is to maintain constitutional authority, we must avoid everything that savors of bureaucracy, draw a line of demarcation between government by commission and government by constitution, and develop our national resources, genius, industry, and institutions through that personal initiative, private capital, sense of justice, and love of liberty as far removed from paternalism upon the one hand as it is from democracy upon the other.

Government by commission is headed toward despotism. It is only a matter of time when it arrives.

Bureaucracy is only another name for stagnation. Stagnation is the final step to damnation.

There are such bewildering contradictions between State and National commissions that business is frequently in the position of the two prospectors on the western plains in the early days.

They saw a buffalo bull charging upon them and fled for safety, one of them springing into a cave as the infuriated beast went by. Then the man in the cave jumped out and the bull rushed back, the man jumped in and the bull rushed by. The man in the tree shouted: "You infernal fool, while you are in the cave, why don't you stay there?" To which the man below answered: "What the dickens do you know about this cave? There is a bear in here!"

Between the bull and the bear of State and Federal regulations there has been naught for business but to jump in and out, backward and forward, in a vain attempt to escape the penalties of conflicting tribunals.

Constitutional government was the desideratum of Lincoln's statesmanship. He would not tolerate a dictator. Early in his career he depicted the dictator as one who "with towering ambition disdains a beaten path and thirsts and burns for distinction." He said: "When we as a people lose the genius of our own intelligence we become the fit subjects of the first cunning usurper arising among us."

In the midst of the chaos and confusion of world reconstruction, where militarism masquerades in the garments of peace; internationalism in the role of humanitarianism; preparedness is laughed to scorn by professional pacifists, and revolution stalks in the name of progress, we need to hear again the words of Lincoln: "I insist", said he, "if there is anything which it is the duty of the whole American people to revere and not to entrust to any hands but their own, that thing is the preservation and perpetuity of their own liberties and institutions."

Prior to this warning sounded by Lincoln, Washington warned us against "Entangling alliances with the Old World."

It was in our infancy that this advice was given, when our population along the seaboard was sparse, democracy was still on trial, the problem of self-government had not been solved, the American eagle had not been hatched. Today conditions are different, where Uncle Sam sits is the head of the table.

In our infancy, we were proud of our little antiexpansion bib and persisted in separation from the Old World, and living our own life. In the meantime, we continued to grow until the little antiexpansion bib looked like a cotton patch on the front of our blue uniform.

When the Maine blew up our bib was blown to tatters and America suddenly became a world power.

And now what do we propose to do with this power, utilize it as a monkey playing with a razor, dissipate it in muddling around without chart or compass, and permitting our institutions to perish, our flag to float at half mast, and our glorious heritage to suffer destruction through our failure to heed the words of Lincoln, when he warned us against "entrusting to other hands the preservation and perpetuity of our own liberties and institutions"?

Lincoln was not an isolationist. He recognized our accountability to the world. He saw beyond the Civil War a new era of democracy, the soul of which should be projected everywhere, and he would not tolerate the thought of provincialism.

His dream for America and the world was a "just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations", but he would recognize no international banner. He would not tolerate the red flag! He would not hang the American flag beneath the flag of the League of Nations.

His was not a program of self-surrendered rights and policies, the transfer of the power to declare war from Congress to an alien court, the submission of the Monroe Doctrine, our immigration policy, or any other question vital to our rights to a league of nations, but peace at home and "with all nations", characterized by such strength toward the strong and gentleness toward the weak that the world must recognize the source of our power in our devotion to justice, love of liberty, and consecration to humanity.

Standing for these ideals today at home and abroad, possessed of the greatest physical basis for an enduring empire the world has ever known; orphaned of the solemn instinct of antiquity; yet compensated in area for all that we lack in age; environed with mountains of silver and gold; boundless in resource, illimitable in energy and enterprise, a continental empire, threaded with a thousand lines of trade and commerce; a land of Edens and El Doradoes, it is not for us to carry our flag at half mast in any crisis, nor to surrender to dismay in the hour of darkness before the dawn.

Defeatism is not in our national vocabulary.

No, it is for us to develop that economic and spiritual supremacy, that faith in God and humanity, that courage to meet the greatest obstacles, and to face the greatest tasks unawed and unafraid, to meet it in a spirit worthy the ideals, institutions, and ancestry of which we boast.

Yes, worthy the immortal Lincoln, who, when Sumter had been fired upon, and the Nation itself was threatened with destruction, when the rock beneath his feet, called the Government, was turning into shifting sands, with faith incapable of bewilderment, took up his pen and wrote in his first message to Congress in 1861: "Having chosen our course without guile, and with a pure purpose, let us renew our trust in God, and go forward with manly hearts."

Brothers, the Lincolnian slogan for the hour is "Forward! Forward with manly hearts!"

THE TRADE AGREEMENTS PROGRAM AND WORLD PEACE—ADDRESS BY HENRY F. GRADY

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Mr. Henry F. Grady, Chief of the Division of Trade Agreements, Department of State, before the annual meeting of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, at the Chase Hotel, St. Louis, Mo., May 2, 1936. The address is entitled "The Trade Agreements Program and World Peace." I feel that the address is of so much value that I should like to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am confident that the members of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, who have worked long and earnestly for peace, readily appreciate the bearing of the Government's present commercial policy upon international cooperation and good will.

It must be evident to all that peace and prosperity go hand in hand. The periods of greatest economic development in the history of the United States have been periods of good times at home and of flourishing international trade. Periods of great depression accompanied by an agitation for higher economic protection follow wars and have in them the seeds of future wars. Economic nationalism, self-sufficiency, autarchy, or buy-American campaigns—by whatever name it is called—is not new to us today. It is high protectionism developed into a new and extreme form.

Tariffs in themselves are not a cause of war. They make possible to a certain extent some control over our national economic development, but when they become instruments of national self-sufficiency and are used to obstruct and divert the natural courses of world trade, they lead to commercial warfare and unfriendly relations among nations.

Some persons believe that economic nationalism is the only basis upon which the prosperity of the United States may be restored and that our tariffs should be greatly increased and that our imports should be further restricted. Such a belief is for the most part based upon confused thinking and a lack of an understanding of the fundamental nature of trade. A comprehension of even the elementary principles of political economy should make clear to a reasonable person that national self-sufficiency leads to unemployment, a lower standard of living, and international friction.

Those who seek to convert the United States to a policy of national self-sufficiency do not appreciate the vital importance of our export trade to the economic well-being of the country in general. They point out that our exports account for only 10 percent, or even less, of our total production. They argue, therefore, that the volume of foreign trade could be substantially reduced without resulting in a dislocation of our domestic economy. Such persons fail to realize, however, not only that the 10 percent may represent the difference between profit and loss in many industries but that such an average is often misleading.

This average of 10 percent obscures the fact that foreign markets are especially important to many of our basic industries upon which the prosperity of the country is to a great extent dependent. For example, in 1929 our export trade absorbed nearly 55 percent of the cotton produced in this country, over 40 percent of the tobacco, 33 percent of the lard, 18 percent of the wheat, 30 percent of the office appliances, 28 percent of the printing machinery, 30 percent of the sewing machines, 25 percent of the agricultural implements and machinery, and 14 percent of the automobiles. Many of these industries are large consumers of raw materials and semimanufactured articles domestically produced. For instance, preliminary statistics issued by the automobile industry indicate that in 1935 that industry alone consumed 77 percent of the plate glass produced in the United States, 75 percent of the rubber manufactures, 39 percent of the lead, 33 percent of the nickel, 23 percent of the steel and iron, 22 percent of the copper, 20 percent of the tin, 16 percent of the aluminum, 15 percent of the zinc, and 8 percent of the hardwood lumber.

Trade, in the last analysis, consists in an exchange of goods or services for mutual benefit. This is true of international trade as well as of domestic trade. Payment for merchandise sold abroad may be made in gold or with credit for a time, but eventually goods and services must pay for goods and services; in other words, imports must in the long run pay for exports. If prosperity is in a large measure dependent upon export trade, it is therefore no less dependent upon import trade.

A large percentage of our imports consists of noncompetitive goods, products which complement rather than compete with domestic products. Many of them could not be produced here at all; others might be produced, but not on an economical basis. Their production would result in a decrease in the productivity of labor and capital and an increase in the cost of living to consumers. The range of imports which we cannot produce at home efficiently or at all and which do not compete to an appreciable extent with domestic products can be enlarged.

I may point out that Federal Reserve bank indices, covering a 16-year period from 1919 to 1935, show a close correlation between imports and employment. When imports have increased, employment, and to a great extent wages, have increased, and, on the other hand, when imports have decreased, wages and employment have decreased. I do not mean to imply, of course, that imports are directly a major factor in the creation of employment, although, as a matter of fact, it has been estimated that about four-fifths of our imports, three-fifths consisting of crude materials and foodstuffs, and one-fifth of semimanufactures, require the employment of American labor in being transformed into marketable products. I do mean to point out, however, that better times and employment accompany increased activity in international trade.

If our foreign trade which absorbs the surplus resulting from and necessary to the high level of our agricultural and industrial productivity should be cut off, what would the result be? Not only the workers directly engaged in export industries, but also those who indirectly produce for export markets would join the ranks of the unemployed. Furthermore, factories relying upon imported materials for production would have to close down, adding further to economic distress and unemployment. Without cargoes our ships would lie idle, and enterprises closely affiliated with foreign trade, such as banking, marine insurance, warehousing, and transportation would be seriously affected. The domestic market would be glutted with goods intended for foreign consumers. Prices would drop, purchasing power would shrink, business would stagnate. A great depression would settle upon us from which there would be no recovery, for economic activity would be reduced permanently to a lower level. This would be the price of economic nationalism.

The evils of economic nationalism are visited not only upon those countries which choose to be self-sufficient. The import barriers raised by the countries desiring economic isolation are a disrupting factor in world trade in general. The other countries, being thus deprived of foreign markets, must seek new markets elsewhere with the result that competition in international commerce is increased, and prices become depressed. As a result of the decline in world trade, the countries which have neither desired nor sought to become economically isolated find themselves so isolated nevertheless. Such conditions of world depression result in a desperate struggle among nations to grasp what foreign markets remain. Each country seeks special treatment of its commerce by the other. Those countries which are discriminated against by a regime of special privilege find their world markets further limited. They retaliate with discriminatory restrictions. Thus, economic nationalism imposes a strain on international good will. It leads to commercial warfare and finally, in all likelihood, to armed conflict. The competition in import restrictions is as dangerous to world peace as is the rivalry in military armaments. There must be economic disarmament if future wars are to be prevented. Peace and prosperity are hardly possible under conditions of aggressive economic nationalism.

Nations—much like human beings or other members of the animal kingdom in this respect—are motivated by considerations of self-preservation. They will fight for their existence. Prosperity is a condition under which the economic opportunities for existence are freely offered. In our highly integrated civilization no one country possesses within its borders all the resources necessary to modern existence, but by the development of the resources that it has it is able to produce goods for other countries in exchange for the raw materials, foodstuffs, or manufactures which it needs. War may be resorted to, of course, to gain control over resources which are needed at home, but aside from that means, the creation of purchasing power abroad by the development of foreign markets offers for the most part the only opportunity today for obtaining food and materials with which a country may not be adequately equipped or able to produce domestically. A country which is deprived of its foreign markets faces as serious a problem as one whose most valuable natural resources have been seized by force of arms. The very existence of modern civilization is based upon the institution of international trade. When that trade is restricted to an unreasonable degree or diverted into artificial channels by a regime of special privilege and discrimination, and when the means of a nation's livelihood is thereby threatened, the peace of the world is endangered.

The question is, then, How may the barriers to trade be reduced and international commerce be restored upon a fair and equitable basis?

The Government of the United States has taken the lead toward the rehabilitation of world trade as a result of the passage of the Trade Agreements Act of June 12, 1934.

The trade-agreements program, which was instituted by that act, has two objectives: First, the restoration and expansion of international trade by means of reciprocal reductions of trade barriers and, second, the securing of equality and opportunity for American goods in foreign markets. The program seeks to develop trade on the basis of most-favored-nation treatment.

The unconditional most-favored-nation principle is opposed to the system of preference and special advantage. Simply stated, the principle is this: Any favor granted to one country is extended unconditionally and automatically to all countries which likewise extend to us any favors which are granted to third countries. Thus we receive the same kind of treatment we give. In other words, we do unto other countries as we would have them do unto us. This is the golden rule of international relations.

Under the Trade Agreements Act, announcements of intention to negotiate have been made with respect to 18 countries, and agreements have been concluded with 12 of those countries. There are four agreements with European countries, namely, Belgium, Sweden, Switzerland, and the Kingdom of the Netherlands; seven with Latin American Republics, namely, Cuba, Brazil, Haiti, Colombia, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Guatemala; and one with our neighbor, Canada, which is our second most important customer and second most important source of imports. All of the 12 agreements concluded, except three, namely, those with Colombia, Nicaragua, and Guatemala will be proclaimed when they have received the legislative approval of the Governments of Nicaragua and Guatemala, respectively, and will come into force 30 days after their proclamation.

The trade agreement with Canada, which came into force on January 1, 1936, stands out as one of the major achievements of the trade-agreements program with respect to the number of concessions and the volume of trade involved. Canada undertakes, in this agreement, to accord to the United States the most favorable tariff treatment accorded to any non-British country.

The importance of such an undertaking cannot be measured by mere statistics of trade. It marks a revolution in the trade relations between the two countries. It means that Canada has adopted with respect to the United States the policy of nondiscrimination which we are seeking to advance in the interest of peace and prosperity.

To review in detail the many concessions which have been obtained in the trade agreements thus far concluded with a view to restoring and expanding our international commerce would require more time than is at my disposal. Such information, in carefully tabulated form is, however, available to anyone upon request. In brief, the 12 agreements which have thus far been concluded provide for the reduction of foreign duties on a long list of our export commodities, increases in quotas for American products, the removal or lowering of various types of restrictive taxes, the binding of certain existing duties against increase, and of certain existing quotas against reduction, and the assurance of most-favored-nation treatment of American commerce.

Regardless of the great amount of consideration which is given in tariff bargaining to the welfare of individual industries and the various regions of production, the purpose in view, which is never lost sight of, is the prosperity of the country as a whole. That prosperity is dependent upon the revival and development of international trade in which all countries are offered an opportunity to participate upon an equal basis. This is not possible, however, without conditions of peace. On the other hand, peace is not possible in our modern civilization unless world trade is allowed to grow and nations are offered an equal opportunity to participate in that trade.

Secretary Hull has said of the trade-agreements program, "Our program is essentially an effort to substitute the instruments of commercial peace for those of commercial warfare and thus to provide an important element in the maintenance of peace itself." A program which has for its purpose the gradual lowering of excessive barriers to trade and the establishment of commercial relations upon a nondiscriminatory basis is surely a step in the direction of international good will and world peace.

THE BATTLE OF SAN JACINTO—ADDRESS BY G. A. HILL, JR.

MR. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present for incorporation in the RECORD an address delivered in connection with the centennial celebration of the Battle of San Jacinto, by George A. Hill, Jr., of Houston, Tex., on April 15, 1936.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the Kiwanis Club, I am deeply sensible to the honor that you do me in inviting me to address you upon the eve of the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the Battle of San Jacinto. By heritage, by environment, and by long and appreciative contemplation, that occasion has sustained in me for many years a feeling of heightened pride of lineage, of race, and of country, and in the institutions of Anglo-Saxon freedom preserved by that epochal and heroic conflict.

With the Declaration of Independence at Washington on the Brazos on March 2, 1836, the colonists of Texas sealed their doom or their salvation. The swift march of events and an onrushing and conquering enemy made their action imperative—and the siege of the Alamo made all hope of a peaceful solution vanish. By action of the convention, Sam Houston was made the commander in chief of the army of Texas—a veritably nonexistent entity, and he proceeded at once, with an escort of three men, to Gonzales to recruit, equip, train, and maneuver his prospective command in such fashion as to serve his twofold purpose, viz:

First. To cover the flight of the women and children, the sick and the aged, and the official personnel of the Government before the armies of the destroying invaders; and Second. To organize a strategic retreat, under the delay of which he might hope to deceive and divide the enemy, and develop an effective fighting force, capable of achieving victory whenever a fortuitous opportunity could be contrived.

The annihilation of the defenders of the Alamo on March 6, and the massacre at Goliad on March 27, spread terror and consternation, and Houston's retreat from Gonzales began, largely composed of an army of striplings of the average age of 20, from which there were defections and additions while marching to San Felipe de Austin, but which army numbered 783 on the fateful day at San Jacinto.

You will remember the burning of San Felipe, upon Houston's retreat; the delays on the Colorado and the Brazos; and the indescribable hardships from cold, rain, hunger, swollen streams, and sickness; also the arrival on Buffalo Bayou, opposite Harrisburg, on the day following the burning of the town by General Santa Anna, as he hurried on to Morgans Point in pursuit of President Burnet who had evacuated Harrisburg with his government none too soon. These events were replete with incidents marked by superb courage, inflexible purpose, heroic suffering, and uncanny vision, for indeed, the "Runaway Scrape", as the exodus of the civilians was called, had enjoyed the protection of Houston's retreating army, and Santa Anna's belief that the Texans were in full flight to Louisiana had caused him to mistake Houston's strength and purpose and to divide his own armies.

When Houston arrived at Harrisburg he comprehended Santa Anna's predicament. After providing for his sick and exhorting his troops to renewed efforts he followed Santa Anna's course as far as the Lynchburg Ferry, realizing that Santa Anna would have to return there from his camp at Morgans Point to effect a crossing, and that Houston's army could confront him there. Santa Anna, believing it to be Houston's purpose to also cross at Lynchburg in his supposed flight, and desiring to prevent this, hurried to Lynchburg to make his encampment and await reinforcements.

On the afternoon of April 20 there was skirmishing and brief but desultory firing, and Santa Anna's reinforcements under General Cos arrived during the night.

On the morning of the 21st Houston literally and figuratively burned his bridges. He sent Deaf Smith to destroy the bridge over Vinces Bayou, the only avenue of escape for either army, and then restrained his forces until midafternoon for the attack.

The remainder is history—unprecedented and imperishable!

Seven hundred and eighty-three Texans launched an attack upon the armies of Santa Anna and Cos, totaling 1,500 men, and in 18 minutes killed 638, wounded 208, and captured 738 in a devastating defeat and rout of the Mexican forces that, in its awesome finality, crushed and forever removed tyrannical sovereignty over Texas, achieved the independence of the Republic of Texas, made Santa Anna captive, and launched the movement for the territorial expansion of the United States and its constitutional Government unrivaled in the history of our country, and eventually added many millions of square miles to the area of the United States.

The attack of the Texans was like the scourge of holy wrath.

Its scorching fire was but one burst of avenging flame from the crucible of despotism into which had been poured the compound of a vicious tyranny, a stupid absolutism, a broken faith, and the excessive cruelties of insensate massacres by the unwanted masters of the Mexican people—they themselves the mere pawns of Santa Anna's ruthless dictatorship.

And so, with the coming of peace and the establishment of a beneficent government, the people of Texas progressed upon their way, enjoying the blessings of a bountiful nature and its yielding to the arts and the crafts and the sciences, until those who loved and revered its history realized that its priceless benefits might be lost if its people forgot how painfully and perilously such liberties were purchased.

And so it was that, as the years went on, only relatively few of our people realized the tremendous portent of the sufferings, the privations, the heroism, and the achievements of their pioneer forefathers and the glorious pages of history written in the lives and exploits of those who fought for and founded the Texas Republic—and a scant little band, from year to year, reviewed and revived the lessons of our history and, for its worth as a permanent lesson in patriotism, made countless pilgrimages to the battlefield of San Jacinto and urged its purchase and preservation by our State.

After 61 long years the efforts of this faithful band of pioneers and their descendants secured, in 1897, during Governor Culberson's administration, a legislative appropriation of $10,000 for the purchase of the battlefield. The newspapers of that day—40 years ago—record their meetings, their historical recollections, their hopes and plans.

I exhibit to you a photograph then taken of Capt. James Converse's ship upon which the veterans were taken to the battlefield, and I am having passed among those present a reproduction of the newspaper accounts of the meetings of the veterans, and their recollections of the battle, and their identification of landmarks on the battlefield, just prior to its purchase by the San Jacinto Commission appointed by Governor Culberson. From all of this, you will sense their aspiration for a worthy monument on the site of the battlefield, and their joy in its acquisition by the State, and their hope for what we are now upon the threshold of experiencing in worthy celebration and suitable recognition.

The great field Mass of the Catholic Church, commemorating a century of civil and religious liberty; the dedicatory and commemorative exercises of the great Masonic orders; the patriotic program of the Sons and Daughters of the Republic; and of the San Jacinto Centennial Association; the generous action of the State and Federal Governments—all of this is a fruition those blessed souls would have loved to live for.

My grandfather, James Monroe Hill, who was a veteran of the battle, and the chairman of the San Jacinto Commission, who purchased the battlefield for the State, in his letter of thanks on May 7, 1897, to the Governor and the legislature, was truly prophetic of this happy day, and with your indulgence, I shall conclude my remarks with a quotation from his letter:

"What character of man would withhold gratitude to his ancestry, or the placing of a shaft bearing evidence of the place of their interment? What character of man can today accept, by inheritance, the grand privileges wrought by those men on that sacred spot, and be so devoid of patriotism that he would withhold his support to commemorate such a glorious event? (Thank God, but few such men live in our State.)

"We have an abiding faith that you will see that the good work which you have so graciously commenced shall receive due consideration by succeeding bodies."

CONSERVATION AND CITIZENSHIP—ADDRESS BY HARRY G. VAVRA

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able address delivered by Mr. Harry G. Vavra, national president of the Educational Conservation Society, on April 4, 1936.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On behalf of the American Conservation Week Committee, comprising various Government agencies charged with the protection of natural resources in their respective States, I extend greetings to you on the occasion of National Conservation Week.

It is altogether fitting and proper that this occasion is being observed with appropriate ceremonies in schools, churches, museums, parks, and other places throughout the country.

It is our duty to give adequate attention to the conservation of natural and human resources in order to protect ourselves from floods, droughts, dust storms, forest fires, and pollution.

Conservation in its present-day sense is not merely preservation or hoarding of natural or other resources, but means rather their careful, well-considered use, with the avoidance of waste and prodigality and with a due consideration of their exhaustibility, or the difficulties of their replacement. The proper practice of conservation may in many cases involve the obligation to take what measures are possible to replace what we consume or, more correctly, to enable the processes of nature to replace it.

The effective and continued practice of conservation is a patriotic obligation of the most important kind. The future responsibility and greatness of our Nation will largely depend on the extent and efficiency with which we carry out its principles during the present generation.

The idea that we can waste and prodigally consume important and valuable resources without regard to the future, and that "some substitute will be found when they are gone", is one of the most prevalent and most criminally stupid of the ideas that are held at the present day. It is the idea of the spendthrift who is running through his inheritance.

While the human race will no doubt accomplish many things in the future that we have not yet been able to do, it will, as far as science now tells us, apparently have to do them with much the same means and resources that we use.

The often-expressed opinion that we shall be able to obtain mysterious power in large amounts from new and undeveloped sources, "from the sun", "from breaking up atoms", from "harnessing the tides", from water power, etc., is eagerly seized on by thoughtless people who are ready to believe that which is pleasant, and to assume that we can waste the coal, the oil, etc., on which we are now dependent. It is likely to prove a fallacy fatal to our civilization.

The exhaustion of the present easily and abundantly obtainable supplies of oil, coal, and metals is going to put the human race face to face with problems which no scientist or economist likes to even think about. Will civilization survive that crisis? No one can predict. All that we can be sure of is that our present prodigality in the use, much of it wasteful use, of such resources is bringing the time when we shall be face to face with those problems much nearer than we like to realize. We still think of them as matters for "posterity", not for ourselves, to worry about. But every year we ourselves come nearer and nearer to being the "posterity" for whose welfare we show so little concern.

If civilization is to survive, man must enter into a harmonious relationship with nature. Unfortunately, this principle has often been disregarded and violated. Such folly has caused many calamities. Serious losses have been inflicted on present and future generations. The accomplishments of a lifetime of labor have often been wiped out through the unwise location of agricultural and other developments in regions subject to great floods and excessive droughts. Agricultural lands have been wasted by preventable soil erosion. Streams have been needlessly polluted by oil, sewage, and industrial wastes, thus endangering not only health and human life but wildlife and fisheries. Unnecessary clearing of forests has been partly responsible for droughts, dust storms, floods, and pollution. Unjustified drainage practices have destroyed lakes and marshes, increased the danger of floods, droughts, and forest fires, and promoted the destruction of much wildlife. Lack of conservation measures to protect the people against these calamities has largely contributed to undermining the health and prosperity of many parts of the Nation.

This spring we are suffering from the effects of unprecedented destructive floods. They have resulted in a tremendous loss of life and property. They have been destructive to human life through causing deaths, epidemics, and famine. They have wiped out the savings of many people. They have interfered with normal business operations. They have destroyed soils, crops, forests, and wildlife. They have paved the way for droughts and forest fires. They have endangered navigation. Unquestionably this situation is partly due to unusual conditions of weather and snowfall, but very largely to reckless deforestation. Experiences of China, Italy, and Spain, where the people have paid a great penalty for the destruction of their forests have not been heeded.

Like the droughts and dust storms, floods have been increased if not largely caused by unscientific cultivation of the soil, and unnecessary drainage of lakes, and marshes, as well as by deforestation.

In order to prevent floods, it is necessary to stop the wasteful practices by man which have caused them. Flood-control measures must make provision for a dense cover of vegetation as well as for engineering works such as reservoirs and levees. It is necessary to maintain a dense vegetative cover by means of grasslands and well-kept forests and to apply contour plowing and terracing to farm lands on slopes for the purpose of diminishing washing away of the soil by rain and melting snow. Furthermore, there is a vital need for the enactment of adequate laws providing for the necessary public regulation of private lands, particularly the forests, to prevent misuse where effects may be destructive in large areas belonging to others.

Water pollution is another serious public menace and is one of the greatest problems now facing the American people. If we do not put an end to pollution it surely will destroy us.

Pollution by sewage and industrial waste, of the lakes, rivers, and streams, renders the water unsuitable for human consumption, endangers public health and the health of animals by spreading disease germs, destroys fish or aquatic life, and results in an enormous loss of fertilizing elements. It aggravates the increasing difficulty of providing an adequate water supply for large communities. This pollution could be prevented and controlled to a large extent by scientifically utilizing the waste products and by means of sewage-disposal plants. Although pollution is of local origin, the control of it is an interstate problem, as it usually affects the stream for long distances, and all human interests depend on it. The discharge of sewage, chemicals, or noxious substances into a lake or stream should never be allowed whether it be done by a city or other community, a factory or an individual.

Oil pollution of coastal waters has become a very serious question not only of local but international character. It has been caused to a large extent by the great increase in the number of oil-driven and oil-carrying ships in the world, and by the thousands of motor boats. It has resulted not only in the waste of large quantities of oil but in the immense destruction of wild fowl and fish.

Unlike the other substances with which water is polluted, oil floats and pollution caused by its affects chiefly the surface of the water. A very small quantity of oil will spread out in a thin film over a large extent of water which wind and waves may cause to drift toward the shores, covering the beaches with filthy grease and rendering the coastal waters unfit for bathing or other recreation. More serious than this the film is poisonous to the eggs of fishes which mostly float near the surface and to the minute creatures on which the young fishes feed, as well as to the young ones themselves. If there are no young fishes there will be no large ones for man's use. The oil film is also extremely destructive to sea birds, including wild ducks and other aquatic game birds saturating and gumming their feathers so that they cannot fly and often resulting in their death. Tens of thousands of such birds are destroyed along our coast every year by oil.

Laws prohibiting the discharge of oil into the sea cannot be enforced because the guilty ship is usually outside the 3-mile limit at the time the deed is done. The logical remedy is to secure an international agreement among the powers for the compulsory use of an effective separator by all oil-burning ships.

There is no doubt that, had the American people been taught the importance and principles of conservation in the schools, many serious calamities, as pollution, floods, droughts, and forest fires, could have been mitigated or even prevented. We must now unite in a drive to destroy these great menaces or they will destroy us. We must make the public more conscious of this responsibility and we can accomplish this by impressing its importance on the minds of our boys and girls who will eventually have to deal with the problems. In other words, it is our duty to introduce conservation as a regular required subject into every school in America. To achieve this end, the Educational Conservation Society, with the cooperation of State departments of public instruction, has issued courses of study on the natural resources for the public elementary schools, high schools, colleges, and universities, and a program for the training of teachers, supervisors, directors, and Government workers in the field of conservation. This movement has already received the approval of the Department of the Interior, the Federal Office of Education, the United States Bureau of Biological Survey, State Departments of Education, State Departments of Conservation and Game and Fish, many State Governors, college heads, and superintendents of schools.

In a recent address delivered at the North American Wildlife Conference, Dr. John W. Studebaker, United States Commissioner of Education said: "It would seem that while the Federal and State Governments are engaged in the terrific and somewhat disheartening struggle to repair by direct methods the damages which have been done to our forests, lands, streams, and wildlife by the ignorance and indifference of our citizens, a small appropriation for education, through which there can quickly be put into the minds of millions of people the challenge to conserve what we have left and to rebuild our lost fortunes, would be the most profitable of all investments."

There is a vital need for the creation of an educational service on the conservation of national resources in the United States Office of Education and for Federal assistance to the States in the promotion of conservation education in the public elementary schools, high schools, colleges, and universities.

Educators and conservationists are now appealing to the National Government for the establishment of a division of conservation education in the United States Office of Education and for an annual appropriation to assist the States in paying for the salaries and preparation of teachers, supervisors, and directors of conservation subjects on the natural resources.

Citizens in every community of the United States can do their part in protecting natural resources from unnecessary waste and destruction. The foundations of national prosperity and the happiness of present and future generations are dependent upon conservation.

It is your duty to obey the Federal and State conservation laws. Make your community a more beautiful place to live in by working for constructive education and legislation, by preventing forest fires and keeping the grounds clean, by planting trees, protecting the wild flowers, birds, and animals, and by taking part in the establishment and protection of forests, parks, and wildlife sanctuaries.

If all citizens will fulfill these obligations, outdoor America will be preserved for present and future generations.

FEDERAL THEATER PROJECT

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, about 10 days ago the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] in a forceful address to the Senate made what I regard as some very unjustified criticisms of and attacks upon the Federal theater project. I have received a telegram of protest which is signed by some of the leading actors and leading playwrights of our country, none of whom benefits by the project at all, and by some of our leading producers. I should like to have the clerk read the telegram for the information of Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the telegram, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., May 1, 1936.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Senate Office Building:

Undersigned deplore recent aspersions on directors of the Federal theater project and point to careers of Hallie Flanagan, national director, and Philip W. Barber, New York City, director, as proving they particularly fitted to lead this worth-while American enterprise. Mrs. Flanagan, first woman granted Guggenheim fellowship, which given for her distinguished original work in theater production, Grinnell College and Harvard. Foundation specifically asked she study methods dramatic production foreign countries, which she did, to enrichment American theater. For 9 years she directed Vassar College experimental theater, which work brought her wide acclaim. She has long been exponent for production American plays in American way. Many Federal theater hits in New York are convincing answers to recent ridiculous charges of incompetence. Undersigned point also to Mrs. Flanagan's sympathetic understanding of unemployment problem as another prime requisite for position she holds. Mr. Barber long associated with progressive theater movement, and it was under his immediate supervision that New York Federal theater developed such outstanding theatrical successes as Macbeth, Murder in the Cathedral, Chalk Dust, and Triple A Plowed Under. Urgently request you read brilliant records to Senate and offset charges read by Senator DAVIS.

Helen Hayes, George Kaufman, Philip Merivale, Theresa Helburn, Brooks Atkinson, Lee Shubert, Clayton Hamilton, Sidney Howard, Henry Chanin, Raymond Massey, Heywood Broun, Joseph Wood Krutch, Dorothy Dunbar Bromley, Wolcott Gibbs, Kelcey Allen, Lawrence Langer, Arthur Pollock, Austin Strong, John Howard Lawson, John Chapman, Malcolm Cowley, Edward Reed.

Mr. DAVIS subsequently said: Mr. President, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] has today stated that, in his opinion, I have made some very unjustified criticisms of and attacks upon the Federal Theater project. I call attention to the fact that I have made no statement, publicly or privately, on the Senate floor or elsewhere, which could rightfully be construed as an attack upon the Federal Theater project. I wish to make this very clear. The remarks which I have made concerning the administration of the Federal theater project have been very carefully weighed, and I have not spoken upon this subject without careful consideration. I ask those who may chance to be interested in this subject to read with equal care the statements which I made on April 20 and April 24. I have written in some detail upon this subject to Mr. Frank Gillmore, president of the Actors' Equity Association, in New York City, and in the interest of the understanding in this matter of the Senator from New York. I should be glad to have him read the letter referred to, which is a part of the RECORD.

The Senator from New York had read into the RECORD a telegram signed by a number of prominent actors and playwrights stating of Mrs. Flanagan:

> She has long been exponent for production American plays in American way. Many Federal theater hits in New York are convincing answers to recent ridiculous charges of incompetence.

I wish to say explicitly that at no time have I charged Mrs. Flanagan with incompetence. I have no personal knowledge of the project which she is conducting and therefore have no basis for forming a judgment of this matter. I ask that those who are interested in the right of American actors to work on the Federal theater project be careful not to misconstrue any statements which I may make so that the continuance of a work project for worthy actors shall not be jeopardized.

I wish to make very clear that if Mrs. Flanagan has long been an exponent of production of American plays in the American way I congratulate her on taking this position. Naturally this is rightfully the attitude which anyone who is appointed to lead an American national theater project should have. My only knowledge of Mrs. Flanagan comes from reading the books listed under her name in the Congressional Library entitled "Shifting Scenes", "The American Plan", and "Can You Hear Their Voices?" I should like to ask those who have any interest in this subject to read these plays to judge for themselves the impression which they give regarding the author's attitude toward communism and the American plan of life.

I do not know Mrs. Flanagan, and hence at no time, publicly or privately, have I ventured to make any statement about her whatsoever. I have simply called attention to the works which she has written and have introduced evidence concerning her administration presented by others. I made no comment whatsoever upon the evidence thus introduced.

I have no desire to misinterpret the remarks either of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] or of Mrs. Flanagan. The information concerning the Federal theater project transmitted to me was first sent to President Roosevelt. The matter was not acted upon for almost 30 days. I had previously attempted to gain information concerning the administration of the Works Progress Administration without success by writing to Mr. Hopkins. Desiring that this important matter should be brought to the attention of the Senate so that a full explanation might be given the taxpayers of the country, I introduced the available evidence.

I asked specifically that if Mrs. Flanagan did not write the books to which I had referred or if she had changed her mind concerning the principles which they expressed, she be given an opportunity to clarify her position. A number of messages have come to my desk concerning the Federal theater project and Mrs. Flanagan, but as yet no word has been received concerning the one issue to which I have called attention, namely, the books of Mrs. Flanagan. I should be glad to know from her or from some person whom she may authorize to speak for her if these books actually represent her point of view today.

NATIONAL FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I have the attention of our leader for a moment? The Committee on Commerce has had before it for a long time—I think I may say for almost a year, but certainly for the past 2 months—the omnibus flood-control bill. I should not feel myself true to my trust as chairman of the Committee on Commerce unless I made every possible effort to secure action on the bill.

I think it is one of the best-prepared bills we have ever had on the subject, if I may say so without taking any personal pride for that result. It contains a declaration of policy. The projects included in the bill and recommended by the committee have been considered by the appropriate committees of the two Houses, and every single project has received the full approval and endorsement of the Board of Army Engineers.

I am very anxious, and the other members of my committee and many Members of the Senate are very anxious, to have early action on the bill. Floods have occurred all over the country. Several hundred persons lost their lives and millions of dollars' worth of property were destroyed. Action should be taken on the bill in order that the two Houses may agree in conference as to the final form of the bill and that the Army Engineers may proceed with the work.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that large appropriations have been made by Mr. Hopkins' organization, and such appropriations have been expended in many States, for flood relief and for other activities which are comprehended in the bill to which the Senator refers?

Mr. COPELAND. Eight or ten or possibly a dozen such projects have been given some money out of the Emergency Relief funds. But, by and large, it is safe to say that all these projects—indeed, I may say all the projects in this bill—are projects which have not been provided for by relief funds.

Mr. KING. And is it not a fact that Congress has recently enacted a measure carrying more than $187,000,000 for rivers and harbors and for flood control, directly or indirectly?

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator refer to the lower Mississippi flood-control bill?

Mr. KING. No; not to that bill.

Mr. COPELAND. According to the final action just taken by the Senate, we have appropriated $121,000,000 for expenditure on rivers and harbors; but these are all projects having to do with the coast line, and not having to do at all with the control of floods on inland rivers.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact—and I ask for information—that we recently passed a measure carrying $187,000,000 or $184,000,000?

Mr. COPELAND. For the lower Mississippi?

Mr. KING. No; the lower Mississippi bill carried $275,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. To what measure does the Senator refer?

Mr. KING. My recollection is that we passed a bill for surveys of rivers and harbors projects, and that the bill carried an appropriation of approximately $184,000,000 for work upon accepted projects.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator must have in mind the bill we brought here last year, which was defeated by the very efficient filibuster of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. The amount involved was not $175,000,000, however; it was about $775,000,000.

Mr. KING. My recollection is that there was one quite different from that.

Mr. COPELAND. No; the measures which have been adopted are the rivers and harbors items carried in the Army appropriation bill—$121,000,000—and the flood-control bill with reference to the lower Mississippi, which was passed by the Senate the other day. Those are the only ones which have been made effective by action of the Congress.

Mr. KING. In view of the appropriation for this purpose, according to the Senator's own statement, of over $300,000,000, perhaps three hundred and fifty or four hundred million dollars, and other enormous appropriations which have been made and will be made before Congress adjourns, does the Senator think we are justified now in seeking an appropriation of several hundred million dollars more to be expended during the next year?

Mr. COPELAND. I assume that it all depends upon what our attitude is toward the control of floods. We had a bill here last year which, as I said, was defeated by a very active and successful filibuster. That bill included projects around Pittsburgh, for example, on the Allegheny and the Monongahela Rivers, and projects on the Susquehanna and other Rivers, which, if the bill had passed and the works included in it had been installed, would have prevented the recent floods in Pittsburgh, Wheeling, Louisville, and Cincinnati, as well as in my own State, in Elmira, Binghamton, and other points in New York. There is no doubt in my mind that this country, because of its recent experiences, demands that something shall be done by the present Congress to make certain that we are going forward in this undertaking.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I understand that the Senator is addressing himself to the leader on this side of the Chamber for the purpose of urging that a time be fixed for action on the flood-control bill.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is right.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to join the Senator in that course. I should like to ask him if his committee has had ample opportunity to learn from the Army Engineers the amounts of money which will be needed, and the measures which it will be necessary to undertake, in order to prevent floods in the regions where there were devastating floods this very year.

Mr. COPELAND. The bill to which I refer carries projects providing safety for every point where floods occurred this year, except a few in Maine and New York, where the surveys have not been completed. But provision is made in the Senator's own State with reference to the Merrimack River and the Connecticut River——

Mr. WALSH. And the Blackstone River.

Mr. COPELAND. And the Blackstone River.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I know that. I desire to know whether the committee has gone further, and has made provision for sections of the country other than New England.

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, yes; every section of the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Forty States having flood-control projects are included in this bill.

Mr. WALSH. I think there will be a great deal of disappointment in the regions mentioned if some action is not taken during the present session of Congress. I find that people of the recent flood areas are deeply interested, and are persistent in asking for action. Only this morning I received a communication from a group of leading citizens of the Connecticut Valley who have formed an organization, drafted resolutions, and express a desire to cooperate with the Federal Government to hasten action and to assist in undertaking whatever may be necessary to prevent future floods.

Mr. COPELAND. I will say to the Senator that there are protests coming from every part of the country because we have not already had action on the subject.

Mr. WALSH. That is in accord with my convictions.

Mr. COPELAND. And I have no question that it will be a campaign issue if we do not do something about it.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WAGNER. I simply wish to add that, so far as our State is concerned, I know the situation is in very safe and competent hands in charge of my colleague; but he knows, as I know, that people who have suffered so much as the result of the flood last year and some floods this year are exceedingly concerned and disturbed by the reports that Congress may not act this year by appropriate legislation so as to prevent the recurrence of devastating floods in the future. I merely desire to add whatever humble efforts I may make to the efforts of my colleague to secure the enactment of legislation on the subject this year. It would be a great disappointment to the entire country if it should not be enacted.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I had not thought there would be any extended debate on this matter. My purpose in rising was simply to ask our leader if he thinks it possible for us to include in the program of bills to be considered the measure dealing with floods.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I thought the Senator was advised that I have been conducting some conferences with a view to ascertaining whether and when the bill to which the Senator refers may be brought forward. Let me say to the Senator that I shall be glad to confer with him further about the matter in the hope that a conclusion concerning it may be reached in the early future.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator.

CHARLESTON ARMY BASE TERMINAL, CHARLESTON, S. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3789) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to convey the Charleston Army Base Terminal to the city of Charleston, S. C.

Mr. BYRNES. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives, ask for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. COPELAND, Mr. SHEPPARD, and Mr. JOHNSON conferees on the part of the Senate.

BATHING POOLS IN THE DISTRICT—MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on the last day before the recess the Senate passed Senate bill 4540, to provide for the operation of bathing pools in the District of Columbia under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, and for other purposes. The bill has not been transmitted to the House, and I now enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

REAL-PROPERTY TAX IN VIRGIN ISLANDS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8287) to establish an assessed valuation real-property tax in the Virgin Islands of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I may say that this bill, now the unfinished business, passed the House several weeks ago, was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, of which the President pro tempore, now presiding over the deliberations of the Senate, is a member, was considered by that committee, and I have been authorized to report the bill with two amendments. I now desire to have the Senate act on the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the first amendment.

The first amendment of the committee was, in section 3, on page 2, line 9, after the word "value", to strike out "Until the President shall determine that adequate administrative authority and organization exist in a municipality under local law for levying, assessing, and collecting taxes imposed or authorized under this act, such taxes shall be levied, assessed, and collected under regulations prescribed by the President" and to insert in lieu thereof "If the legislative authority of a municipality shall fail to enact laws for the levy, assessment, collection, or enforcement of any tax imposed under authority of this act within 3 months after the date of its enactment, the President shall then prescribe regulations for the levy, assessment, collection, and enforcement of such tax, which shall be in effect until the legislative authority of such municipality shall make regulations for such purposes", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. Until local tax laws conforming to the requirements of this act are in effect in a municipality the tax on real property in such municipality for any such calendar year shall be at the rate of 1.25 percent of the assessed value. If the legislative authority of a municipality shall fail to enact laws for the levy, assessment, collection, or enforcement of any tax imposed under authority of this act within 3 months after the date of its enactment, the President shall then prescribe regulations for the levy, assessment, collection, and enforcement of such tax, which shall be in effect until the legislative authority of such municipality shall make regulations for such purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, in section 4, on page 2, line 23, after the words "deposited in the", to strike out the word "colonial" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "municipal", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. All taxes so levied and collected shall be deposited in the municipal treasury of the municipality in which such taxes are collected.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, at the top of page 3, to strike out section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. The Virgin Islands Co. is authorized to pay annually into the colonial treasuries of the Virgin Islands on account of lands in the Virgin Islands owned by the United States and in the possession of the Virgin Islands Co. sums which the corporation shall determine to be equivalent to the real-property taxes payable on such lands if they were in private ownership. The Virgin Islands Co. is authorized to pay annually into the colonial treasuries of the Virgin Islands such sums as the corporation shall determine to be equivalent to the several taxes which a private corporation similarly situated would be required to pay into the said treasuries.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 5. The Virgin Islands Co. shall pay annually into the municipal treasuries of the Virgin Islands in lieu of taxes an amount equal to the amount of taxes which would be payable on the real property in the Virgin Islands owned by the United States and in the possession of the Virgin Islands Co. if such real property were in private ownership and taxable, but the valuation placed upon such property for taxation purposes by the local taxing authorities shall be reduced to a reasonable amount by the Secretary of the Interior if, after investigation, he finds that such valuation is excessive and unreasonable. The Virgin Islands Co. shall also pay into the municipal treasuries of the Virgin Islands amounts equal to the amounts of any taxes of general application which a private corporation similarly situated would be required to pay into the said treasuries. Similar payments shall be made with respect to any property owned by the United States in the Virgin Islands which is used for ordinary business or commercial purposes, and the income derived from any property so used shall be available for making such payments.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this amendment was considered by the committee, as I have indicated, and it met with the unanimous approval of the members of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, in section 6, on page 4, line 16, after the word "real", to insert the words "and personal", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. Nothing in this act shall be construed as altering, amending, or repealing the existing exemptions from taxation of property used for educational, charitable, or religious purposes. Subject to the provisions of this act, the legislative authority of the respective municipalities is hereby empowered to alter, amend, or repeal, subject to the approval of the Governor, any law now imposing taxes on real and personal property.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further amendments to be offered, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], who has taken a great interest in this measure, is unavoidably absent. I have not had time to confer with him concerning the various provisions of the bill, but I assume, from the statement of the Senator from Utah, that the bill is satisfactory to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. KING. I make that statement.

Mr. McNARY. And has met the approval of the entire committee?

Mr. KING. There is only one member of the committee who has not been consulted, who did not happen to be present at the meeting when the bill was considered, the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], but I am sure he will not interpose any objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted as a part of my remarks a portion of the report which I submitted accompanying the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8287) to establish an assessed valuation real-property tax in the Virgin Islands of the United States, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with amendments and recommend that the bill as amended do pass.

In the bill as it passed the House there was a provision that the real-property taxes provided for in the act should be levied, assessed, and collected under regulations prescribed by the President until he determined that there was adequate administrative authority and organization in a municipality under local law for that purpose. The committee recommend that this provision be changed so that the regulations of the President shall not become effective unless the legislative authority of a municipality fails for a period of 3 months to enact laws for the levy, assessment, collection, or enforcement of the taxes imposed by the act. If such regulations are prescribed by the President, they are to remain in effect until the legislative authority of the municipality shall make regulations for such purposes.

The committee has also modified the provision of the House bill relating to payments by the Virgin Islands Co. to the municipal treasuries of amounts which the company determined to be equivalent to the taxes which it would pay if the lands of the United States in its possession were taxable, so as to provide that the valuation of such lands should be fixed by the local taxing authorities for the purpose of such payments. However, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to reduce the valuation to a reasonable amount if he finds, after investigation, that the valuation so fixed is excessive and unreasonable. It is also provided that similar payments shall be made with respect to any property owned by the United States in the Virgin Islands which is used for ordinary business or commercial purposes, and the income derived from any property so used is made available for making such payments.

The purposes of the bill as it passed the House are set out in full in House Report No. 1559, Seventy-fourth Congress, which accompanied this measure, and in a so-called justification for the enactment of the bill prepared by a committee of Government officials appointed by the Governor of the Virgin Islands. This report and justification are incorporated herein and made a part of this report, together with certain data in the form of tables, and a memorandum from the Department of the Interior dated April 2, 1936.

JUSTIFICATION

Since the purchase of the Virgin Islands of the United States in 1917 there have been a number of investigations made into the social, economic, and fiscal affairs of those islands. Mr. Herbert D. Brown, then Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency, in his report in 1931 covering the fiscal affairs of the municipalities of the Virgin Islands, summarized the findings of previous investigators. The following quotations set forth the gist of Mr. Brown's summary relating to the fiscal situation of the Virgin Islands:

"Need for new tax system: One of the things that has impressed all investigators is that the tax system needs revision. The Joint Commission of 1920 chronicled the fact that they found 'the system of taxation in the islands unjust, inefficient, and archaic.' They recommended that the entire system be reformed with a view to securing a greater income and with a view to equalizing the burdens of taxation. In 1924 the Secretary of Labor's Federal Commission recommended that the Government 'send to the islands a tax expert to cooperate with the people and local authorities in the preparation of a system of taxation to replace the present system.'

"In 1925 Mr. Roswell F. Magill was accordingly designated to report on the tax system. He recommended that the tax laws for the islands be made uniform and that a single administrative unit be provided, charged with the duty of levying, assessing, and collecting the tax. He proposed a new system and recommended that it be adopted by Congress in lieu of the present Federal legislation and the local ordinances in conflict with the system, showing apparently by this proposal that he too recognized the futility of depending on the local councils to put through tax legislation. But no action was taken.

"Ground and building tax: Second in importance in the municipality of St. Croix, is the tax on ground and buildings. Buildings in the country occupied or used by the owner of the land or his employees are not taxed. In the towns, should any building which is intended to be rented out remain untenanted and not used for 2 or more consecutive months, a proportional reduction is allowed in the building tax. It would seem that taxes on buildings should be assesed, levied, and collected regardless of use or occupancy.

"Land tax should be increased: The ground or land tax should undoubtedly be increased. One way to turn the land back to the people, that is, to break up the large landed estates and give the poorer people a chance to become small land owners is to increase reasonably the tax on uncultivated land. The large land owners will be glad to sell in order to be relieved of their taxes where they cannot use the land profitably.

"Writing about the need for reform of Virgin Islands laws, Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels brought out in a letter addressed to the chairman of the House Committee on Insular Affairs, on October 24, 1919, the detrimental effect of the tax laws: 'The laws * * * are so drawn that land permitted to lie idle and unproductive is absolutely free [sic] from taxation, while the burden of taxation falls most heavily upon the land in cultivation and sustaining extensive improvements. Such laws discourage building and agricultural advancement and are, therefore, very detrimental to thrift and industry. A revision of these laws that would place a premium upon production and improvements and cause the burden to fall heaviest upon the idle estates of absentee landlords would soon render the islands self-supporting and thus serve to reduce the calls upon Congress for further appropriations to maintain the essential governmental activities therein.'

"Land tax necessary: But that is not the only service that the United States Government must perform, if the end desired is justice for the small farmer and general prosperity for the islands. Owners of land will continue to hold large tracts of it out of use as long as the tax on land remains as light as it is at present. We see no remedy except to make it unprofitable to hold out of use extensive areas of arable land.

"Since many of the persons who own the largest tracts are also members of the colonial councils, it seems unlikely that any remedial legislation of this kind can be obtained through the councils. This is one of the phases of taxation that we are studying. Our conclusions will be submitted in a supplemental report. It is our belief at this time that the difficulty can only be remedied by legislative action on the part of the United States Congress."

A commission of educators, appointed to report on the educational system of the Virgin Islands in 1929, makes the following observation:

"* * * American administrations have admittedly done little to date to correct some of the outstanding industrial abuses of the islands, such as land monopoly and a vicious taxation system * * *."

The present real property tax laws in the municipality of St. Croix are as follows:

(1) Ground and building tax enacted 1802, rates as amended Nov. 16, 1907): (a) For town properties—7⅓ bits ($0.0146) per square ell (24⅞ inches) of the "measurement of every story of a building"); (b) for vacant town lots—one-fourth bit ($0.0025) per square ell; (c) for country properties—all land used or laid out for cane or cotton cultivation, francs 3.50 ($0.70) per acre. All land used or laid out for cultivation other than cane or cotton, also pasture land, 66⅔ bits ($0.133) per acre. All useless land, 5 bits ($0.01) per acre.

(2) Percentage tax: 4 percent of actual or estimated annual rental value of buildings in town, or country buildings rented to persons other than laborers or employees of the estate. In the towns, buildings remaining vacant and not actually occupied for more than 2 months, pay no tax whatever for the time so vacant; neither ground and building nor percentage tax.

(3) Immigration tax (enacted Sept. 13, 1855; amended June 6, 1862); 50 bits ($0.10) per acre of land in cane cultivation, cotton cultivation, or pasturage.

(4) Road tax (enacted June 17, 1931; amended Sept. 30, 1932): Under the road ordinance of July 14, 1923, estate owners were compelled to make repairs on and to maintain a stated allotment of public road, whether first-class road or second-class road. By ordinance of September 30, 1932, all public roads are repaired and maintained by the Government and a tax, based upon an equitable allotment of all public roads in each of the eight quarters of the municipality among property owners in each quarter in accordance with their acreage in each quarter, is levied semiannually at an annual rate of 2 cents per foot of allotment for each foot of first-class road allotment, and of $0.0075 per foot of allotment for each foot of second-class allotment. An acre of land in cultivation is allotted 3 feet of road, whereas an acre of land not in cultivation is allotted 1 foot of road. One foot of first-class road is to be allotted for each 2 feet of second-class road allotment.

The present real-property tax law in St. Thomas is the real-property tax law of February 25, 1922, which provides for a tax on real estate, improved and unimproved, to be levied by a tax assessor and collected on July 1, for the preceding calendar year, at a rate not exceeding 1 percent of the assessed value of all real estate in the municipality not exempt from taxation. The maximum assessed valuation of cultivated land is fixed at $45 per acre; pasture land at $20 per acre; bush land at $10 per acre.

According to the 1930 census, the total value of farm lands and buildings in the municipality of St. Croix is $1,934,790. According to an unofficial office valuation, town buildings, exclusive of land, in the municipality of St. Croix, are valued at $733,000.

According to the 1930 census, the total value of farm lands and buildings in the municipality of St. Thomas is $465,921. The assessed valuation of all real property under the existing real-property tax law in St. Thomas and St. John for the fiscal year 1933 is $3,441,509.

The estimated yield of revenues for the fiscal year 1935, in the budget for the municipality of St. Croix for the property taxes listed above, is as follows:

Ground, building, and percentage tax	$21,000
Road tax	4,800
Immigration tax	4,200

The estimated revenue under the real-property tax law for the fiscal year 1935, in the budget for the municipality of St. Thomas and St. John is $33,000.

Under the laws in the municipality of St. Croix, fertility, location, and general productiveness of land is not a factor in determining the amount of tax to be paid on land. The same land may be taxed under the ground and building tax and immigration tax, 80 cents per acre, if it is in cane or cotton cultivation, but if not in cultivation, it will be taxed only 23⅓ cents an acre.

As an illustration of the manner in which the St. Croix tax laws work, there may be cited the case of a 30-acre tract of land purchased several years ago by the Government from a private estate owner at a purchase price of $1,200. Prior to the purchase by the Government this land was not in cultivation and on the whole tract a tax of only $7 per annum was collected. The Government resold this tract to three homesteaders, who immediately put the entire area into cultivation. They now pay a total of $24 per annum in real property taxes. Parenthetically, it is to be noted that an export tax of $6 a ton on sugar, levied by act of Congress of February 25, 1928, imposes an additional tax on the production of land in sugar cultivation which is estimated to increase the taxation on that land in the amount of approximately $4 an acre per annum.

Because of the operation of the property qualifications for suffrage in the Virgin Islands, the membership of the legislative bodies there is largely made up of large property owners. Mr. Herbert D. Brown and other observers have agreed that because of this situation there is little probability that an equitable assessed valuation property tax could be got through the local legislatures. For this reason the present bill is offered for enactment by the Congress of the United States, but in order to give as wide latitude as possible to the local legislatures, provision is made in it to make the Federal tax operative only in the absence of local legislation conforming to the Federal requirements. A flexible method of administration under the Federal law is provided to permit the development of a satisfactory administrative procedure based upon local requirements. Regulations governing the establishment of a board of appraisal, a board of review, of determining the relative weight of factors entering into valuation and administrative procedure generally, will be provided for in rules established by the President of the United States.

The rate of 1.25 percent of assessed value is considered a reasonable rate for land in productive use. Citing again the illustration given above with respect to a 30-acre tract in St. Croix, the annual real property tax under this law would be $15 instead of the $24 now levied under existing local law.

Each of the two municipalities of the Virgin Islands has its own local treasury and its own local budget. All funds collected in either of the municipalities under this law should be deposited in the colonial treasury of the municipality in which the tax is collected.

Specific grant of power is given to the local legislatures of the municipalities to alter, amend, or repeal existing real-property tax laws in order to remove the restriction imposed by section 4 of the act of March 3, 1917, providing for the establishment of a temporary government for the Virgin Islands of the United States, under which those legislative authorities are prohibited from altering, amending, and/or repealing any tax laws in effect at the time of the passage of that act.

LAWRENCE W. CRAMER,
Lieutenant Governor of St. Croix.
ROBERT HERRICK,
Government Secretary.

Government Attorney.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
DIVISION OF TERRITORIES AND ISLAND POSSESSIONS,
Washington, April 2, 1936.

MEMORANDUM

H. R. 8287, a bill to establish an assessed-valuation real-property tax in the Virgin Islands of the United States, was passed by the Houseof Representatives on January 20 and referred to the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs on January 22. This bill is identical with S. 2838 with its amendment introduced by Senator TYDINGS on May 13, 1935. Although the two bills are identical, it is probable that the enactment of this legislation would be expedited by action upon the House bill, which has already passed in that Chamber.

The provisions of this bill which establish a real-property assessed-valuation tax in the Virgin Islands are, without question, sound and equitable and are necessary, because under existing prohibitions the local legislature is probably without power to repeal existing archaic real-property tax laws. Objection has been raised by the members of the colonial councils in the Virgin Islands to the enactment of this bill, but that objection must be considered in the light of the nature of the representative system in the Virgin Islands, which excludes all but propertied persons from the suffrage. It is believed that the mass of the people would thoroughly approve establishment of an equitable tax system whose effect would be to compel large property holders either to use their land or to sell it to others who might do so.

It is to be emphasized that the bill will not preclude the colonial councils from passing real-property tax laws. On the contrary, it makes clear their authority to do so, merely establishing a tax rate which shall obtain until the local legislature acts.

The most important and pressing problem for the municipality of St. Croix is for additional funds to maintain its existing institutions such as schools, hospitals, medical institutions, etc. Because the Virgin Islands Co. has been held to be a Federal agency, the local government can secure no revenue from land under its control or from its operations. It has been variously estimated that between $25,000 and $40,000 tax loss is sustained by the municipality by reason of the Federal character of the Virgin Islands Co. The situation is so acute that it has been necessary to request an additional appropriation for the present fiscal year as a contribution to the municipal deficit for the municipality. A deficit of $30,000 in excess of that anticipated at the beginning of the fiscal year has resulted from the tax-free status of the Virgin Islands Co. It is of immediate and pressing importance that action be taken at once to rectify the situation that has arisen as a result of the operations of the Federal Government in the island of St. Croix. The very meager resources of that community prevent the possibility of finding other sources of revenue locally which can supply the loss resulting from the operations of the Virgin Islands Co.

The urgency of action is further emphasized by the fact that assessments must be made within the next month for local taxes to be collected in 1937. Thus, unless this bill is passed immediately the municipalities will not receive the additional revenue therein provided until 1938.

Finally, it is to be pointed out that the provisions of this bill are wholly consistent with the provisions of both drafts of an organic act now before the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs. The immediate passage of this bill would, therefore, in no way embarrass consideration of the organic act. On the other hand, any delay in the consideration of this bill until the proposed organic act shall have been reported may result in the serious financial embarrassment of the local government during 1936 and 1937.

It is therefore urgently recommended that the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs give its prompt and favorable consideration to H. R. 8287, both because it rectifies gross inequalities in the real-property tax laws of the municipalities and because it makes provision for the payment by the Virgin Islands Co. of sums in lieu of taxes to the municipality of St. Croix.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12527, making appropriations for the Naval Establishment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, personally I have no objection to the Senate proceeding to the consideration of the bill at this time. The bill was reported yesterday during the recess of the Senate in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement entered into a day earlier, when I was absent from the Chamber. Ordinarily, as we all know, the bill would go over for a day under the rule, giving opportunity to every Senator to study the provisions of the bill and to read the report. This morning several Senators have suggested to me the propriety of the bill going over and taking the usual course. I conferred with the Senator from South Carolina a few moments ago, and he said that, while the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] could not be present tomorrow, he was willing to proceed today. If that is agreeable to the Senator from South Carolina, and there is an agreement between the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from South Carolina, I have no objection.

I wish to observe, however, that according to the RECORD 21 Senators are absent, and in view of that fact, the bill not having gone through the usual procedure of going over for a day, I am curious to know whether the Senator desires to drive forward today.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, because of the noise in the rear of the Chamber, I did not hear the statement of the Senator. Did he state that he has no objection to the Senate proceeding with the consideration of the bill today, but that he does not want to have the consideration concluded today?

Mr. McNARY. I stated that personally I had no objection to the present consideration of the bill. I am speaking for some Senators on this side who have objected because the bill has not taken the usual course of going over for the day. Consent was given while I was absent that the bill might be reported during the recess, and I make no complaint about that, but on one other occasion when a similar course was followed I asked that the bill go through the usual formula and go over for the day. I am advised by the Senator from South Carolina that he has conferred with the Senator from North Dakota, and that it is the desire of the Senator from North Dakota that the Senate go forward with the bill today.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, that is a correct statement.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, if I may interject, the only thought I have to suggest is that it would be far preferable if the bill could go over until next Monday or Tuesday, but if the leaders feel that that is impossible, I should prefer that the Senate proceed with the bill today.

Mr. McNARY. One concluding observation, Mr. President. In view of the statement of the Senator from North Dakota, my pleasure would be served by the Senate considering the bill today. However, may I make the request that the consideration of the bill be not concluded today, and that the bill not be put upon its final passage today?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, if the Senator makes the request, unless the Senator from Arkansas has some good reason to the contrary, I have no objection to agreeing to the request.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I join with the Senator from Oregon in the request that the consideration of the bill be not concluded today. Some of us have had no chance to read it, because of attendance in committee hearings. The Senator from South Carolina knows a number of us are on the Committee on Appropriations and on the Finance Committee. I should like to have the bill go over until next week, if possible.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think it is a very reasonable suggestion that the bill be not finally disposed of today, but I do not see the pertinence in the last suggestion of the Senator from Utah that it go over until next week. I have no objection to laying the bill aside or deferring final action on it until tomorrow, if that meets with the requirements of Senators. But I think we should proceed with the bill today for the convenience of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is agreeable to the suggestion I made a few moments ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from South Carolina that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12527.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12527) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the first amendment of the committee.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Naval Establishment—Office of the Secretary—Miscellaneous expenses", on page 3, line 17, after the words "in all", to strike out "$1,132,500" and insert "$1,162,500", so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, namely:

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY

MISCELLANEOUS EXPENSES

For traveling expenses of civilian employees, including not to exceed $2,500 for the expenses of attendance, at home and abroad, upon meetings of technical, professional, scientific, and other similar organizations when, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, such attendance would be of benefit in the conduct of the work of the Navy Department; not to exceed $2,000 for the part-time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of such experts and at such rates of compensation as may be contracted for by and in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy; expenses of courts martial, purchase of law and reference books, expenses of prisoners and prisons, courts of inquiry, boards of investigation, examining boards, clerical assistance; witnesses' fees and traveling expenses; not to exceed $15,000 for promoting accident prevention and safety in shore establishments of the Navy, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy; newspapers and periodicals for the naval service; all advertising of the Navy Department and its bureaus (except advertising for recruits for the Bureau of Navigation); costs of suits; relief of vessels in distress; recovery of valuables from shipwrecks; maintenance of attachés abroad, including office rental and pay of employees, and not to exceed $8,000 in the aggregate or $900 for any one person for allowances for living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, as authorized by the act approved June 26, 1930 (U. S. C., title 5, sec. 118a); the collection and classification of information; not to exceed $185,000 for telephone, telegraph, and teletype rentals and tolls, telegrams, radiograms, and cablegrams; postage, foreign and domestic and post-office box rentals; necessary expenses for interned persons and prisoners of war under the jurisdiction of the Navy Department, including funeral expenses for such interned persons or prisoners of war as may die while under such jurisdiction; payment of claims for damages as provided in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year 1920, approved July 11, 1919 (U. S. C., title 34, sec. 600); and other necessary and incidental expenses; in all, $1,162,500: Provided, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be available for the expense of any naval district in which there may be an active navy yard, naval training station, or naval operating base, unless the commandant of the naval district shall be also the commandant of one of such establishments: Provided further, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for employees assigned to group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $515,000.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, is not the Senator from South Carolina going to offer a statement in explanation of the general nature of the bill?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I do not desire to make any extended statement in explanation of the bill. In fact, I understood from the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] that he desires to discuss the measure, and I wanted to permit him to do so at the earliest possible opportunity.

The bill making appropriations for the Navy for the next fiscal year, as reported and as passed by the House, carried $531,068,707. As reported to the Senate by the Appropriations Committee it carries $529,125,806, a reduction of $1,942,901 in the amount of the appropriation. The bill as it is reported to the Senate is under the estimates of the Budget Bureau for the next fiscal year in the sum of $20,465,493.

The Senate Appropriations Committee has not made any very material changes in the bill. The few changes which have been made in the bill as passed by the House are set forth in the report in detail, and I know of no important change in the bill which would necessitate my detaining the Senate or making any extended explanation of it.

I have no other statement to make at this time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, before the Senator insists on his suggestion of the absence of a quorum I should like to make a statement. Will the Senator withhold his point of no quorum?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah withhold his suggestion?

Mr. KING. I do.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator in charge of the bill, who was chairman of the subcommittee considering the bill, will recall that I was called away from the committee meetings when the bill was under consideration by reason of my duties in connection with the conference on the District of Columbia bill. I did not bring to the attention of either the full committee or the subcommittee dealing with the Navy appropriation bill a matter which I promised to bring to their attention. That matter had to do with the pay of the civilian professors. Under the practice there has always been an increase of compensation within grades of $100 a year. I hold in my hand the announcement made by the Naval Academy on the 26th of June 1935. It is a printed announcement signed by the Superintendent, and says, among other things:

The initial salary of an instructor is at the rate of $2,800 per annum, pay to begin on the date of appointment. Increases of pay are provided for longevity. Promotions are made on the basis of merit as vacancies become available.

The practice was to allow an addition of $100 a year to the pay of the civilian employees until they reached an outside limit of pay.

I am making an appeal to the Senator in charge of the bill to permit an amendment, on page 15 of the bill, line 21, as to pay of the professors and instructors, in order that it may go to conference and the subject be considered on its merits. I am making this unusual request because I am called away from the city, and must leave tonight, and will not be here again until Monday morning. I am very eager that his matter should be given consideration. I feel guilty because I was asked by the civilian professors to make this plea to the committee, and I was not able to do so.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from New York, that the matter to which he refers was never even mentioned in the committee. The committee had no information about it. Therefore, I am unable to answer the Senator. I will say, however, that we have given to the civilian professors to whom the Senator from New York refers, the provisions for retirement, which were the only matters that were presented in their behalf by the authorities at the Naval Academy, and, because that is so——

Mr. COPELAND. Please do not say that final word.

Mr. BYRNES. The matter to which the Senator refers not having been presented to the committee either by the Bureau of the Budget or by the Department or by anyone, the committee really has no information on the subject. Evidently the House committee has no information on the subject either.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that it was my fault that the committee did not receive the information. I brought up the matter of the retirement, and that had already been recommended, but the matter to which I am now referring, I did not bring up. I have a statement here of all the facts involved. I do not ask conclusive action, but I do ask that the matter go to conference, in order that it may be considered on its merits. It involves only $4,400.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, let me say that I am advised that the matter was presented by the department to the Bureau of the Budget, and it was rejected by the Bureau of the Budget on the ground that they were not at this time recommending any increases in salary. That information has just been received by me from the clerk of the committee.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask if it is not a fact, however, that promotions in grade in other branches of the Government, in relation to other employees, have been resumed?

Mr. BYRNES. So far as my information goes that is correct, but I do not know the status of civilian professors as compared with other employees in the departments of the Government. The Naval Affairs Committee may have had the matter under consideration.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from New York will not press the matter because at the present time there is, and for some time past there has been, some agitation to do away with all civilian instructors and to substitute naval officers as instructors and teachers instead of the civilian instructors; and I am afraid that if this matter is pushed, without going through the regular naval channels, there will be further efforts in that direction.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from New York that by reason of his action in the committee the employees in question at the Naval Academy have been benefited at this time, and it seems to me they ought to be satisfied with the improvement in their condition, and should present the matter to which the Senator has just now referred at some subsequent time when it can be considered by the House committee and by the Senate committee.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a memorandum which has been prepared by me may be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks, and also that attention be called to the fact that in the printed notice which is posted in the academy I find this language:

The initial salary of an instructor is at the rate of $2,800 per annum, pay to begin on the date of appointment. Increases of pay are provided for longevity. Promotions are made on the basis of merit as vacancies become available.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the memorandum will be printed in the RECORD.

The memorandum is as follows:

PROVISIONS FOR ANNUAL PAY INCREASES, CIVILIAN PROFESSORS, UNITED STATES NAVAL ACADEMY

In March 1919, under authority of an act of Congress (39 Stat. 607), the Secretary of the Navy established a schedule of annual salary increases for instructors and professors at the Naval Academy.

This schedule, with minor charges, has been effective since its inception in 1919, and Congress provided funds each year until 1933 to carry out its provisions.

During the "Economy Act" years, of course, no annual increases were made.

Annual increases were provided for and made in the fiscal year 1936, but no funds are provided in the pending Navy appropriations bill for pay increases during 1937.

As a matter of fairness and Government integrity, funds should be provided for pay increases for the fiscal year 1937.

The public notices, posted throughout the country, advertising vacancies in past years at the Naval Academy, contained statements that a definite schedule of annual salary increases was in effect. These statements were seriously considered by men who accepted positions on the faculty of the academy.

Most Government employees, who are entitled to regular salary increases, have not only had such increases resumed, but have had their rate of pay increased to what it would have been had there been no interruption by economy acts. (Public Act 480, 73d Cong., and Public Act 133, 74th Cong.)

In view of this, it would be fair to provide for civilian professors at the Naval Academy not only the scheduled salary increase for 1937, but to provide funds to raise their rate of pay to what it would have been had there been no interruption by economy acts.

The schedule of salary increases for the civilian faculty at the Naval Academy provides annual increases of $100 to eligible instructors and professors. There are at this time 44 men to be considered.

MAY 7, 1936.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I realize the force of what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has said. I feel guilty about the matter, however, in that I promised to present the matter in the committee but did not do so. Had I presented the matter in committee, I suppose the reply of the Senator from Massachusetts would have been the same as that he now makes in the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, a representative called upon me and asked me to interest myself in the pension appropriation for civilian instructors. However, the matter to which the Senator has just adverted was not called to my attention.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am sorry it was not, but the reason is probably that I was expected to do what I failed to do.

I have made my plea. The matter will appear in the RECORD. I hope in the morning when it shall have been read by the chairman of the subcommittee he will give the question further attention, if he thinks it wise to do so.

Mr. BYRNES. I shall be glad to read the memorandum and consider it.

Mr. COPELAND. I should not wish that to happen which the Senator from Massachusetts suggests. I should not want to do something which would result in the detachment of these men from the service. However, I feel it is only fair to them that they should have promotion within grades.

TERM OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT AT SHAWNEE, OKLA.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. During the present session of Congress two identical bills were introduced, one in the Senate and one in the House, providing for the holding of a regular term of the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Oklahoma at Shawnee, Okla. The Senate passed the Senate bill on April 24 and sent it to the House. The House has passed a similar House bill and sent it to the Senate. The latter bill is now on our calendar, being Calendar No. 2059, House bill 11994. In order to adjust the matter I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House bill, and in event the House bill shall be passed, that the Senate bill be recalled and thereafter indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11994) to provide for the establishment of a term of the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Oklahoma at Shawnee, Okla., which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a term of the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Oklahoma shall be held annually at Shawnee, Okla., on the first Monday in October: Provided, That suitable rooms and accommodations for holding court at Shawnee are furnished without expense to the United States.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be recalled from the House and that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TERMS OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT AT WILKES-BARRE, PA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the first committee amendment to the pending Navy appropriation bill.

Mr. KING. I suggested the absence of a quorum and then withheld the suggestion.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator further withhold his suggestion of the absence of a quorum for a moment and yield to me?

Mr. KING. I withhold the suggestion and yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, perhaps the hour of 1 o'clock has not as yet arrived, though it is 1 o'clock by my watch, and that is what controls me. There was a special order set for today, as will be perceived from the first page of the calendar, according to which at 1 o'clock the Senate should proceed to consider the bill (H. R. 11098) to provide for terms of the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania to be held at Wilkes-Barre, Pa.

Mr. ROBINSON. That order was made by unanimous consent; therefore, the Senate, at 1 o'clock, will proceed to its consideration.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that is 1 minute's time before the bill will be laid before the Senate. Does the Senator from Arizona wish to discuss the bill in that interval?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Arizona wishes to proceed now.

Mr. ASHURST. If I may proceed now it will save some time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the special order the Chair lays before the Senate House bill 11098.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11098) to provide for terms of the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania to be held at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, on page 2, after line 4, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two additional judges of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the terms of the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania shall be held at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., on the second Monday of April and second Monday of September of each year: Provided, however, That all writs, precepts, and processes shall be returnable to the terms at Scranton and all court papers shall be kept in the clerk's office at Scranton unless otherwise specially ordered by the court, and the terms at Scranton shall not be terminated or affected by the terms herein provided for at Wilkes-Barre: Provided further, That this authority shall continue only during such time as suitable accommodations for holding court at Wilkes-Barre are furnished free of expense to the United States.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two additional judges of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the bill simply provides that the terms of the United States district court shall be held at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., without expense to the United States. The Senate Committee on the Judiciary added an amendment which proposes to authorize the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint two additional district judges for the southern district of New York. I now ask that the Senate reject the amendment reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the vote just taken eliminates the amendment from the bill. The Committee on the Judiciary are unanimous in their opinion that the House bill should pass. There is a real need for holding terms of court at Wilkes-Barre and such terms of court are to be held without expense to the Government. I perceive both Senators from Pennsylvania are present, and I ask them to bear me out as to the necessity for holding terms of court at Wilkes-Barre.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I desire to say that I hope the bill will pass in its present form.

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I, too, hope this bill, which is similar to the measure introduced by me in the Senate, will be passed by the Senate for the following reasons: I know that 25 percent of the population of the court district live in the county where Wilkes-Barre is located, and the holding of terms of court at that place will be a great convenience to the people who live there and at the same time will reduce expense to the Government.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, as I understand the parliamentary situation the amendment which was reported by the committee providing for the appointment of two additional judges in my city has been rejected?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. Then the bill in its present form relates only to affording relief to Wilkes-Barre, Pa., by providing for the holding of terms of the district court at that place?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the parliamentary situation.

If there be no amendment to be offered, the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Inasmuch as the Senate has rejected the amendment reported by the committee, the amendment to the title will also be rejected and the title will stand in its original form.

NAVY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12527) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Logan	Radcliffe
Ashurst	Couzens	Lonergan	Reynolds
Austin	Davis	Long	Robinson
Bachman	Dieterich	McAdoo	Russell
Bailey	Donahey	McGill	Schwellenbach

Carey	Keyes	Overton	White
Connally	King	Pittman
Coolidge	La Follette	Pope

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, it has been published that there was intent to resort to what would amount to a filibuster against the pending naval appropriation bill. I myself have been credited with threatening such a filibuster. Nothing of the kind was ever threatened. I have said, and I still feel, that there ought to be will in the Congress for those who so feel to stand up and speak their mind concerning a growth and development which in the end can lead to only the very situation that the proponents of large defensive order contend is to be prevented. We have an example before us at the moment in the form of the current naval appropriation bill of how futile would be an effort at this time to accomplish material reductions in the total of the appropriation.

The pending bill calls for an appropriation of $529,125,806. No other appropriation by the Government compares with the outlay that is called for by the Naval Establishment. Appropriation bills for the Commerce Department, the Interior Department, the Agricultural Department, and all of those, excepting only by chance the Military Establishment, occasion all the way from 3 or 4 days to 2 or 3 weeks of consideration before committees. I am not prepared to say how long the pending bill was considered before the House Appropriations Committee, but I know that only a single day of consideration was given to it on the floor of the House.

I know that many who wished to be heard on this bill were denied a hearing by the House committee, and I know that when the bill came to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Appropriations the subcommittee appointed to deal with this measure for the Appropriations Committee spent the better part of 2 days considering the bill, and it took only a half hour for the entire committee to ratify what the subcommittee had reported, and now there is urge, or seems to be, to accomplish the greatest expedition in the passage of the bill through the Senate.

With respect to appropriation bills for other departments, we spend no end of time in quibbling about the appropriation of public funds, but it is to be observed that when it comes to dealing with appropriations for our Military and Naval Establishments there is eternally a will to proceed with all possible speed and to avoid, so far as possible, any reasonable debate upon the appropriations.

Last June the Senate committee investigating the munitions industry reported to the Senate, in part, as follows:

> In submitting this preliminary report on naval shipbuilding, the committee wishes to emphasize that it is interested mainly in two things:
> The first of these is that the naval defenses shall be provided for without profiteering or collusion.
> The second of these is that the national necessity for a purely defensive Navy shall not be confused with the private necessity of the shipbuilders for continuing profits as a consequence of the present close interdependence of the Navy Department and these private shipbuilders.
> The Navy is an instrument of national policy. Its growth and activities are watched abroad and take part in changing the foreign policy of the nations. Such changes work back to reshape our own national policy. The growth of a Navy contains within it the seeds of armament races and wars as well as the legitimate seeds of a purely defensive national life insurance.

Mr. President, as an example of how out of control all military appropriations have become, I think it would be well to indicate that, while we have before us at the present time the largest appropriation proposed for the Naval Establishment known in peacetime, there is very little that the Congress may do to eliminate any part of the expenditures called for unless we are ready to upset the existing order.

In other words, the pending appropriation is primarily one for maintenance and continuation of that which has already been authorized. The bill offers but one chance to accomplish anything in the way of economy. That chance is to be found on page 49, under the heading, "Replacement of naval vessels." The bill calls for appropriations to accomplish the completion of 32 vessels which have already been started by the Navy. It also calls for an immediate outlay to commence construction of 20 additional vessels. Therein, it would appear, lies about the only chance for Congress to accomplish an economy in this bill, by eliminating the item for new construction which involves approximately $115,000,000—that is, of course, unless we would prefer to disorganize what is now considered our Naval Establishment.

Mr. President, there can be no question concerning the influence and the effect of appropriations of this kind upon our international relations. I think none will deny that never yet in all the history of time has an armament race been followed by peace. We may go along generation after generation talking about the need in time of peace of preparing for war if we would make our peace secure; yet the fact remains that every large armament race has led to that which we sought to prevent, namely, war. Anyone who can view the step-by-step increase in our Naval Establishment during the last 12 or 15 years without discovering what it has caused other nations to do, and then can feel that we are pursuing a secure course, has a vision and a conception of things that is beyond my comprehension.

I read in the May 4 edition of the United States News a very interesting article under the heading "The world rearms. Uncle Sam keeps pace. Record-breaking naval fund approved by House. How nations are building up their war forces."

The opening paragraphs of this splendidly written article read as follows:

> Nations are beating their gold into battleships and their silver into cannon. Never before in time of peace has so much money been poured into machines of war, and oddly enough this same period has probably never been equaled for frequency of official proclamation of a desire for peace and good will.
> Compare the sums going into national defense today with those of another pre-war period, 1913–14, and what are the results? Roughly speaking, when changes in price and currency values are taken into consideration, the following is the picture.

Then follows the picture showing how virtually every power on earth has annually been increasing its outlay in preparation for war, to a point, I may add, where today the world is found spending more money getting ready for more war than was ever before spent in peacetime. Every power has been engaging in the program of increasing its military preparedness. While we may be inclined to point the finger of responsibility to other nations and blame them for setting the pace and for leading in this terrible armament race, the facts are that at this hour, this day, no power upon earth is spending more money getting ready for more war than is being spent by the United States of America. Today we are spending in preparation for more war approximately three times as much as we were spending in the name of preparedness the year before there came to earth the war that was going to end war. This year is going to find the United States spending to maintain its Military and Naval Establishments more money than it cost to maintain every department of the Federal Government, including the Army and Navy, back in 1913 and 1914.

It is not at all surprising, in light of our own steps respecting this armament race, that able men, unprejudiced men, should be standing in their places wondering what it is all about. I have great regard, as has every Member of the Senate, I believe, for Maj. Gen. William C. Rivers, now retired. A letter from him addressed to me and dated the first day of this month appeals as being most significant. I read from his letter:

> It is not possible to see what the Navy (and also the Army) authorities are driving at—unless they propose to force Japan to submission by our superior resources; i. e., to build and to mobilize, as it were, with the idea that Japan, with less gold and other funds, will cry out for mercy?
> That is a strange supposition of mine, but what else can they have in mind when building up such great armed forces? No proud people were ever yet subjugated by any such means. In fact, it is an excellent way to drive a proud people to a desperation—or madness—that can make but war.

I think in those two well-written paragraphs Major General Rivers thoroughly sums up the threat that seems to be involved.

What is it at which we are driving and what is it that we are aiming to accomplish through these vastly increased appropriations for our Army and for our Navy from year to year? Annually we hear in this Chamber and in the House of Representatives and upon the public platform the urgings of men that there is grave danger of war with Japan. Just now we seem to be getting a new slant. It is not only Japan. Today's newspapers and today's spokesmen are rather clearly indicating that our present fear and the immediate occasion for our efforts to obtain more capital ships is the fact that Great Britain is planning to build more capital ships, the thought being that we have to keep pace with Great Britain; that we should not for a moment think of letting Great Britain have an ounce more of naval tonnage than we have.

All of this is rather in keeping with testimony which was offered by military advisers before the House Committee on Military Affairs a year ago when they were indicating what was readily concluded to be the need for larger appropriations for trouble, if and when it came, with Great Britain; the need for additional appropriations that were going to insure our being more adequately prepared for what might come—no one expecting it, but for what might come with Great Britain. We had then even a suggestion as to 4,000 miles of international boundary, which for over a hundred years has had no demonstration of military preparedness upon it, that the United States side of that boundary should be fortified; which led, as we all remember, to rather grave conditions abroad.

In Canada and in Great Britain statesmen demanded to know why, and to answer and to allay the suspicion that seemed to have been engendered by the testimony of military men before the House Committee on Military Affairs, the President saw fit to issue a public statement in which he said in effect that the military men testifying before the House Military Affairs Committee were not speaking for the Military Establishment but were speaking only for themselves.

Then it will be remembered that in his desire to chastise someone, and to show his keen displeasure with the consequences of this testimony, the President proceeded to chastise the chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee for having permitted that information to become public. The chastisement was not of the men who had given the testimony, as well it might have been.

Today we have injected into this urge for larger military preparedness the thought that we shall be unprepared in the hour when Great Britain may have more than we have in the way of an established military machine. Day after day we are told that Great Britain is planning to build two new capital ships and that we in turn must be prepared to do likewise. The provisions of the pending bill are rather clear to the effect that we are making it possible for the Navy to build these two additional capital ships if and when Great Britain, or some other power, builds its contemplated additional ships.

I believe there is little thought on the part of Americans of the possibility of trouble between Great Britain and the United States; and down underneath all this urge for larger military establishments one invariably finds the thought that we are rather unprepared for the hour that may come when we shall find ourselves at swords' points with a great nation of people across the Pacific—Japan.

Japan and the United States today are engaged in a wild, mad armament race, when I think there is pretty general conviction that if Japan's Navy were 20 times as large as it is, and we had only what we have, in this day of modern warfare and plans for national defense the Japanese Navy could not get within hundreds of miles of our shores. I think that is pretty generally agreed that if our Navy were 20 times as large as it is, and Japan had only what she has today, in this day of modern plans for national defense our Navy could not get within hundreds of miles of any part of the Japanese shoreline. Yet we are selling ourselves the conviction that our defense and our success in the future are wholly dependent upon a larger, ever larger, Naval Establishment.

When we ask those who lead in the fight for a larger Navy how many ships we must have before we may feel that our defense is adequate, the answer is never a numerical one. The answer is always and invariably, "More! More! More!" If there are persons in the United States who think the increased burden that has been sustained from year to year as a result of increased appropriations for the Navy can be indefinitely borne, if there are persons who think that such a naval race can go on indefinitely and leave America strong, they had better be taking stock of what the eventual result must certainly be.

The race between Japan and the United States today finds many in the United States declaring that we have to be looking out for Japan, while at the same time the people of Japan entertain the same degree of conviction that they have to be looking out for Uncle Sam; that there is danger of Japan being attacked by Uncle Sam. Annually the military men of Japan go forth selling the people of Japan the thought that the increased appropriations by the United States together with the speeches about the danger of war with Japan, are clear evidence that the United States is getting ready to make trouble for Japan; and the people of Japan at once are subjected to appeals for larger Japanese appropriations in the name of national defense.

I hold no brief for the element which has dominated in Japan for so long, namely, the military; and yet, if one will but take the pains to ascertain the facts, he will quickly discover that the people of Japan as a mass have little or no sympathy with the Japanese military.

It was my privilege last fall to spend a number of days in Japan. It was my privilege during that time to enjoy contact with some 15 or 20 very representative Japanese citizens, men whose names would be recognized in any capital anywhere on earth, men representative of virtually every walk of life in Japan, excepting only the Army and the Navy, but men who then declared that the Japanese military had led in a direction and had gone to an extreme where the people of Japan could not carry the burden any longer; that their frontiers had been so far-flung by the military that they could not hope to afford the kind of national-defense establishment that would be adequate or sufficient, and that the military dominance in Japan would have died of its own weight long ago except for the fact that at least once a year the United States gives the Japanese military some ground or other upon which to stand when they say, "We have to be better prepared for the trouble that the United States is getting ready to make for us."

In my contacts with these Japanese citizens, there was prophecy last October on every hand that at the next popular election in Japan the people would show their keen displeasure with military dominance. Two months or three months after those personal contacts the elections in Japan occurred, with results which are known to us all today, results which substantiated the prophecies that had been made so early. The military in Japan were discredited, were clearly defeated, in those elections; and then we know, too, what an arrogant military establishment did in part in retaliation for its defeat at the polls. It went forth and murdered and slaughtered the public officials who had not taken so ardent a stand alongside the Japanese military as the military thought had been deserved.

Our expenditures for our Military Establishment are a constant source of concern in Japan, just exactly as the Japanese expenditures in the name of so-called national defense are a constant source of worry to the people of the United States. The race which is involved is one which certainly is not going to get us anywhere except into the very thing we are trying to prevent, except into the thing we are trying to avoid by the degree of defense we are building.

Our contribution to the establishment and to the continuation of the life of the military in Japan seems to me ought not to be overlooked. We are often apt and wont to place upon Japan the responsibility for the armament race that is going on today, when as a matter of fact we ought to be more carefully weighing what perchance may be our contribution to prolonging the dominance of the military in Japan. The race that is on between us now is a race that means much to everyone.

One hundred and twenty-five million Americans have much at stake in races which in the past have invariably led only to war. We have something else at stake. We have very largely at stake the expense that is entailed by reason of races of the present kind. But there are a few Americans who have something more at stake than do the great bulk of the American people, a few Americans whose prosperity is dependent upon a continuation of a mad armament race, with our own country a participant in the race.

Mr. President, we go forward from year to year appropriating moneys in the name of national defense when the actual preparation undertaken by reason of the expenditure of these public moneys is of plans not for national defense, but of plans for a national offensive.

The plans for the next war, under the existing National Defense Act, are not necessarily plans calling for the mobilization of forces upon acres of American soil, in our own harbors, or within a hundred miles of our own shores. In the main, our national defense plans call for the transportation again of 3,000,000 American boys across thousands of miles of deep blue ocean water in the name of national defense. And when it dawns, as it will, upon the people of America, that these appropriations are for something more than strictly national defense, the membership of this and subsequent Congresses is going to hear from home in no uncertain way. If I am not mistaken, if Members of Congress could be back at home at the present hour they would find there a degree of great displeasure with these increased appropriations.

Another thing is going to awaken the people of America ultimately. In the name of national defense we go forward perfecting armor plate, to make more secure our national defense. Within the last month in one nation of the earth there has been developed a new projectile which will pierce 12-inch armor plate, a projectile that, strictly speaking, makes every naval vessel on earth today obsolete, no longer of utility, easily subject to sinking, and to attack. It will not be long before spokesmen will be pointing out the need for substituting brand-new equipment for the present naval equipment and, of course, while we are doing that, other nations will be doing likewise.

In connection with the armor plate, we should never lose sight of the fact that all the armor plate that has gone into our present Naval Establishment has afforded a very profitable venture for the manufacturers of armor plate. They will not be displeased if there is substitution of something for the present equipment, something that will better protect against this new, powerful projectile, which can pierce the 12-inch plates.

We go on perfecting guns from year to year, and our military leaders buy these guns for our Army and our Navy. The purchase of those guns by our Government is a source of great satisfaction, of course, to the manufacturers of the guns. They want to sell more of them, and they do sell more of them. After they sell enough for our requirements, they go over the earth selling the same kind of guns to every other nation that will buy, including the same nations against which those very gun makers tell us we must be prepared to defend ourselves.

As an example, we may take the case of the Driggs Ordnance Co., producers of large ordnance, who perfected a new gun for mounting upon naval vessels, a very efficient instrument. Our Navy thought enough of it to buy a sufficient quantity to arm a limited number of our naval craft. With that sale consummated by the Driggs Ordnance Co., Mr. Driggs sent his salesmen to Europe to sell the same gun over there. The Europeans are not very quick in buying that which they do not have a chance to see, and the salesmen, without a sample of this new gun, weighing tons upon tons, decided that their best prospect lay in Turkey, and to Turkey they went, striving to sell this newly perfected American-made gun to the Turkish Government.

The salesmen wined and dined the Minister of War of Turkey and the admirals and the generals day in and day out, but the Turkish officials would not buy, feeling that they could not expend the public moneys for that which they did not see.

One day into the harbor of Constantinople came the good American battleship Raleigh, one of the very few equipped with this new type of gun, and onto this vessel were invited these salesmen and the emissaries of the Turkish Government. Accepting the invitation, they were shown what a fine instrument this new gun was, and before long the salesmen for this American corporation had an order for the sale to Turkey of guns like those which had been sold to our Navy in the name of national defense.

We go on perfecting gases, poison and otherwise, selling them to our Army and to our Navy in the name of national defense. Then the producers of those gases send their representatives into other lands to sell the identical gases there—of course, in the name of national defense.

Some things have been discovered by the Munitions Committee which I think reveal that the munition producers are not always the bad type they have been painted. For example, a few years ago an American gas producer desired to sell gas to the Turkish Government. The Turkish Government was considering producing its own gas, whereupon the American company offered to sell the plans and specifications for the erection of the kind of a plant suitable to the need of producing this gas. This American company was quite willing to sell the Turkish Government its formula for the production of the gas, so that they could produce their own gas. The American company's salesmen were at work striving to develop a line of business with Turkey, and during those very days and hours the same American company had its salesmen at work in Turkey undertaking to sell gas masks to the Turkish Red Cross—a very considerate lot of people; looking to the future, of course.

One must sense the motives behind a large part of this constant urge for more and more and ever more national defense with no enemy in sight. We go on perfecting our aircraft, and then selling the perfected aircraft not only to our own Army and Navy but to the military establishments of other lands, including Japan.

We go on perfecting our powder formulas, and then our private industry sells those formulas to other nations against whom we provide a national defense, to other nations, including Japan, that seems to be constantly on guard against us.

We go on perfecting radio to expedite and to make simpler the matter of communication among our naval craft in time of war, and then other powers come into possession of the same degree of improved equipment.

The fact is, Mr. President, that if there shall ever come the war between Japan and the United States, which is so much talked about just before the annual appropriation bills are acted upon, our forces, our own sons, somewhere out on the Pacific, are going to encounter their foe, and from underneath the waves the transports upon which they travel are going to be targets of torpedoes charged with explosives manufactured in the United States, or with explosives manufactured under formulas sold to Japan by producers in the United States; and the torpedoes will be discharged from submarines, which are built only because the American Electric Boat Co. sells the designs and the patent rights and specifications to other nations, including Japan.

From overhead, from out the zooming airplanes, will come bombs loaded with shrapnel that once knew its home to be the United States, sold to Japan to the great profit of some Americans.

Every one of the airplanes which attack our forces as we move across the Pacific will be powered by a motor either manufactured in the United States or manufactured in Japan under rights sold to Japan by American corporations.

Yet we continue shouting that we have to look out for Japan, and go on arming, to the profit of some few Americans, and over in Japan the people are thoroughly convinced that they have to be prepared for that war which the United States is getting ready to wage against them.

When the question is asked why they think we are getting ready to do anything of the kind, invariably they point to the increasing appropriations made from year to year, and they place the appropriations alongside the speeches which are made by Members of Congress indicating the need for a great national defense against the trouble which is coming from Japan. Here we are fooling ourselves while the Japanese are fooling themselves into believing that there is will to war between Japan and the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAPPER in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NYE. I gladly yield.

Mr. KING. I am sorry to disturb the Senator in the excellent presentation which he is making; but, having mentioned Japan, I am tempted to call to his attention a matter with which he is familiar; namely, that a number of years ago, when the United States announced a large naval program—one calling for several hundred million dollars—and also a program calling for several hundred million dollars for the War Department, an official of the Japanese Government who was a member of the Japanese Diet, interrogated a member of the cabinet as to the reason for such large naval appropriations being requested by the Japanese Government. In response to the interrogation, the official of the Government stated that "the United States has increased its appropriation, and we must take cognizance of the activities of the great power on the other side of the Pacific Ocean."

So, our increase in appropriations undoubtedly led Japan to demand larger appropriations. Our course caused fear on their part and precipitated their action. Lord Lothian recently said that whenever one nation arms ostensibly for the purpose of preparedness, other nations are led to arm; and he further said that these armaments led to periodic wars.

Mr. NYE. A rivalry which leads to the one thing that is most profitable to the few who engage in the production of materials for so-called national-defense requirements.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have been very much interested in trying to find out if any reasonable man can explain under what circumstances we can ever have any trouble with Japan. I cannot see any reason why there should be any fear of trouble with Japan. I have never met anyone who could explain to me why there should be any such fear.

Mr. NYE. I may say to the Senator from Minnesota that we have people who think Uncle Sam ought to be a policeman over in the Orient, and that when other nations do things over there which we do not like, even though toward people other than our own, we ought to be ready to move in and take a hand at straightening out unfair things that are being done. There are other people in the United States who are equally insistent that one morning we shall awaken to the discovery that the Japanese have seized the Philippine Islands. Then there are other Americans who ask the question, "If that shall come to pass, what are we going to do about it?" and I am at a loss to know what to do about it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do not think there is any ground for suspicion that Japan would take the Philippines.

Mr. NYE. I entertain no such suspicion; yet I think if Japan ever were inclined to take the Philippine Islands we could not successfully defend them, even though we had a Naval Establishment five times as large as it now is. To have so large a Naval Establishment is not to be thought of. We could not carry such a load. We could not afford that kind of defense.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. My observation of the subject has led me to believe that the question is more one of interest in oil and oil markets in the Orient than interest in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. NYE. I think the Philippine controversy is little deserving of our consideration as respects our relations with Japan.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Of course there is propaganda going on all over the country, fostered to a large extent by persons and organizations who claim they are working for peace. They are spreading the propaganda that, of course, we cannot keep out of the next world war. They say we cannot keep out. Then there are other persons who think it is our duty to punish bad nations and help good nations punish bad nations. That propaganda is going on in this country all the time. I think it is just as dangerous a propaganda as that which brought us into the World War.

Mr. NYE. Decidedly it is. It is as dangerous, or even more so.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It is fostered by organizations which say they are for peace.

Mr. NYE. That is too often true.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Such organizations supported the London Naval Treaty, the treaty which makes possible the pending naval bill. Every Member of the Senate who voted for the London Naval Treaty ought to vote for the passage of the pending bill, because it would be perfectly consistent for him to do so. The London Naval Treaty was hailed as a disarmament treaty. However, it laid the foundation for just the kind of program we are now considering.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I apologize to the Senator from North Dakota for interrupting his speech. I am compelled to leave the Chamber to attend a meeting of the Finance Committee, which is trying to raise $600,000,000 or $700,000,000, a large part of which will be required to meet the $525,000,000 expenditure called for by the pending bill.

Mr. NYE. I venture to guess that it will take Congress much longer to devise ways to pay the bill than Congress will require to spend the money that has to be raised by taxation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the Senator may tell his constituents that Congress will increase the burden of taxation, now so heavily bearing upon them, and that our children and our children's children and perhaps our children's children's children will not escape some of the burden of taxation which we are now piling up.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I was making a point of the fact that a great many Americans who are eternally urging us into more adequate preparation for war are getting a large profit out of preparations for war. I was making the point that Americans who are enjoying profits from our preparations for national defense are taking profits out of their sales of materials for national defense to other nations, including those which may some day be our foes in war. Of course, no one should conclude that I am alleging that such a practice is one which is wholly American. It is a practice which is common the world over, a practice which is as old as the game of war itself. It is a practice which 20 years ago made one European the richest man in all Europe. He went forth arming all Europe with the same identical instruments of warfare, and then, after the war was over, he was honored by all Europe for his great service to mankind during the war!

Right now, though, over across the Atlantic there is a picture which is constantly threatening the peace of the world. Right now the French are arming Germany. I have before me a very interesting item which was printed in a newspaper a month ago or less being a dispatch from Paris under the heading:

French steel trust piles up profits selling Hitler material for arms to menace France.

I read as follows:

FRENCH STEEL TRUST PILES UP PROFITS SELLING HITLER MATERIAL FOR ARMS TO MENACE FRANCE—16,000,000 TONS OF ORE A YEAR SENT TO GERMANY FOR WAR MACHINE

By Pierre van Paassen

PARIS.—France is arming Germany! Her munitions makers, like those of other lands, know no fatherland but profit.

If Herr Hitler felt strong enough March 7 to defy the world, tear the Locarno Treaty to shreds, and install himself on the Rhine with heavy artillery, monster tanks, mobile forts of steel, and bombing planes, this was made possible by the French mining trusts.

Seventy-five percent of the steel in Germany's artillery and other war equipment comes from France. Seventy-five percent of the shells and bullets which would kill French soldiers or the soldiers of nations allied with France in the event of war with Germany are of French origin.

STEEL FOR HITLER GUNS

An average of 60 freight trains loaded with iron ore left France for Germany every day in 1933, 1934, and 1935. The rate of export is even higher in 1936.

Germany has used 20,000,000 tons of steel a year since Hitler came to power to build up her gigantic war machine. Sixteen million tons of this ore came from France. If France is under the terrific pressure of a German army on her borders today, unable to maneuver and wondering if she must look on impotently as Germany attacks the allies of France in eastern Europe before turning against France herself, the French people may thank their own trust magnates. For these men are making a German victory discussable.

USE FRENCH MATERIALS

Those aerial torpedoes loaded with high explosives, those cylinders containing poison gas with which Goering's flying squadrons are loaded up, and the very bombing machines themselves which now lie ready at the ridiculously short distance of 180 miles from Paris, are made out of material that comes out of French soil. Hitler's giant Zeppelins could not be manufactured if France were not supplying the bauxite which is indispensable in the manufacture of aluminum.

The Socialist group in the Chamber of Deputies asked Premier Albert Sarraut before the adjournment of Parliament, March 18, what measure the Government intended to take to stop this colossal export which menaces the security of France. Sarraut did not reply.

USED FOR EXPLOSIVES

When I went to the Rhine recently—

The author of this article, Mr. Pierre van Paassen, said—

I saw a string of trucks being examined at the French custom station before passing over the international bridge into the Reich. These trucks contained cotton waste and silk waste, and the next day I learned that the Tourcoing mills in France exported to Germany in 1 month 1,700 tons of wool, cotton, and silk waste, 200 tons of cotton thread and 350 tons of silk waste. All this material is used to manufacture explosives.

An expert, Paul Allard, has figured out that of every two shells Germany fires off in the next war, one will be of French origin. That is to say, one out of every two shells fired by Germans to kill Frenchmen in the next war will represent a profit to the Comite des Forges, the great French Steel Trust.

The main reason why France doesn't put a stop to the export of war material is that French public opinion is dominated by great newspapers which are the property of the same Comite des Forges, the same steel and munition trusts which are piling up profits in supplying war material to Germany. And these same munition trusts gave financial support to Adolph Hitler before he came to power.

So, Mr. President, let us not assume that our American companies are the only ones engaged in the game of arming all the world with the same identical instruments of warfare which are to be used in our defense when the next emergency comes.

I think my colleagues in the Senate are not among those who have been free in declarations that there has been a purpose on the part of the Munitions Committee to undermine our own national defense. I think there are in the Senate no more insistent advocates of national defense than are the men serving upon the Munitions Committee. Yet when we stop to weigh and see what is being done in the name of national defense today, when we stop to think that the plans calling for these mad appropriations from year to year contemplate wars thousands of miles away from our own shores again, surely it is time that we exercise the liberty of criticising those things that are being done in the name of national defense.

Let us take a look at our need for national defense. Can it be said that there is any power upon the earth less likely to be attacked by a foreign foe than is the United States? I think not. I think there is no nation on earth so fortunately situated as are we with respect to having to deal with that fear and that danger; and yet here we are spending more money in the name of national defense than is being spent by any other nation on earth, leading the armament race that is with us today, a race which can hardly expect to encounter any other end than that which armament races have accomplished in the past. They are always followed by war. I do not know by what right we anticipate that another armament race is not going to be followed by the same result that has accrued from armament races heretofore. Even when set forth to wipe out depressions, as we have been trying to wipe out a depression for the last number of years, our very first consideration is our national defense. We appropriate billions of dollars, which is intended to start the wheels of industry again, which is intended to afford employment for men, and our very first allocation of public-works money to accomplish such a result is an allocation to our Navy, to be used in building more ships, getting ready for more of the same thing that gave us the depression we are fighting. And so we take the public-works money and build more ships and get ready for more war, knowing full well that, as in the case of every other war, another war will be followed by more depressions, so that we can have another public-works program, perchance, with which to build more ships and get ready for more war.

Mr. President, there is an element in this country that relishes the idea of keeping the American people fooled into the belief that they are not adequately defended, that they are not adequately prepared to defend themselves against what may come from foreign powers. Privately, among themselves, this element talks about these appropriations in terms that are unmistakable and not in the terms they use when the public is listening in. When we listen in, their urge for more ships and more men and more armament is an urge for a better and more adequate national defense; but among themselves, when they talk about such appropriations as the one now pending before us, they call it by its right name; they call it "plunder", and then they forget to destroy the letters. One such example is clearly revealed in a letter written right after the passage of one of our naval building bills by Mr. H. M. Southgate, representative of the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., and written to the president of a great shipbuilding corporation. In the letter Mr. Southgate said:

I understand the morning after the bill went through every east coast yard had its representatives in Washington with their tongues hanging out and all teeth showing, ready to fight for their share of the plunder, and the only thing that stopped the west coast yards from being here was the fact that they could not come bodily by telegraph.

Among themselves, I repeat, when they consider the thing that we call national defense, they call it "plunder"; and if other Members of the Senate, with my colleagues and myself, upon the Munitions Committee could have followed the revelations, they would have realized how tremendous is the plunder enjoyed under the big building programs by shipbuilders and others who have that which is needed to arm our ships with that degree of armament for which our national defense, according to their estimate, calls. There is tremendous profit in keeping the world fearful of itself. There is for some people tremendous profit in these mad armament races.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I gladly yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. POPE. Has it occurred to the Senator as being interesting that the National Economy League, from whom we hear constantly with regard to economy in all sorts of matters, never writes a letter protesting against naval appropriation bills or Army appropriation bills?

Mr. NYE. It has never struck me as being at all strange, and I know it is not a strange thing to have been encountered by the Senator from Idaho, because the Senator from Idaho, like myself, knows who are the sponsors of these so-called economy leagues and liberty leagues. The Senator from Idaho does not anticipate that the Du Ponts, for example, who go forth annually urging great economy, great cuts in appropriations for the Labor Department, for the Commerce Department, for the Interior Department, and other departments, are going to urge any reduction in appropriations for the Army and Navy when such appropriations are what have made the Du Ponts the power and force they are in the world today.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I am wondering if my friend from North Dakota has received any protests from chambers of commerce in the United States against the size of the military and naval appropriations this year and last year?

Mr. NYE. The Senator asks a question that is nearly a repetition of one that I asked my office force this morning; and they made search for any evidence of an appeal from chambers of commerce protesting against these Army and Navy appropriation bills. There were none.

Mr. BONE. The United States Chamber of Commerce has its headquarters here in Washington, D. C., and as I read in the newspapers, in an attempt to understand the position assumed by that dignified body, I gather the impression that it is violently opposed to the prodigal expenditures, as it charges and calls them, of the New Deal, and yet we now confront the fact that this year and last year this Government will have expended well over $2,000,000,000 for preparedness. I am wondering if that has excited or is going to excite a murmur on the part of the United States Chamber of Commerce, because $2,000,000,000 is a sizable portion or part of the money we have spent in rehabilitation, feeding the poor, trying to give the average poor fellow a break in these dreadful times.

Mr. NYE. Does the Senator from Washington anticipate that there will be any protest from the United States Chamber of Commerce?

Mr. BONE. I think the Senator from North Dakota is sufficiently familiar with my frame of mind and my viewpoint to know that I do not expect even a ripple out of the United States Chamber of Commerce although we should spend $5,000,000,000 a year in so-called preparedness.

Mr. NYE. Certainly.

Mr. BONE. I am merely trying to get from the Senator some expression of opinion, if he is willing to give an expression of opinion, as to why big business, typified by the United States Chamber of Commerce, does not see fit to murmur against the size of these appropriations but snarls all the time against appropriations for the W. P. A. and other necessary remedial operations of the Government.

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator for his observations. I have been making the point that, as a Nation, we were so fortunately located that we perhaps needed to fear less than any other power on earth attack from abroad; and yet our outlay in the name of national defense and in preparation for war is greater than is the outlay of any other nation upon this earth.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for what may be an unfriendly interruption?

Mr. NYE. I always gladly yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I am moved to make this suggestion because of an observation made by the Senator from Washington and also by the reply of the Senator from North Dakota. It seems to me the Senator from North Dakota and other Senators who are opposed to large Navy appropriations assume that the purpose of the Navy and the Army is to defend our country against invasion. Has it ever occurred to the Senator that great armament might have another use?

We have just had an illustration in Ethiopia of what can be accomplished by modern armament by going into another country and capturing it and taking it over. That glorious victory which Mussolini has obtained over the Ethiopian Government fills all his countrymen here with pride and admiration. It seems to me that victory would not have been possible had not his Government made preparation for great armament and for a large Army and Navy. We find him going into Ethiopia, winning some glorious battles without the loss of very many of his men, without meeting a single defeat, but capturing the cities of Ethiopia and subjecting its people to his rule.

Not only do we find him victorious on the battlefield, but victorious in the air. He has gone over Ethiopia by airplane without meeting a single defeat, without losing a single airplane, I understand. Not only is he victorious in the air and on the land, but Mussolini has not lost a battle on the sea in this war. He comes out of the war victorious. Ethiopia comes out without any fleet. Ethiopia has not an armed vessel left. It was a great victory for Italy. It was an ignominious defeat for Ethiopia. By means of his preparation for war Mussolini has given an exhibition of how it is possible to destroy an armed people and to murder more babies than ever before in the history of the world in the same length of time.

Is not that sufficient glory to encourage us to go on and arm and rearm and arm again and build new battleships to get ready for that kind of emergency, which may come to us at any time?

Mr. NYE. The Senator prefaced his question with something in the nature of an apology for asking what might be an embarrassing question. In answer to the Senator's question I am going to ask him an equally embarrassing one. With the terrible Ethiopians put in their place, is there any longer need for us to make preparation to do for Mussolini what he has done for us?

Mr. NORRIS. I gladly answer the question. Ethiopia is not the only "pebble on the beach." There are several other African countries. There are some countries perhaps on our own continent that we may want to conquer tomorrow.

What about Liberia? Italy has not yet taken Liberia. Could we not use our Navy to go over there and capture that country? By the way, we loaned Liberia a lot of money during the World War because she was one of our allies and helped us in the great World War to bring about a victory for peace in a war against war when we made the world, including Liberia, "safe for democracy."

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator from Nebraska. He and the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] are greatly concerned about our preparation for going away from home, if need be, to wage war. The Senator from Washington is eager to know what in the world it is that keeps the United States Chamber of Commerce from violently protesting these huge and ever-larger appropriations for our Military Establishment. I would not even insinuate it, I may say to the Senator from Washington, but I wonder if by any chance the chamber of commerce contemplates that the time may come when we will want to engage in some expedition, not necessarily into Ethiopia or Liberia, but, by chance, to Nicaragua, where some few Americans have large interests at stake? Does the Senator from Washington think that might be at all an influence in that consideration?

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I gladly yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. I have, as has the Senator from North Dakota, rather definite notions about what some of those gentlemen would like to do if they deemed it necessary to do it. I do not want the Senator to think I am trying even to interrupt his speech. I hope he will be patient with me.

Mr. NYE. The Senator improves my speech.

Mr. BONE. I thank the Senator. I have been impelled to examine at some length some of the arguments advanced in behalf of an American merchant marine which seemed to be tied in with the argument for a national defense. I have saved not only dozens but hundreds of clippings from most highly vocal exponents of an American merchant marine. In examining and breaking them down to find the very heart and essence and soul of the argument for an American merchant marine, this one factor stands out, and I think the Senator from North Dakota might in his speech find it of advantage to the country to elaborate a little on the thought which I am about to suggest to him.

The leading argument for a great American merchant marine has this particular thought running through it like a red string through the warp and woof of a rug. It is that we must have ships capable of carrying large numbers of troops not for short distances but for thousands of miles, with a cruising radius and range running into thousands of miles. I am wondering what the American merchant marine, which is to haul troops thousands of miles, is really being built for? On the one hand is the argument for national defense. Obviously, we do not have to defend this Nation on the shores of Asia or Africa. I cannot imagine a defense of America on the shores of Africa, either the east or west coast. Therefore I am compelled to view that sort of argument with some misgivings.

Has the Senator any thought to give us in the way of enlightenment as to what this sort of argument for a merchant marine, which is to convey troops thousands of miles, might have to do with the picture he is now developing before the Senate?

Mr. NYE. I have tried to make the point during my argument this afternoon that, strictly speaking, the national-defense plans toward which we appropriate year after year are not plans contemplating war here at home. They are plans, as the Senator so well knows, contemplating the transportation of millions of American youth to other shores, to other lands, where they are to defend our homes, our wives, our sisters, our sweethearts, and our mothers from attack.

There, it seems to me, is the whole nub of the argument concerning the ever-increasing appropriations for military establishments. We are not content to plan strictly for national defense. We plan for a national offense, if need be. Our military leaders have often said that the best defense is a strong preparation for a strong offensive.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. Gladly.

Mr. POPE. A very interesting lesson has been brought out within the last few weeks concerning the value of national defense. France spends $630,000,000 a year for national defense. A considerable portion of that amount is expended in the building of a line of forts along the French-German border, the finest forts that have ever been constructed, with long lines of corridors, electric elevators, and all modern conveniences. When I was in France last summer I talked with a number of people who said that they felt secure now that they have these forts, because they believed Germany would not again come across that line.

In an issue of Time about a week ago it appeared that Hitler, since he has been operating the Saar coal mines, has dug a channel under each one of those principal forts and has mined them so that within a minute or two he can blow up the principal forts which, over a period of years, have been built by France for her defense.

It seems to me that is a very good illustration, after all, of the so-called "defense" that may be provided over a period of years. The difficulty is that as soon as a defense is built up, some counter defense will be built up which will destroy it, and that is one illustration of it.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, to localize the same point, we have felt that today the larger part of our naval equipment, armed with 12-inch armor plate, was sufficient to withstand any modern guns that might operate against it; yet within the past month there has come the development of a new projectile which will pierce 12-inch armor plate, which at once, as I have previously today remarked, makes obsolete all of the world's present naval armaments. We shall never catch up with ourselves in these wild races. We never have done so; we never shall.

I come back to the point I was making: If we in the United States could content ourselves with providing an adequacy of national defense that would be sufficient easily to repulse a foe that might attack us, I venture to say that we could have that degree of national defense for hundreds of millions of dollars less cost each year; but we are not satisfied with that. At least, those who lead in our thought in the matter of national defense are not satisfied with that. I do not think 1 percent of the people of the United States have any fear of attack from a foreign foe upon our shores or upon our lands; and yet we go on making preparations on a scale that would let us meet a hundred wars, or a hundred attacks from a combination of foreign foes. There is no fear of attack from abroad. There has not been for many, many scores of years during the lifetime of this country.

Abraham Lincoln, in his day, asked the question:

> At what point shall we expect the approach of danger? Shall we expect some trans-Atlantic military giant to step the ocean and crush us at a blow?

Then he answered it:

> Never! All the armies of Europe, Asia, and Africa combined, with all the treasure of the earth (our own excepted) in their military chest, with a Bonaparte for a commander, could not, by force, take a drink from the Ohio or make a track on the Blue Ridge in trial of a thousand years.

He asked the question from what source we need fear attack, and he answered the question and said it could not come from abroad; that our undoing must come from within ourselves.

There is no danger of attack from abroad; and yet, I repeat, we go on spending more than is being spent by any other nation on earth in the name of national defense. We say to ourselves we are rather forced now to make this appropriation, for example, of half a billion dollars for our Navy for the new year. We did our best to accomplish understanding among nations. We tried to get out of this mad naval race. We had our delegates over at London more recently, earnestly striving to bring about an understanding which would let us reduce our naval budgets; but Senators know what the result was. Our representatives told us Japan would not agree, and this nation and that nation would not do as we wished to do; so we signed the treaty, which I rather suspect some day will come to be known as the famous Swiss cheese treaty, for it seems to eliminate the last vestige of any effort to control or to limit naval armaments. In any event, it is because of failures like that, after we have done our best, that we are obliged to engage in these mad naval races.

I wonder, as I often have wondered, whether there was really a sincere, honest desire at London last winter to bring about anything resembling a degree of disarmament. I seriously doubt it.

Only 3 weeks ago one of the American delegates to the London Conference returned home. When he landed in New York he was met by a bevy of newspapermen and photographers, all of whom were exceedingly anxious to know what he thought of the treaty that had been signed at London, and what he thought of the results of the conference. This spokesman of ours, our delegate to a disarmament conference, in answer to those queries by the press, said:

I do think we haven't lost a damn thing. We've still got our 10,000-ton cruisers.

That was the statement of the American delegate. That was the spirit of his report on accomplishments at London—"We haven't lost a damn thing", to use his own expression. Who was this delegate? Admiral Standley, who yesterday and the day before appeared before the Senate Appropriations Committee to support and to urge the enactment of the bill which at the present time is before us; Admiral Standley, one of our delegates at a conference which anticipated reduction in our naval force; Admiral Standley, whose training, whose whole background is one of preparation for war, whose whole background is one that dictates not disarmament but armament, one who is trained in those things. I suppose it is fair to assume that he went to London with an open mind; it is always fair to assume that; and yet I go back to a speech he made only last September at Atlantic City and also at Philadelphia in which he was deriding those who were opposed to these so-called national-defense programs; a speech in which he declared that opponents of the naval building program were—and I quote his words—

The greatest menace to the stability of our Government and to our national security.

So I take it that our national security and our stability as a government are dependent upon the prevention of any understanding that will let us get out from under these budgets which are increasing so terribly from year to year.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NYE. If the Senator will permit me to go one step further with this thought, I shall be glad to yield to him.

In support of Admiral Standley's great interest in accomplishing something that will let us get out from under this burden of naval armaments, I should like to point out, if I may, that there came before our Munitions Committee one day a character by the name of A. P. Homer, whom I am sure members of the committee will never forget. While he was before us there was produced from the files a letter which Mr. Homer, representative of the shipbuilding industry, had written back in 1933, in which he suggested to the shipbuilders that they might do well to come down to Washington and talk things over with "the gang." The Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] has not forgotten that particular experience. I will read part of Mr. Homer's letter, pointing out that the public-works program which had just been enacted was going to permit large shipbuilding programs. He said:

We are on our way, and all of the nations had better watch their step, because we have found ourselves again. From what I can gather, we are going ahead to a full treaty-strength Navy, and we are going to do it quick.

I think it would be very wise for you to come down to Washington in the near future and talk to the gang.

For more than an hour our committee sought to get Mr. Homer to tell us whom he meant by "the gang", and he finally consented to tell; and among those he named was Admiral Standley, who, upon his return from representing our interests in London 3 or 4 weeks ago, declared that we did not lose "a damn thing" at the London Conference.

I now yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that I have no quarrel, nor have I ever had a quarrel, with the principle of adequate national defense. The statements I have made on this floor, and the questions I have seen fit to ask other Members of the Senate who were discussing the subject, I think should have suggested to them my own attitude of mind.

I listened to the testimony before the Munitions Committee, to which the Senator has adverted, the statements of the most vigorous and highly vocal proponents of national defense, and I found myself in some measure agreeing with them. I thought we ought to have plenty of purely national defense; that we should adopt those tactics and that technique which would best lead to an adequate national defense. Therefore, at all times during my connection with the Munitions Committee I suggested the necessity of making very certain that we should have an adequate national defense, particularly in the Navy; and for that reason I desired to see our navy yards expanded to a point where they could handle this program.

By the expenditure of what is now a comparatively small, even a microscopic sum, something like $23,000,000, we could build graving docks and construction facilities in our Government navy yards that would handle our naval expansion program even in a so-called naval race. For that comparatively tiny sum we could put our Government in position to handle a program of national defense; and yet, for some obscure reason which perhaps the Senator from North Dakota may make plain, although I have never yet found anyone who has made it plain or attempted to do so, the Navy Department objected to that. They were highly vocal in insisting upon an adequate national defense, and yet apparently, for some obscure reason, desired to cripple our best defensive arm, the navy yards of the country, at a time when we were told—deliberately, coldly, purposefully told—that national defense was of most vital importance to the Republic.

I assume that to be true, and I cannot understand, and I never will be able to understand, why the Navy Department wishes deliberately to cut off its right arm and destroy the efficiency, in a measurable degree, of its navy yards, where it could, under pressure, build all the new ships called for under the new naval program.

If the Senator from North Dakota has any information which would enable him to shed any light on this peculiar attitude of the Department, in one breath saying we must have and insist upon an adequate national defense, and in the next breath as definitely asking the Congress to cripple the institution which would permit us to have an adequate national defense, I wish the Senator would make that obscure position plain, not only to the Senate, but to the country, because to me it is inexplicable that the Navy would send a man to London to make a fight for the right of the United States to have an adequate Navy, and come here and suggest to me, and to other Members of the Senate, the necessity for adequate appropriations for a Navy, and then deliberately cripple the one agency, which, with the expenditure of $23,000,000, could provide a naval defense which these gentlemen insist is necessary.

I repeat, I believe in an adequate national defense, and because of that, and because of my own patriotic impulses and my own love of country, I do not like to see any man in public life deliberately set his hand in a ruthless fashion against the instrumentalities which in themselves would ensure this Republic, which millions of men have died to preserve, not only the control, but the absolute, outright fee-simple ownership of facilities where ships could be brought into existence as speedily as men could build them.

I say again, there seems to be an obscure reason why we do obeisance always at the shrine of shipbuilders, at the shrine of private airplane agencies. A bill which came over from the other House contained a provision which deliberately struck down the naval-aircraft factory at Philadelphia, and I cannot understand that. Two years ago there was a fight on this floor, and by dint of the greatest efforts we wrote into the bill then before us, which came out of the Naval Affairs Committee, of which I am a member, a provision that the Government should expand a little plant in Philadelphia which was becoming obsolete, which had gone into a condition of innocuous desuetude, that it should breathe the breath of life into that plant, so that it should become a yardstick which might prevent ruthless profiteers from rooking the Government.

The Senator will recall the statement in bold type, by men interested in a private airplane plant, that in time of peace one plant had piled up profits of 1,142,000 percent, and those profits, the Senator from North Dakota will recall, according to the estimates then made, and under the figures that were disclosed, represented profits of 11,420 times the entire capital of that plant in 6 years, in peacetimes, made out of the Senator's Government and mine. And men call that patriotism, and under that sort of black flag of business piracy they cheat this Government mercilessly, brutally.

Men who would do such a thing in wartime would be taken before a drumhead court martial, and would not be allowed to repeat it. But when we bring those men here, we meet with opposition, and I do not like that sort of attitude toward national defense.

Mr. NYE. I wonder whether the Senator's statement that had that occurred in time of war there would have been grave consequences is borne out by the facts.

Mr. BONE. It was suggested to those gentlemen that if they were guilty of one-millionth part of that sort of treason to this Government in time of war they would be shot. Men who do such things have the blood of treason in their veins.

Mr. NYE. But the Senator knows and remembers well that there were American corporations during the war, in the most critical hours during the war, that would not respond, that would not comply with the requests of their Government, until they could have a guarantee of a certain amount of profit.

Mr. BONE. I understand that. If the people of the Republic had been privileged to hear the testimony before the Munitions Committee, of course, there would be a change here. But we need not expect to have men who have no reverence for the flag, no innate love of country in their hearts, but who have only an insatiable greed for money, and are willing to strike the Republic a blow in the face of its enemy, actual or potential, to feel any other way. The time has come when we ought to serve notice on these men that while we are ready to pay legitimate profits, we cannot stand for such things as these.

I know the Senator is too familiar with this sort of thing, perhaps, to make necessary any comments, but I hope the time is coming when the Senate and the House will put an end to that kind of business. That is why I hope that when this bill goes to conference we will not permit the destruction, what would seem to me the wanton destruction, of the airplane plant in Philadelphia, which can, in its own feeble way, set up some sort of yardstick to protect the Government against men who would rook it. That is precisely what that sort of thing means, and I think the Senator and others should join with the rest of us—and I am sure he feels that way, because he joined us in the Munitions Committee—and make provision for the Government producing some of its own munitions.

Then, in the face of that sort of a proposal, we shall see how patriotic some of the flag-waving munitions boys in this country are. They want preparedness as long as they do the preparing, with the profit I have indicated, 1,142,000 percent in 6 years, the profit, or a substantial part of it, coming out of their Government.

I hope the Senator, feeling as he does about this question, will join with us who feel that preparedness is right and proper and patriotic, but who would get the hands of these men, who are almost racketeers, out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. NYE. I do not know why the Senator from Washington refers to them as "almost racketeers." I think they are the most clearly defined racketeers there are in this country.

The Senator asks why it is that the heads of our military establishments are so violently opposed to the Government going into the business of producing its own national defense requirements. I wish I could answer his question. I entertain the same thought that is in his mind. I should like to know, I should like to be informed, as to just why they feel that for the Government to manufacture its own munitions would be poor policy. We know, of course, their arguments, oft repeated, that we need private industry when war comes because, with the emergency of war on our hands, we could not hope to meet our own needs as a government, that we need private industry. By the same token our Army and Navy spokesmen declare that it is good policy for American corporations to sell American-made national-defense machinery to other lands, including those which might be our foes in another war, because only in that way can we build up that large capacity that will make it possible for us to meet our own needs when war comes.

They might better put it another way, and say that we should go on arming other nations because only in that way can we be adequately prepared, in capacity, when and if the other countries we have armed decide to use against us that with which we have armed them.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. NYE. Gladly.

Mr. BONE. It is obvious, from the testimony before the committee, that for approximately the price of one 10,000-ton cruiser of the modern type we can expand our own Government navy yards and install the equipment to a point where they can take care of the program which gentlemen insist is so vital. I am assuming they are correct, and I am not challenging their conclusions in that regard but I cannot understand why they object to putting their own Government in position to protect itself and to do its own work in a great crisis. They tell us that in case of war we will have to strain every nerve and have to be bilked and robbed again by profiteers, as we were in the last war, because of lack of preparedness.

I have suggested to these gentlemen that the way to get prepared is to get prepared, and for $23,000,000 we could put our navy yards in such condition that they could do what was necessary. The navy yard in Philadelphia could be expanded so as to accommodate the new welding machinery and all the other modern, up-to-date machinery necessary to replace the now obsolete machinery in the yard.

I think the one great question that stands out is why men who are so highly vocal in demanding national preparedness, in the next breath decry the efforts of Senators and others with our viewpoint who want to afford the Government means of having an adequate national defense. Let us have an adequate national defense, but let us have it in the hands of our Government, where it belongs, instead of in the hands of the gentlemen who piled up enormous fortunes during the war.

I recall one volume I read during the war which showed one outfit reporting war profits of 299,000 percent in 1 year, which was 2,999 times the capital of that firm, though probably the figures were subsequently adjusted. It was like the Government going to a farmer in a moment of great national peril and saying to him, "Sir, we want your farm for 1 year", and taking that farm and raising thereon the commodities and the products necessary to sustain our Army in the field, and then turning the farm back to the man at the end of a year and saying to him, "For the use of your farm for 1 year we are now going to give you 2,999 farms just like it." That is what that picture means. Men did that sort of unholy, unhallowed, vicious thing to their Government, a Government preserved by the blood of the boys who died on the battlefield. The profiteers did that sort of thing to the flag that waves over them and protects their business; yet apparently we cannot get a hand raised against the repetition of that sort of thing. We loaned to Europe the money which came back to the profiteers in gigantic profits. Europe never has paid those debts, and today we are laying the lash of the taxmaster upon the shoulders of every American citizen and sweating him in taxes every year to pay the debt represented by the defaulted European bonds, which in turn represent the profits which went to the American profiteers and racketeers during the war; yet apparently we cannot get any relief of a substantial nature. A cold-blooded lawyer who knew his business would build a defensive legislative technique, but it seems we cannot stop the profiteering in time of war. We are going along blindly, possibly headed into another war stripped of national defense, stripped of the means wherewith to put an end to war profiteering.

I wish the naval appropriation bill and the Army appropriation bill provided that the Government should manufacture enough of its necessary munitions of war to make it impossible for another outfit ever to do to our Government the sordid, vicious things which the record brought before the Munitions Committee showed were done by profiteers to the Government which now protects them with its police force. I think the record of what was done during the World War by profiteers smells to high heaven; it reeks. I think the nastiest chapter in American history was what these men did to the Government which protected them.

Mr. NYE. The Senator from Washington knows that I share fully the views and wishes he has expressed; but he leaves the question not fully answered, and I am afraid it will remain not fully answered. He asked why our Military Establishment stands up so unequivocally in opposition to Government manufacture of its own national defense requirements. I cannot answer his question. I wonder, however, if the same thought lurks in the mind of the Senator from Washington that I find often playing around in my own. As the result of the inquiry into the munitions industry, the Senator recalls how often it was revealed that executives of American companies were Colonel This-or-That, or Admiral Thus-and-So, men who had been in the service of their Military Establishment in years gone by, and who are now enjoying lucrative employment with private industry. Does that mean anything to the Senator, in answer to his own question?

Mr. BONE. I assure the Senator that it does. There is more than a lurking suspicion in my mind concerning the matter to which the Senator refers.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. BENSON. The Senator has partially answered the question I was about to ask; but does he not also think that possibly the economic philosophy which has been taught the young men whom we have sent to Annapolis and West Point may have a bearing upon the attitude which they now take as officials of the United States Government, whether it be at London or before Senate committees, in advocating certain ideas, and in opposing the program which the Senator proposes?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from Minnesota has put his finger upon a large responsibility for our general military frame of mind. We cannot train men in one direction and then expect them to operate in another direction. I am sure that if I had been trained at Annapolis or at West Point, one of my first desires would be to make the Navy or the Army a career, a profession as it were. I should, of course, hope for the earliest possible promotion. If I were out of Annapolis, I should hope for the day when I could command my own ship, and so would the Senator from Minnesota hope for the day of promotion which would take him up in the world. Then it follows that the man who makes the Navy his career would be destroying his own career if he by any chance argued against building more ships, because more ships always mean larger opportunity for promotion. If I were not anticipating staying in the Navy for a career, and if I felt that some day I should have to depend upon private industry to make a place for me, I think I should not oppose a private industry which might some day have a place for me when my time for retirement came. I think the Senator's reasoning is very logical.

Before the interruptions, which were altogether deserving, I was making the point of repeated failures of disarmament conferences. I told of what we received from the kind of representation Admiral Standley gave us over at London during recent months. It was not many years ago that we were undertaking the accomplishment of an understanding at Geneva.

We sent our delegation to Geneva, and while the delegation worked there our gun makers here in the United States were receiving letters from Europe, written upon stationery of the American Embassy, telling them not to worry; that nothing was going to be done at that conference to hurt their business. I think I have here one such letter. Yes; here is a letter written upon American Embassy stationery, saying:

> My secretary forwarded to me your letter with enclosure relating to the Geneva Conference which I am very glad indeed to have. It appears that I am to be designated either as a technical adviser or in some other capacity to attend this conference.

Remember, this is a letter written to gun makers here in the United States.

> I shall, therefore, be very glad to have any information that you may be able to give relating, either to the general subject, or to the interests of your company in particular. It is my desire to know as much as possible about the subject and I am sure that your advice will be helpful. Address me in care of the Military Attaché, American Embassy, 5 rue de Chaillot, Paris.
> My appointment to Geneva has not been announced, so far as I have seen, and in the letter to me from the War Department the matter was marked "confidential"—

Confidential, it would seem, to everyone excepting the business here that stood to lose money if real progress were made at Geneva—

> the matter was marked "confidential", therefore unless the publication of the matter had been made it will be best to say nothing about my connection with the Conference.

In other words, "If there is anything I can do here for you, just write me in care of the American Embassy. I am being appointed a confidential adviser to the American delegation." I suppose, for the purpose of the RECORD, it ought to be known who the man was who was going to see to it that no disarmament was accomplished. He was the leader in that day of the majority party in the House of Representatives, the leader of the Republican Party, my party, John Q. Tilson. We continue our efforts, anticipating that out of the services of such men we shall accomplish understandings in this world and break away from the increasingly terrible burdens which armaments are imposing upon us year after year.

Getting back to the immediate problems confronting us in the pending bill, I have before me a very interesting page taken from the May 4 issue of the United States News, formerly the United States Daily. I am going to read from an article appearing upon the front page of that issue under the heading:

> THREE GREAT SEA POWERS RACE AHEAD IN RECORD PEACETIME NAVAL PROGRAMS

At this point they approach the well-known 5–5–3 ratio of tonnage that formed the basis of treaty strength. Insistence by Japan on a 5–5–5 ratio is bringing termination of the naval agreements.

I shall ask that the entire article may be printed as a part of my remarks; I am not going to bother the Senate to read it all; but I wish to move to the second column and read a little further from the article.

> At the moment the United States is found to be pushing ahead fastest with new building.

Meaning naval construction—

Under construction for the Navy of this country are 3 aircraft carriers, 12 cruisers, 52 destroyers, and 13 submarines, involving a total net tonnage of 274,670 for 80 ships. * * *

The United States is preparing to build two dreadnaughts of her own if—

If—

Britain builds hers. Plans call for ships to cost $51,000,000 each. This country, too, is increasing enlisted personnel of the Navy to 100,000 from the present 93,500, and of the Marine Corps to 17,000 from the present 16,000.

I read further from the article.

What steps Japan intends to take to keep up in the procession is not revealed at this time.

I am not reading from some pacifist organ; I am reading from the United States News, which no one would charge with entertaining pacifist tendencies.

What steps Japan intends to take to keep up in the procession is not revealed at this time.

Insistence by Japan that she be permitted to build up to parity with Great Britain and the United States led to a scrapping of present naval limitation treaties.

Then as to plans for next year we find in the article:

Japanese plans are undisclosed.

But the British intend to lay down two 35,000-ton dreadnaughts, and it is to keep abreast of that move that Congress is authorizing the President to start work on two American dreadnaughts.

I now ask that the article, in its entirety, may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the United States News of May 4, 1936]

THREE GREAT SEA POWERS RACE AHEAD IN RECORD PEACETIME NAVAL PROGRAMS

Navies of the principal sea powers are building rapidly again.

Limits on the size of fleets, established at Washington in 1922 and at London in 1930, come off next January 1.

Japan today is pressing against those limits; the United States and Great Britain are striving hard to reach them in an unprecedented volume of peacetime naval building.

To keep abreast of the race, the American Congress this past week started to consider a $531,068,707 naval appropriation, the House quickly approving, and the British Parliament learned of plans to spend $396,336,200 on the British Navy. Both were without peacetime precedent for size.

RANKING OF BIG THREE

How, then, do the three biggest navies stand in tonnage at this stage?

The answer is provided by the pictogram at the top of the page, with figures as of April 27, 1936.

This shows: The British Empire, first, with 1,388,184 tons of ships built and building; the United States next, with 1,353,085 tons; Japan, third, with 866,654.

Each of these navies was nearing its treaty limits, Japan barely 2,000 tons away, Great Britain and the United States each 70,000 tons short. At this point they approach the well-known 5–5–3 ratio of tonnage that formed the basis of treaty strength. Insistence by Japan on a 5–5–5 ratio is bringing termination of the naval agreements.

But figures show that today's navies do not tell the whole story of what has happened to sea power since January 1, 1919.

The British Empire, as the pictogram outlines, reduced its tonnage of ships built and building by 52 percent, as compared with January 1, 1919, or from 2,891,758 tons 17 years ago to 1,388,184 tons today.

The United States, in the same period, reduced its Navy from 2,056,276 tons built and building to 1,353,085, or by 34 percent.

Japan, instead of decreasing, actually increased her naval tonnage in the 17-year period from 642,801 tons to a present 866,654 tons—an increase of 35 percent.

The result is that the United States Navy, on the basis of official figures, is far behind both Japan and Great Britain in the number and tonnage of modern fighting craft. Almost all naval building in this country stopped in 1928 and has been revived only in the last 2 years.

Thus, the Japanese and the British each possess six times the tonnage of modern destroyers possessed by the United States. The Japanese have 50 percent more modern submarine tonnage and a tonnage of under-age cruisers approximately as large.

AMERICA BUILDING FASTEST

At the moment the United States is found to be pushing ahead fastest with new building.

Under construction for the Navy of this country are 3 aircraft carriers, 12 cruisers, 52 destroyers, and 13 submarines, involving a total new tonnage of 274,670 for 80 ships.

Great Britain is building 50 ships for a total of 164,435 tons, while Japan has 35 ships under way involving 95,257 tons.

None of these countries has built a capital ship or dreadnaught since the 1922 Washington Naval Conference. However, at this time Great Britain is planning to construct two new first-line fighters of the dreadnaught type as soon as the naval agreement expires at the end of this year.

ON WITH THE RACE

The United States is preparing to build two dreadnaughts of her own if Britain builds hers. Plans call for ships to cost $51,000,000 each. This country, too, is increasing enlisted personnel of the Navy to 100,000 from the present 93,500 and of the Marine Corps to 17,000 from the present 16,000.

What steps Japan intends to take to keep up in the procession is not revealed at this time.

Insistence by Japan that she be permitted to build up to parity with Great Britain and the United States led to a scrapping of present naval-limitation treaties.

In the matter of naval expenditures the United States is far ahead of other nations. The bill now going through Congress calls for outlays of $531,068,707, compared with planned expenditures of $396,336,200 for the British Navy and $169,000,000 for the Japanese Navy.

When the building now under way is completed the three leading navies will look like this:

	Great Britain	United States	Japan
Dreadnaughts	15	15	9
Aircraft carriers	7	7	6
Cruisers	67	38	40
Destroyers	204	251	122
Submarines	61	100	70

PLANS FOR NEXT YEAR

The above tabulation of fighting vessels covers those now built and building. It does not involve ships now in the paper stage and being appropriated for.

Congress is authorizing $168,500,000 for new construction during the next fiscal year. Involved will be 84 vessels of various types, including 12 destroyers and 6 submarines.

The British plan to build 38 new warships in the next year, including 5 cruisers, 9 destroyers, 1 aircraft carrier, 4 submarines, and a variety of smaller miscellaneous vessels.

But the British intend to lay down two 35,000-ton dreadnaughts, and it is to keep abreast of that move that Congress is authorizing the President to start work on two American dreadnaughts.

Important additions to the air strength of the navies also is called for.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, we may say that we are not in any part responsible for this armament race which is so burdensome these days, but we are playing just as prominent a part, just as leading a part, as is any other nation upon the earth. We are giving just as much cause to others to fear that their defense is inadequate as others are giving us cause to feel that our defense is inadequate.

I go back to what I read from this article:

Plans call for ships to cost $51,000,000 each.

The bill now before us provides for two such ships. The President and the Secretary of the Navy, under this bill, will be at liberty to build those ships if and when the other countries do what we know they are going to do, build their dreadnaughts. Fifty-one million dollars apiece! Yet if the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BENSON], who sits before me, when the appropriation bill for the State Department was pending, had suggested increasing the appropriations provided for that Department amounting, as I recall, to between thirteen million and fourteen million dollars, by an additional million dollars to enable the Secretary of State to further the cause of peace in the world, he would have been guffawed off the floor for daring to suggest such folly in times such as these when we cannot balance our Budget, and it would have been said, "It is no time to be throwing the taxpayers' money around like that"; but when $51,000,000 is proposed to be appropriated for one ship a Senator is unpatriotic if he does not agree that we ought to go ahead and build that ship, regardless of the cost. It indicates our frame of mind. Millions, yea, billions for preparation for war, but exceedingly few dollars for so worthy a cause as preparation for peace.

Mr. President, I think one of the finest compilations revealing what is happening to the American mind in dealing with the general militaristic question is an article written by Oswald Garrison Villard and published in the very recent issue of the Atlantic Monthly Magazine. I know it will be felt that that might just as well be inserted in the RECORD, but a few Senators are here today listening, and to the end that they may hear and may know the facts set forth in this article, I am going to insist upon reading it, not in its entirety but some very important sections from it.

First of all, Mr. Villard sets forth a quotation from the President, as follows:

On some occasions in our history we have reduced our Army to a level unjustified by a due regard for our own safety. It was in the conviction that we had again drifted too far in that direction that I have recently approved acts of Congress to accomplish a partial restoration of the Army's enlisted strength and increasing the enrollment of cadets in the United States Military Academy.

Then Mr. Villard proceeds:

Thus spoke Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, to the cadets at the graduation exercises at West Point an June 12, 1935. Let us examine the facts as to the Army and see just how much basis the President had for the statements made to the young men to whom he had just praised West Point for teaching "honor, integrity, and the faithful performance of duty."

Before the Congress met in its regular session on January 1, 1935, and passed the new military legislation, which Mr. Roosevelt signed, the Regular Army of the United States stood at 12,278 officers and 123,823 men, or a total of 136.101. These figures were naturally exceeded in the years immediately after the war—1920, 1921, and 1922—when the total of officers and men stood at 192,790, 226,116, and 144,874, respectively. In 1923 the figure fell to 129,871, rising in 1924 to 139,579. Since that time it has never fallen below 131,000. In 1934 there were 2,016 officers and men more than in 1933. Plainly there is nothing here to justify any assumption that the President's statement meant that there had been a recent reduction in our Army. He must, therefore, have had in mind the post-war figure of 1921—226,116 officers and men.

He must also have been aware that never before in the history of the Republic has it maintained a Regular Army of so great a size—more than 130,000 men.

Had he looked at the growth of the officer personnel alone he would have seen, for example, that in 1915, when the World War was raging, we had only 4,701 officers to 101,195 soldiers. Today we have two and a half times as many officers to an army which, when Mr. Roosevelt spoke, contained approximately only 124,000 enlisted men. Plainly, so far as officers are concerned, there has not only been no reduction to call for the President's "partial restoration" but an increase of 261 percent in 20 years. Two vital facts Mr. Roosevelt did not mention: The officers in our standing Army are practically at the maximum figure in our history, not excepting the World War years; secondly, we actually have more officers in our Army today than there were officers and soldiers in it during the entire peace years from 1789 to 1861—years when we were conquering the West and constantly waging our Indian wars. At the outbreak of the Civil War the Army stood at only 10,000, all told. It is true that the National Defense Act fixes the maximum strength at 18,000 officers and 280,000 enlisted men; but surely the President could not have had this maximum in mind, since it has only been approached, as previously stated, in 1921.

Since the above figures show no justification for the President's assertion that we have been in one of those periods when we reduced our Army to an "unjustified level", let us look at some of the other branches of our Military Establishment. There is the National Guard. Perhaps the President had that in mind? But when we turn to the official figures we find that the State troops have been, since 1931, larger in number than ever before in our peacetime history. Today they total 184,593 officers and men, or a 100-percent increase since the beginning of the century. Actually there were, in 1934, 13,309 officers and 171,284 men as contrasted with 8,792 officers and 119,251 men in 1914, just 20 years previously. The President knows, of course, that since the federalization of the Guard, Federal payment for each drill attended, and huge additional national appropriations for the State troops, their actual military efficiency has increased not one hundred but several hundred percent over that of the period just before the War with Spain. As to this there is plenty of official testimony. Obviously the President could not have had the National Guard in mind when he assured the cadets and the country that we had reduced our forces to an "unjustified level."

Well, when we look further over the Army organization, we come upon a startling fact—since the World War we have developed a reserve of officers and men such as never existed before in our entire history. Beginning with 8 soldiers in 1913, it comprised, in 1915, 4,648 honorably discharged soldiers willing to be recalled to the colors in the event of war, with no Reserve officers at all. In 1933 we had the astounding total of 132,773 Reserve officers and 5,028 reserve enlisted men, or just 11,000 more Reserve officers than we had enlisted regulars in that year. Now it is true that the 1934 figures showed a drop of the Reserve officers to 114,357, but this list is naturally subject to considerable fluctuation because of deaths, resignations, officers reaching the age limit, and so forth. Unusual as this decrease is, it cannot, however, be the reason for the President's concern for our military strength, since we have 114,357 more Reserve officers than in 1914, and no less than 58,267 more than in 1920, when there were so many experienced veterans to draw upon. Clearly we have not only had no recession in our military preparedness here, but a steady and amazingly rapid increase.

Mr. President, I have read enough to indicate that we, the people of America as a whole, have been fooling ourselves into the belief that we were fast receding from whatever had been a militaristic attitude of other days and getting away from it, when, as a matter of fact, as a reading of the complete article so clearly reveals, our progress year after year has been steady, just a tramp, tramp, tramp that was constant, in the enlargment of our Military Establishment. It is only fair to assume that enlargement of that establishment is but reflective of the development of our spirit of militarism in this country. While we are decrying the military spirit of other lands I wish we might cease losing sight entirely of what has been so decided a militaristic trend here in our own country.

Mr. President, I ask that the entire article from which I have just quoted may be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE MILITARIZE

By Oswald Garrison Villard

I

"On some occasions in our history we have reduced our Army to a level unjustified by a due regard for our own safety. Today we have two and a half times as many officers to an Army which, when Mr. Roosevelt spoke, contained approximately only 124,000 enlisted men. Plainly, so far as officers are concerned, there has not only been no reduction to call for the President's "partial restoration", but an increase of 261 percent in 20 years. Two vital facts Mr. Roosevelt did not mention: The officers in our standing Army are practically at the maximum figure in our history, not excepting the World War years; secondly, we actually have more officers in our Army today than there were officers and soldiers in it during the entire peace years from 1789 to 1861—years when we were conquering the West and constantly waging our Indian wars. At the outbreak of the Civil War the Army stood at only 10,000 all told. It is true that the National Defense Act fixes the maximum strength at 18,000 officers and 280,000 enlisted men; but surely the President could not have had this maximum in mind, since it has only been approached, as previously stated, in 1921.

Since the above figures show no justification for the President's assertion that we have been in one of those periods when we reduced our Army to an "unjustified level", let us look at some of the other branches of our Military Establishment. There is the National Guard. Perhaps the President had that in mind? But when we turn to the official figures we find that the State troops have been, since 1931, larger in number than ever before in our peacetime history. Today they total 184,593 officers and men, or a 100-percent increase since the beginning of the century. Actually there were, in 1934, 13,309 officers and 171,284 men, as contrasted with 8,792 officers and 119,251 men in 1914, just 20 years previously. The President knows, of course, that since the federalization of the Guard, Federal payment for each drill attended, and huge additional national appropriations for the State troops, their actual military efficiency has increased not one hundred but several hundred percent over that of the period just before the War with Spain. As to this there is plenty of official testimony. Obviously, the President could not have had the National Guard in mind when he assured the cadets and the country that we had reduced our forces to an "unjustified level."

Well, when we look further over the Army organization, we come upon a startling fact—since the World War we have developed a reserve of officers and men such as never existed before in our entire history. Beginning with 8 soldiers in 1913, it comprised, in 1915, 4,648 honorably discharged soldiers willing to be recalled to the colors in the event of war, with no Reserve officers at all. In 1933 we had the astounding total of 132,773 Reserve officers and 5,028 Reserve enlisted men, or just 11,000 more Reserve officers than we had enlisted Regulars in that year. Now, it is true that the 1934 figures showed a drop of the Reserve officers to 114,357, but this list is naturally subject to considerable fluctuations because of deaths, resignations, officers reaching the age limit, etc. Unusual as this decrease is, it cannot, however, be the reason for the President's concern for our military strength, since we have 114,357 more Reserve officers than in 1914, and no less than 58,267 more than in 1920, when there were so many experienced veterans to draw upon. Clearly we have not only had no recession in our military preparedness here but a steady and amazingly rapid increase.

This is all the more striking if one recalls that that magnificent German military machine which swept into Belgium in 1914 did not have more than 45,000 reserve officers to man the large number of regiments that came to life on the day of mobilization. We have now, perhaps, twice as many for field duty (not all of the Reserve officers are to serve with troops, many being commissioned for staff duty and to be in charge of manufacturing plants in wartime).

If we total the three forces—Regulars, Reserves, and National Guard—we find that, whereas we had 212,742 men in all in 1913, we had 436,696 in 1934 and 482,000 in 1935, when the newly authorized enlistments were complete—a growth of more than 100 percent. Never before have we had such manpower in our land forces. Mr. Roosevelt apparently was ignorant of this, and forgot that this increase has been steady ever since 1898, when Regulars and National Guard comprised together less than 125,000 men.

Where is the justification for the President's assertion that we are in a position of decreased armaments and unjustifiable weakness?

II

Possibly the President had the financial aspect in mind? Perhaps Congress has been niggardly in its appropriations?

Well, in this matter, too, the facts are available. In 1913 the War Department's military expenditures (nonmilitary carefully excluded) totaled $108,382,063. With the approach of war they had risen in 1917 to $401,418,217. After 1921, when they were at $439,485,095, they began to fall off with the post-war demobilization. In 1922 they were $329,050,896; in 1924 they reached the low-water mark of $250,714,592. They then steadily rose to $309,762,555 in 1933, and dropped again to $279,122,789 in 1934. Even this drop of a mere $30,000,000, however, could not in itself warrant Presidential perturbation, especially in view of the fact that prior to Mr. Roosevelt's speech the Congress had appropriated $341,348,204 for the fiscal year 1935–36.

Although this sum is just under the appropriation for 1932 and 1933, in reality the Congress and the administration have, as we shall see later, actually assigned far more money to the military branch than in any previous normal year of peace.

Again we are thwarted in our search for the reasons for Mr. Roosevelt's belief that we have reached one of those periods in which we have carelessly neglected to keep up our military strength. If here, too, he had looked back over our history he would have found it hard to defend his thesis. In 1880 our total Army budget was only $27,322,433. Not until 1908 did it go above $100,000,000. Even in 1916, with war in the offing, it was only $122,392,316. It has since been increased by nearly 300 percent—in 19 years. Surely no one can indict Congress for niggardliness toward, or indifference to, our Military Establishment. And now Congress has added 46,250 more men.

The President must also have overlooked our air force—a new branch of the defense forces which was hardly in existence when he became Assistant Secretary of the Navy. No one can assert that we have been letting our air defense deteriorate, for, as with the Regulars and the National Guard, its growth is steady and its appropriations regularly increased. Thus in the last fiscal year it received the sum of $26,376,490. The 1936 War Department appropriation bill carries a sum which exceeds last year's appropriation by $22,000,000. More than that, a group of Congressmen called upon the President to go even further and raise the number of airplanes to the figures recommended by the commission appointed by the Secretary of War and headed by Newton D. Baker. This committee recommended an Air Corps of 2,300 planes, which, with the Navy's 2,100, authorized by the Vinson bill, will give to the United States the largest air force of any country in the world (unless Germany or Russia should go further), although we are protected by both the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans, and although the Baker Committee agreed with the Morrow Board of 1925 that "hostile air invasion" is "impractical." The Baker Committee felt that such an invasion might be possible in conjunction with land or naval forces, but not otherwise. The Morrow Board used these words: "Nor, indeed, is there any apparent probability of such invasion in any future which can be foreseen." Under the latest Army legislation additional air equipment is made available to the National Guard.

We still have another guess as to what the President had in mind. There are the Navy and the Coast Guard. Perhaps we have allowed these to deteriorate alarmingly? The records tell a totally different story. The Coast Guard, it is true, is only semimilitary, but is immediately taken over by the Navy on the outbreak of war, as in 1917. It has grown since 1915 from 53 ships, 255 officers, and 3,886 men, to 246 ships, 455 officers, and 8,950 enlisted men in 1935. Appropriations during that same time have risen fivefold, from $5,000,000 to $25,000,000 in 1934, going as high as $31,000,000 during the height of its warfare on rum smugglers during prohibition. It was not until 1890 that the appropriations for the Navy reached the sum of $22,000,000. No lagging here. Insofar as this force supplements the Navy and acts as a reserve, there is the same story—a steady increase in numbers and appropriations, with no basis for any Presidential complaint.

Now for the Navy. In 1913 we had 3,019 naval officers and 48,068 sailors in the service. Ten years later the figures had risen to 8,099 officers and 85,290 men. Last year, 1934–35, we had 8,087 officers and 81,411 men. This year, 1935–36, the enlisted strength appropriated for is 93,500, and for the fiscal year starting July 1, 1936, President Roosevelt has made it known that he recommends an average strength of 96,000, or a maximum of 100,000. Whereas in 1913 there were no reserves of any kind, officers or men, we have today a reserve of 9,571 officers and 33,102 men. The number of sailors actually authorized by Congress is 137,485, and 9,493 officers are also provided for. As there were only 51,500 enlisted men authorized in 1913, Congress is thus willing that the Navy should enlist two and one-half times as many today, though it has not yet appropriated pay for the total number of 137,485. If we turn to the financial side, President Roosevelt again has no cause for complaint, for the Navy's annual bill has risen from $133,262,862 in 1913 to no less than $460,000,000 in 1935, for the present fiscal year, which includes $100,000,000 for new ships and a sum sufficient to purchase 555 new aircraft.

But this is not the whole story of the astounding rise in the cost of our naval armaments. For the first time in our history, as a result of a national emergency, the Army and Navy are receiving sums from two sources—the regular appropriation bills voted by Congress and the huge sums awarded by the emergency branches of the Government which are seeking to create employment.

It is exceedingly difficult to find out just how much money has thus been ladled out. The P. W. A., for example, had in August only one copy left of its 23-page tabulation of allotments, and it is even more difficult to get figures from the $4,000,000,000 work-relief program. Moreover, the figures may be changed at any moment by additional awards of large sums. Here, however, are some figures which indicate what is happening. From June 1933 to April 1935, $279,780,459 was granted to the Navy and $100,600,755.50 to the Army, or a grand total of $380,381,214.50. Assuming that half of this will be spent in the fiscal year 1935–36, the total annual bill for the Army and Navy will reach the sum of $1,000,000,000—$190,000,000 from the P. W. A. plus the regular appropriation bills of $460,000,000 for the Navy and $341,348,204 for the Army. If anything, this is an understatement, as there are still other sources, such as deficiency bills, which grant money to Army and Navy. In 1865, the last and the most expensive year of the Civil War, the total Army and Navy bill was but little more—$1,153,936,306. It is also worth noting that the regular Budget of the Government for all purposes for the fiscal year 1916–17, during which we entered the World War, was but $1,178,908,963. The Regular Army and Navy appropriations for 1935–36, without counting in P. W. A. contributions, are higher than the total cost of running the Government in 1916.

When it comes to the Navy ships, here, too, no one can charge the present administration with failure to increase our forces, as it is building no less than 102 aircraft carriers, cruisers, destroyers, and submarines to bring the Navy up to the treaty strength authorized by the London Conference. The first installment of this program, which is almost unprecedented in our history in peacetimes, was paid for by $238,000,000 of the sums quoted above as having been allotted by the P. W. A. In July of this year there were under construction 2 aircraft carriers, 3 heavy cruisers, 7 light cruisers, 10 submarines, 41 destroyers, and 2 gunboats. In August contracts were awarded for one light cruiser, one aircraft carrier, three destroyers of 1,850 tons, five of 1,500 tons, and three submarines. There still remain, then, 11 more vessels, 1 cruiser, 7 destroyers, and 3 submarines to be built as part of the 1936 building program. Not even the wildest jingoes can charge that this is other than rapid progress toward the jingo goal—namely, the largest navy in the world.

Finally there is the Marine Corps. This, too, has shared the growth of the other branches of Army and Navy. In 1913 it had only 342 officers and 9,921 enlisted men. Ever since 1923 it has had 27,400 enlisted men authorized, with 16,000 appropriated for, and between 1,010 and 1,074 officers, the latter being the authorized strength for the current fiscal year. The United States Marine Corps Reserve was created in 1922, and its authorized strength, both enlisted and commissioned, is one-third of the strength of the active Marine Corps. The corps cost, in 1913, $7,558,233.78; in 1923, $25,495,948; and for the present fiscal year the appropriation is $23,768,110. Here again there has been no letting down of standards to cause the President or anyone else uneasiness. As more ships are added to the Navy, moreover, the Marine Corps will naturally be increased in proportion to the increase of the Navy.

III

When one reviews the legislation passed by the Congress in its last session and signed by President Roosevelt with the excuse already cited, there is still further ground for astonishment. Never was a peacetime Congress so ready to hand out money for military and naval purposes. It not only gave to General MacArthur and the War Department everything they asked, but more besides. The number of West Point cadets was increased from approximately 1,374 to 1,960 until the year 1941, and $5,000,000 more was given to the Military Academy to take care of them—the Naval Academy at Annapolis received a similar increase of 531 additional midshipmen from the Naval Affairs Committee, and will have 2,391 in 1937. The House Military Affairs Committee's argument was simple enough. There are a number of universities which have 10,000 students, therefore West Point should have more students. The War Department backed this up by pointing out that the enlarged Army would need a larger annual number of graduates to fill the vacancies.

But the good will of Congress did not stop there. Being told that there was a "hump", or block, in promotions in the Army owing to the large number of officers taken in after the World War and the presence in the upper grades of relatively young men, Congress promoted by one act no less than 4,355 officers, or a third of the entire commissioned force, each one grade, despite the fact that there was a very considerable weeding out of officers with many consequent promotions in 1934.

There were on April 20, 1935, 174 colonels of Infantry to 40 regiments, and 77 colonels of Cavalry to 15 regiments; the disproportion is greater now because of the recent promotions. Congress authorized the drawing in of 1,000 reserve second lieutenants to serve 1 year with the Regulars, which custom, if continued, would increase the number of Regular officers by another thousand, and will inevitably lead to a new demand for more regiments to give these officers experience. By some oversight it failed to appropriate the money therefor, but doubtless this will be remedied in the next deficiency appropriation bill.

Congress also provided an annual 14-day training period for 20,000 instead of 16,000 Reserve officers. It provided 97 more planes for the Air Corps than were allowed in the President's Budget. It increased the National Guard by 5,000 enlisted men and, as already stated, added 46,250 men to the Regulars. It then appropriated $4,452,304, an increase of $1,000,000, for many additional units of the Officers' Training Corps in high schools and colleges. In 1913 there were 57 such institutions giving military training under War Department direction. By 1933 the number had risen to 399. In 1913 there were 85 officers and men on duty in such schools and colleges; today there are no less than 1,658. The citizens' military training camps also received an extra $1,000,000 to enable them to train 30,000 instead of 14,000 for 42 days each. Congress gave more money to the Quartermaster's Department for the upkeep of military posts than was allowed under the Budget, and it revived the national rifle matches, dropped in past years for reasons of economy.

But this does not include everything On July 31 Congress voted a new promotion bill to hasten promotion by increasing the percentage of colonels, lieutenant colonels, and majors, and decreasing the percentage of company officers. The bill introduces a new principle in America, the promotion of every officer in the lower grades after a certain number of years' service. It also offers attractive retirement privileges in order that more men will retire, and it gives the President power to retire officers on their own application after 15 years' service. This means, of course, a further proportionate increase in the retired list of the Army, which, according to the latest figures, comprises 3,258 officers. Still Congress was not satisfied. It passed a bill creating six new huge air bases intended to cost $120,000,000, the money to be provided by the Public Works Allotment Board. While the location of these fields has not yet been decided, there was an immediate rivalry among various cities for the awards, which helps to explain why the enlarged Army program is welcomed in some quarters.

The first base is to be in Alaska, the second in the Pacific Northwest—both to protect us from the Japanese—a third probably in Denver, one in the Southeast—that is, North or South Carolina—one in New England, and one near the Caribbean, presumably at Miami. Could any Santa Claus have done more for the Army and Navy?

As a result of all this generosity, we get the following table of the number of Regular and National Guard soldiers and sailors in service in the current fiscal year:

Regular Army, officers and men	177,600
Navy, officers and men	103,000
National Guard, officers and men	190,000
Coast Guard, officers and men	10,500
West Point and Annapolis cadets	4,400
Total	485,500

In addition, the following table shows the number of Reserves drilled this year in schools or colleges, citizens' training camps, the Reserve officers' training camps, etc.:

Reserve officers	20,000
Citizens' training camps	30,000
School and college students, etc	150,000
Navy Reserves (estimated by Navy Department)	9,900

Thus we have a grand total of 695,400 in uniform during the present fiscal year. These figures are obviously unprecedented in our history and to many will recall in these days of Facist dictatorships the warnings of George Washington and other founders of the Republic as to the dangers of a large standing Army.

So unusual was this attitude of Congress that it is no exaggeration to say that if the country were in imminent danger of war it could hardly be more lavishly determined to increase our armed strength. Why is this? There are several answers. First, accustomed to ladling out billions under the New Deal, Congress has acquired the habit of spending and accordingly authorized the new air bases, which the press reports will cost $120,000,000, with no more hesitation than it voted two or three millions of dollars a few years ago. Second, there is no question that Congress was much alarmed by the grave danger of another war in Europe. Third, all the bogies as to our "coming" war with Japan were trotted out. The minutes of the executive sessions of the House Military Affairs Committee, which by some slip were printed and published, contain all the same old yarns long since exploded. One was of a Japanese fishing fleet of 150 vessels based on an island near the mouth of the Panama Canal and being met from time to time by steamers from Japan with fresh replacements. Congressman DOCKWEILER, of California, rehashed all the familiar rumors. "Every time our fleet goes out from Los Angeles Harbor for target practice it never fails to meet in the open roadstead a Japanese oil tanker standing out there or a Japanese fishing boat. * * * It is always a Japanese boat that is out there, and one commander told me that when he went up to this [sic] craft to advise Mr. Japanese that the United States was having target practice he actually recognized a high ranking officer in civilian clothes of the Japanese Navy that he had met socially." This happens, he said, every time that our fleet goes to sea to practice; but he did not specify if it was always the same high ranking officer or the same high American officer who always met him and recognized him and whether the Japanese wore the same "civilian clothes of the Japanese Navy" or some other kind of clothes.

Mr. DOCKWEILER next told the horrified and obviously gullible committee that the Japanese fishing boats "are built in such a way that you can within a very short space of time erect a small cannon or machine gun on them", which is hardly surprising, since there is not a 30-foot yawl or tug in any American port or summer resort upon which the same thing could not be done in a couple of hours. Worse than that, he said, they "carry a pressure tank sufficient to contain pressure sufficient to launch torpedoes off those boats"; but this valiant Congressman plainly does not know that you cannot launch a torpedo from any craft without a most elaborate torpedo tube.

Mr. DOCKWEILER's "seein' things" did not stop there. No, indeed. There is an equipped Japanese Army in California of 25,000 men "that could be under arms immediately if there was any disturbance." His authorities were not the government of California or of the United States and our Secret Service but "the American Legion and our chambers of commerce out there." The Japanese also "have gymnasiums under the German plan where at nighttime the school children may parade and go through all the motions of military training in the little halls."

Said the chairman, whose eyes were evidently starting from his head, "What do you mean by 'equipped'? Do you mean they have arms?" The dialog then continued:

"Mr. DOCKWEILER. How could we stop them from having them, Mr. Chairman?

"The CHAIRMAN. But do they have arms?

"Mr. DOCKWEILER. We think so.

"The CHAIRMAN. Well.

"Mr. DOCKWEILER. That is something that would bear further investigation.

"The CHAIRMAN. Now, living in that situation and being raised in it, I assume, Mr. DOCKWEILER.

"Mr. DOCKWEILER. Yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. What is your interpretation of the attitude of mind of the authorities—the controlling authorities of the Japanese?"

Mr. DOCKWEILER was not stumped. His own brother had been in the Diplomatic Service for 10 years. He was once stationed in Tokyo for a year and a half and was now able to say things he could not in those bygone years. "He has told me many of the stories that I am relating to you. The situation is this: The Japanese have never struck an enemy that was able to fight back." Which explains, of course, why the Russians never fought any battles in Manchuria in their war with Japan. And so on for pages and pages. Is it any wonder that the shocked Military Affairs Committee voted on the spot for the six new air bases?

IV

The pity of it is, from their own point of view, that these frightened gentlemen of House and Senate and the President who signed their bills never stop really to inquire (1) whether we now have an effecient Army and Navy; (2) whether we are developing our services in accordance with a well-thought-out plan for the defensive wars which every President and every Congress insist are the only ones we shall hereafter fight; we never yet have fought a defensive one; (3) whether the measures voted make for an increased efficiency; (4) whether our actual armaments (aside from men) are efficient; and (5) whether this whole procedure is compatible with American traditions and our signing of the Kellogg Peace Pact.

As to the first, there is the greatest doubt. A former instructor at Annapolis has recently published a book which is so astounding an indictment of the Navy that in any other country it would have caused an immediate parliamentary inquiry and the disproving of the charges as mendacious and malicious or the complete overhauling and reorganization of the service. It has been entirely ignored by Congress and the service, but not answered. It was followed by Admiral Sims' frontal attack in the Atlantic for September 1935 on the Navy promotion system, which the best officers admit is not bringing to the top men adequately trained to command squadrons and fleets.

As for the Army, probably the severest critic is not a pacifist nor a disgruntled civilian nor a carping Senator, but the commander of one of our four armies, the third, Maj. Gen. Johnson Hagood, whose headquarters are at San Antonio. Writing in the Saturday Evening Post, he has declared that our national-defense system could and should be four times as effective for the money we spend, which, as the figures above prove, is now $1,000,000 a day or more. Fortune, in a long study of the Army situation, has recently pointed out that the Army has no less than 67 generals to 165,000 men, where Henry Ford has 9 to 125,000 men; that there are actually only enough of the newly invented semiautomatic Garand rifles on hand to equip a single regiment; that there is only a "handful of tanks"—94 in all; and that our artillery is in large degree antiquated. Were Congress eager for the most efficient army they would certainly ask themselves why ours is proportionately the most heavily overofficered army of first rank in the world. They would inquire whether the reason given for this great superfluity of officers, who can obviously only take turn and turn about in service with combatant troops, namely, the need of suddenly officering in wartime an army of several millions, is an adequate one. As in the case of the Navy, they might also ask whether our officers are obtaining the best professional training possible.

As for the general military policy of the country, the Congress has largely been going on the theory that we must be prepared to duplicate our effort of 1917—that is, be prepared to raise, equip, and train an army of 4,000,000 men, although no competent military authority believes that even any combination of powers could launch a sudden attack upon American shores. Experts believe an attack could never take place unless England were among our enemies. Anyone who wishes can figure out how many ships it would take for the Japanese to land an army of even 500,000 men upon our shores, if there were no opposition to such a landing, by simply referring to the number of ships needed to transport the first half million of our men to France, plus all their stores, ammunition, artillery, airplanes, tanks, motor vehicles, huge motorized artillery, poison gas, and chemical-warfare utensils. Even that would not, however, give the true figure, as military men agree that the impedimenta of an army, the size of the guns, the proportion of airplanes, and so forth, have so largely increased since 1918. One of our ablest Navy officers believes that it would take one-third again as many ships as in 1917. Since the statistics of the Japanese merchant marine are quite available, anyone with a pencil and piece of paper can amuse himself by figuring out just how many troops with their necessary supplies could be transported by that entire merchant marine, and the same can be done for the French Army, or any other that our military men conceive to menace us. I have met a number of foreign officers, and I have never yet found one who believed that a large-scale invasion of the United States was practical.

Congress, which is so eager to develop our Army, ought to take heed of the remarkable statements of Maj. Gen. William C. Rivers, retired, a veteran of three overseas wars and a successful commander in France. He told the Military Affairs Committee that "we do not need a great force with our self-contained country, and without powerful aggressive neighbors, and with excellent systems of communication and the Navy as our first line of defense. * * * I do not visualize any mass invasion of us by any country—overseas or elsewhere." He urged, like many, many others, a single department of national defense, headed by a secretary, with three undersecretaries of army and navy and air. He severely criticized the training at West Point and the training in the Army, saying that both are dominated by Prussian ideals inherited from Frederick the Great—the methods "which were never suited to the American disposition and character."

Since General Rivers even went so far as to suggest the abolition of the absurd West Point uniform, he can hardly expect that he will be listened to. Yet he made the extremely sensible suggestions that there should be a national-defense council in Washington to coordinate the entire defense system and supervise it, and that there should be a Federal commission of civilians to study the whole problem as to whether this Nation needs an Army, and if so, for what purposes, and what the national military policy should be.

Of course, General Rivers put his finger on the blackest spot in the Army situation, and one that could be remedied almost overnight by Franklin D. Roosevelt as Commander in Chief, with or without the cooperation of Congress. That is the historic policy of scattering the Army all over the country in small posts—"small towns", General Rivers called them—and so frittering away the strength of the garrisons and making it impossible to bring together permanently large bodies of men for the tactical and strategical training of officers as well as men. General Rivers himself, although a graduate of West Point and a lifelong soldier, testified that he never saw a brigade together until he took one into action at Chateau Thierry. This evil of the small posts is purely political and it has existed inexcusably ever since the Civil War—as, for example, the location of the post at Helena, Mont., many years ago because of the political influence of Senator Carter, when there was no sound military reason for putting it there and every reason why it should not be placed there, the only purpose being to boost the town and give the shopkeepers another source of revenue.

There are 120 of these posts, and they average about 700 men each. The 10 army postgraduate schools are scattered in 10 different places, with total garrisons of 11,000 men. Were they brought together in one, there would obviously be vast economy, after the initial expenditures for additional barracks, and so forth, and the 11,000 concentrated troops could be utilized to give to higher officers experience in handling brigades, divisions, and a corps. General Rivers quoted General MacArthur, lately Chief of Staff, as saying that of the 90,000 soldiers stationed in the United States proper, some 30,000 are not available for military duty because they are drawn off to work as laborers in keeping the grounds of these posts in order and for repair and police and other work. General Hagood has pointed all this out and so have hundreds of others over a long period of time. Yet the President, who is so concerned over our having "neglected" our defenses, is utterly uninterested in the prospect of such a saving and such an increase in the Army's efficiency. It is safe to say that if this proposition were made to the House of Representatives every Congressman in whose district a military post is situated would fight to the last the proposal to remove his garrison—even if he were told that it meant increased danger of that fanciful Japanese invasion. This is an interesting illustration of the way the Army becomes a vested interest and a commercial asset.

V

The point is that we have completely swung away from our old American opposition to militarism and large military forces. For this the American Legion is partly responsible, but so are our patriotic societies, and so are those who really believe that the Republic is so menaced by subversive elements that they wish an increased Regular Army to "assure us domestic safety." One Congressman was reported in the press as saying that the reasons the Army bill passed the House so easily were, first, the disturbed conditions in Europe and, second, the need of more soldiers to keep industrial peace and to combat the reds. Since the reds succeeded in polling only 125,000 votes out of 39,816,522 cast in 1932 in the entire United States in the middle of our worst depression, with some 12,000,000 unemployed, and have as yet caused no symptom of revolution, it is obvious that the more important reason is the possibility of the use of the enlarged Army against our laboring fellow citizens.

In part our changed point of view is due to the fact that, with our entry into the World War, we in many respects aped foreign countries in things military. We copied their Sam Browne belts, their khaki, their uniforms, their numerous decorations, their trooping of the colors, their laying of wreaths upon dead men's graves. Somehow many Americans really believe that we cannot be a great, a powerful, or a noble country, or a leader among the nations, unless we can prove that we have a Nation in arms. One of the saddest fallacies in our entire handling of the naval disarmament problems has been the belief, even of as kindly and earnest a man as Norman H. Davis, that we must have a big navy in order to have "our share of the pack at the poker table"—to which they liken the disarmament conferences. Otherwise, our rulers thought, we could not be in a position to bluff the other nations into disarming.

The net result of that policy is that we are now burdened with the largest Navy in our history, which it is alleged will soon cost us $550,000,000 a year to maintain; and disarmament, like prosperity, is still in the offing. The worst of it all is that the American people have no means of expressing their wishes in the matter, any more than they could vote as to whether their sons should be drafted to die in a war which has nearly ruined us and netted us precisely nothing, except our worst depression.

One of the most serious phases of our rapid militarization is that arming is becoming identical with increased worship of the State and the inculcation of the cult of nationalism, which has reached its finest flower in Italy and Germany. Not a few of the most patriotic defenders of our Constitution and our Republic against the "subversive elements" are, by the way, quite outspoken in their admiration for the "efficiency" of the Nazis and the Fascists—like the late Elbert H. Gary, who denounced all reds but gave an interview in which he said that America should find a Mussolini at once and put him in the White House. Nothing subversive there! Soon after the war the War Department undertook a "patriotic day" in which all the militia, reserves, veterans, and so forth, were to don their uniforms and stand for an hour or two and salute—precisely as Mussolini summoned 20,000,000 of his loyal sheep to meet and listen the day before he began his unholy war in Ethiopia. But neither our nonregular uniformed men nor our veterans responded; the whole thing was a complete fizzle. Thereupon the newspapers carried a blunt dispatch saying that, as a result of that fiasco, the War Department was determined to put a Reserve officer into every hamlet and village, and many in the towns and cities, to act as a focus for patriotic and militarist propaganda. Since then, as pointed out, the Reserve officers have grown by as many as 20,000 and more a year, and they are scattered all over the country. While they are not paid, they are told to consider themselves representatives of the Army and to cooperate with the War Department. It is frequently stated that many are acting as "observers" of all liberal and radical movements and reporting constantly to the Military Intelligence in Washington.

For 4 years, 1928–32, the Army Training Manual No. 2000–25 carried this extraordinary definition of American democracy to hundreds of thousands of young Americans who were taking military instruction:

"Democracy: A government of the masses. Authority derived through mass meeting or any other form of "direct" expression.

Results in mobocracy. Attitude toward property is communistic—negating property rights. Attitude toward law is that the will of the majority shall regulate, whether it be based upon deliberation or governed by passion, prejudice, and impulse, without restraint or regard for consequences. Results in demagogism, license, agitation, discontent, anarchy.

When this choice bit of loyalty to our American democracy and institutions was exposed to public gaze in the press, it was promptly withdrawn. When I printed it a year ago Secretary Dern wrote me a kindly letter asking, "Why pick on a sinner after he has reformed?"

The reply, of course, is that it is an alarming state of affairs when, during four years, some officers in the War Department can put such a rank piece of disloyal, subversive anti-Americanism into a widely distributed Government handbook, and that the incident must be neither overlooked nor forgotten by those who cherish their country's democratic institutions.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, something has been injected by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] this afternoon concerning opposition of our Military Establishment to any thought of nationalizing any part of the American munitions industry. I shall not take the time to read it, but the St. Louis Star-Times of recent date, April 21, 1936, carried a most interesting editorial under the heading of "The Munitions Business", which it seems to me has proper place in this consideration at this house. Accordingly I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Star-Times, Apr. 21, 1936]

THE MUNITIONS BUSINESS

Senators NYE, CLARK, POPE, and BONE, comprising a majority of the Senate Munitions Investigating Committee, have recommended that the United States Government take over the war munitions industry of this country. A minority of the committee, Senators GEORGE, VANDENBERG, and BARBOUR, oppose the recommendation. It is a typical division of progressives against conservatives, not a division of Democrats against Republicans. The three dissenters were hostile to much of the investigation itself, and seldom attended committee meetings.

Those who signed the majority report did so knowing that an overwhelming majority of American citizens favor Government ownership of the munitions trade. There isn't any guesswork about it. A Nation-wide poll was taken on the subject last month by the Gallup Institute, and the result was—for Government manufacture, 82 percent; for private manufacture, 18 percent.

A person unfamiliar with democratic government would naturally conclude that the proposal by the Senate committee, backed as it is by a Nation-wide majority of more than 4 to 1, would be promptly enacted into law. But here's a strange fact. The four Senators know, and all students of government know, that the chance of early action along that line is small indeed.

The forces operating against Government ownership of the munitions trade are titanic in power. The entire American business world will throw its influence against it, not because it loves the munitions trade or has an interest in its profits but because it fears any extension of Government in business. The munition makers themselves have gigantic political resources. Congressional committees dealing with military and naval affairs are loaded with friends of the gun and warship makers. The Army and Navy contain generals and admirals who are virtual lobbyists for the munitions trade.

Senator BENNETT CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri, one of the signers of the majority report, does not in general favor putting the Government into business. He is in principle an individualist and a believer in private industry. His attitude in this instance is governed by the conviction that the munitions industry, in private hands, is a war-breeding institution and a corrupter of Government.

Senator CLARK has taken part in a 2-year probe of the business of making and selling guns, warships, etc., and in doing so has followed a trail of appalling intrigue and corruption, of extortionate profits, of cheating and chicanery. He has seen private firms, parading as patriotic, selling American military secrets to foreign countries. He has concluded that the incentive to profiteering is so strong and the opportunity so great that it is hopeless to look for anything else where the munitions trade is concerned.

But what chiefly concerns Senator CLARK and his associates is the warmongering spirit of the private munition makers and the financiers back of them. The Senate investigation has revealed their readiness to throw the United States into war to protect their business, without the slightest compunction. They have fought against international disarmament. They pursue trade policies which lead to war. In a choice between the munitions dollar and the lives of American youth the dollar wins and youth goes to slaughter.

When you have such an issue there is no other real issue. And that is what the American people are thinking of when they line up 82 percent to 18 percent in favor of Government ownership of the munitions business. They would much rather have the Government make its own guns, warships, and explosives than to have private profiteers drag us into another war.

So there is public opinion, experience, and common sense behind the proposal of the Senate Munitions Investigating Committee. Against it is the silly argument of the Senate committee minority that the Government would overbuild armaments to please local communities and the specious plea that munition making must be in private hands so that it can be expanded quickly in time of war. The truth is that Government ownership would be the surest avenue to quick expansion, for it would include what is now neglected, the manufacture of reserve supplies of jigs and tools for gun making. And, wasteful as Government business often is, it couldn't possibly exceed the wastefulness of Government contracts written for the express purpose of producing extortionate private profits.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have alluded to my thought that all the talk in the world is not going to prevent the Senate pursuing its tramp, tramp, tramp of other years and enacting this appropriation bill without crossing a "t" or dotting an "i", which is precisely what our military sponsors want it to do. There is much that ought to be said. Indeed, there would be much—I think sufficient—to justify any small group of men, if they had the will to do it, to rise in their places here and resort to any and every possible means that might be available to prevent enactment of the pending appropriation bill. We know that is not going to be done. We know the bill is going to become a law. But, while we are acknowledging that to be the case, we ought to stand ready to indict ourselves, we ought to plead guilty to a course, my fellow Senators, that is going to lead your country and mine to one inevitable end. I care not how emphatically we may believe that these wild programs of appropriations for war are going to insure peace, we know that history, if it repeats itself, will find the present armament race bringing not peace but war. Such has always been the result, and I think it is reasonable to expect that it always will be. As one who wants his country adequately prepared to defend itself against any possible attack from any possible source, I say that we should be ready to indict ourselves.

A few days ago, April 5, the Philadelphia Record contained an eloquent editorial entitled "A Bulletproof Vest for the Dove?" We as Americans like to consider ourselves as the "dove" in this uncertain world. We are the leaders in the cause of peace. If the rest of the world would only follow our example there would not be any more war. Yet, knowing we are spending more than any other nation on earth in preparation for war, is it not fair to ask what would be the result if the rest of the world should actually follow our example in the matter of expenditures in the name of preparation for war?

The Philadelphia Record editorial is of such interest that I am going to insist upon reading it in its entirety, as follows:

A BULLETPROOF VEST FOR THE DOVE?

"United States delegates back from London Arms Reduction Conference with plans for bigger Navy."

That brilliantly ironic headline tells the story of the recent naval limitation parley—and the story of every disarmament parley since the World War.

Naval reduction is to be accomplished by building more battleships.

The high cost of an arms race is to be curbed by increasing our armament expenditures.

Black is white.

And we are tailoring a bulletproof vest for the dove of peace.

The question facing the American Government and the American taxpayer is this:

Can we afford any more such arms conferences?

The whole history of naval limitation treaties shows that they have increased rather than diminished the naval expenditures of this country.

The famous Washington Arms Conference rounded up its efforts in 1922. And its fruits show clearly in these figures on naval expenditures:

For 1923	$322,000,000
For 1924	332,000,000
For 1925	346,000,000

Now observe the fruits of the famous London Naval Treaty, concocted in 1930 and proclaimed effective January 1, 1931.

Naval expenditures during that period follow:

For 1931	$354,000,000
For 1932	357,000,000
For 1933	349,000,000
For 1935	467,000,000
For 1936 (estimated)	485,000,000

Of course, since the estimate for 1936 we have had laid upon our desks the naval appropriation bill calling for appropriations of $529,000,000, which considerably exceeds the estimate.

The editorial continues:

Bear in mind, too, that this monumental $485,000,000 figure was arrived at long before the delegates came home triumphant from this latest London Naval Conference.

What the actual 1936 expenditures will be, Heaven only knows.

The Record believes in a thoroughly adequate navy.

It may be that these later expenditures, high as they are, should be higher still, to give this country proper protection.

However, it is quite as likely that the figures should be lower.

The great trouble is, nobody, in Washington or out, knows whether they should be higher or lower. Nobody knows what our naval policy is. Nobody has even attempted to define it.

Without any intelligent conception of what our Navy is supposed to protect—there's no intelligent method of estimating how big our Navy should be.

At present, our policy seems to consist simply of building more ships. But are we building the right kind?

Are we building them to pull British irons out of the fire in the Far East, as Sir Austen Chamberlain suggested the other day?

Are we now in a virtual naval alliance with England, as many leading Britishers seem to feel?

Are we building new battleships to fight a "defensive" war in Japan's own waters—even though we pretend to be so strong for peace and minding our own business?

These questions are not idle. They concern the welfare and safety of 130,000,000 Americans.

Only the other day, at this very London naval parley, our naval experts, including Admiral Standley, objected to cutting the tonnage of our battleships below 35,000 tons, on the ground that lower tonnage would not make them useful for warfare in Japanese waters!

What the State and Navy Departments are thinking about we don't pretend to know.

But we do know that millions of Americans are thinking a great deal—and that their thinking will compel them to wonder why every conference to reduce naval expenditures ends up by increasing them.

Why it seems impossible to effect real neutrality legislation.

And why so many of the bigwigs at Washington are so eager to prepare for war with Japan when no sane cause for such a war is in sight today—assuming that this Nation has not been dragged into a secret alliance with England.

The London Naval Conference has been officially declared a "success."

Yet we immediately prepare to build more battleships.

Whose was the success?

England's?

Americans would like to know.

Mr. President, this editorial writer made the point that the people of America are beginning to manifest a genuine interest in these matters. I repeat what I have said earlier in the afternoon; namely, that every Member of Congress, when he gets back into his own bailiwick this summer, is going to find new knowledge, new intelligence, new understanding of these problems of national defense. I say this because I hope every Member of Congress may be prepared to answer sanely the questions that will be asked, for example, Why the appropriation of over a billion dollars this year for our Military Establishment? Why the appropriation now, in the name of national defense, of three times as much as we were spending in the name of national defense the year before we went into the "war to end wars"?

As I see it, there is but one thing the present Congress can do to accomplish any measure of economy in this bill. We have here an example of how an instrument may be built so large that it devours us and leaves us helpless.

Not more than $115,000,000 of this total of $500,000,000 involves new construction. We cannot avoid making the rest of the appropriations called for in the bill without disrupting the existing naval organization, without reducing its effectiveness. This has grown upon us in a few years. We have this to contend with, not only this year but every year to come, so long as we maintain the naval policy and the naval course that has been ours during recent years.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, in connection with my statement a few minutes ago about war profits, I wish to direct the attention of the Senate and of my friend from North Dakota to some figures of costs and profits which indicate to me the necessity of the Government fortifying itself by its own preparedness instead of the preparedness of private munitions companies.

The records of the War Department show that the administration expended for artillery during the World War a sum total of $1,191,182,850; and yet General Pershing, in his final report as commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces, states that the only guns of large type produced at home which reached France before the cessation of hostilities were 109 75-millimeter guns and twenty-four 8-inch howitzers, making a total of 133 American-made guns which reached the front and were in use when the armistice was signed.

In the matter of aviation, Mr. President, General Pershing states that—

We were entirely dependent upon our Allies. From time to time we obtained from the French such planes for training personnel as they could provide. Without going into a complete description of aviation material, it will be sufficient to state that it was with great difficulty that we obtained equipment even for training.

In testimony taken by a committee of Congress right after the war, it was shown that the War Department entered into a contract with the Standard Steel Car Co., of Hammond, Ind., for the construction of 964 9½-inch howitzer carriages. The War Department agreed to pay for the cost of the buildings, material, and machinery, and the company was to be paid a commission upon the total cost of these carriages to the Government.

I am detailing these facts because they illustrate what I suggested a while ago—that when the Government does not fortify itself to do some of its own work of preparing for war, it merely makes itself, in the light of what we now know, the willing victim of the greed of the men who attempt to provide for us in a moment of great peril.

The Government paid for the buildings that were erected upon the Standard Steel Car Co.'s grounds, and which cost $2,987,200; and after the armistice was signed the War Department sold these buildings back to the company for $600,000.

The testimony taken at that time shows that at the time the armistice was signed the company had on hand material for which the Government had paid $5,558,000. The testimony further shows that representatives of the administration sold this material back to the company as junk for the sum of $300,000. That is, they sold to the company material worth over five and a half million dollars, classified as junk, for the tiny sum of $300,000—tiny as compared to its cost to the Government—because of the Government's lack of preparedness by its own agencies; and this was done in the face of the fact that arsenals of the United States were at that time needing and demanding material of practically the same character.

The testimony taken at that hearing shows that not a single howitzer carriage had been delivered to the Government prior to the signing of the armistice, but that after the armistice was signed the Ordnance Department had the company finish 200 of these carriages, and that the 200 carriages cost the Government the sum of $18,582,428.88, which sum was paid to them out of the Treasury of the United States.

Along about this time, in August 1918, representatives of the War Department entered into a contract with the Jones-Laughlin Steel Co., of Pittsburgh, Pa., for the manufacture of toluol and ammonium sulphate. It was estimated that the company could produce 24,000 tons of ammonium sulphate per year, and the War Department agreed to accept the company's entire output for a period of 2 years and to pay $90 a ton for it. It was estimated that the company could produce 810,000 gallons of toluol per year, and the War Department agreed to accept the company's entire output for a period of 2 years and pay $1.50 per gallon for it.

At the time of the signing of the armistice the company had not produced a gallon of toluol or a pound of ammonium sulphate; and, the war being over, the contract was canceled. The company put in a claim for the profits it would have earned if the war had continued and the company had been permitted to carry out its contract. It was agreed between the representatives of the War Department and representatives of the company that the difference between the actual value of toluol and the price which the Department contracted to pay should be the profit upon each of the 1,620,000 gallons of toluol which it had been estimated the company could produce in 2 years. A board was appointed to determine the actual value of this product, and it was found that toluol was actually worth 17½ cents per gallon, leaving a profit to the company of $1.32½ per gallon upon 1,620,000 gallons of toluol which the company never manufactured because the war ended too soon. It was also found that the company was entitled to a profit of $30 per ton on each of the 48,000 tons of ammonium sulphate which the company never manufactured. It was decided that the company was entitled to profits in the aggregate sum of $3,330,040.39, and that was paid to them out of the Treasury of the United States.

The Secretary of War, at the beginning of the session of Congress at which the speech was made from which I am quoting these figures, reported that he had settled 5,000 claims growing out of war contracts. The committee of Congress appointed to investigate expenditures in the War Department declared that the examples I have given were a fair illustration of what was done to the Government as a result of its lack of preparedness on the part of its own agencies.

If I may go on for just an instant, and then I shall surrender the floor to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], when the Standard Steel Car Co. of Hammond, Ind., got through with this game of tag with the Government, it put in a claim against our Government, and I have mentioned some of the items in the claim. This is what happens to the Government when it leaves itself utterly defenseless and strips itself of the agencies with which it could protect itself, as any far-sighted citizen would do in the conduct of his own business.

Poor old Uncle Sam. We leave Uncle Sam defenseless in the face of these enemies. The boys want to rook the Government. Oh, well, it is of no great moment; it is only the Government. It is perfectly proper, perfectly patriotic, to rook the Government, and take it to the cleaner, and trim it. Nobody but the poor taxpayers suffer; and, anyway, they do not amount to very much. Nobody worries about the taxpayers when war profits are involved. It is only when we go to feed some poor devil who is out of work that some of us discover that that is very bad. The poor fellow might have gotten $2 too much.

Mr. Farley last night, in a radio speech, stated that some very amiable gentlemen rise and fairly tear their nether garments in the face of providence because, forsooth, some poor devil might have gotten $4.50 that he was not entitled to; but these amiable, flag-waving, superheterodyne patriots, in the sacred name of patriotism and preparedness, can rook our poor old Uncle Sam, and take the old boy to the cleaner, and nobody seems to think anything of it. In fact, it is considered almost vulgar for even a Senator to advert to it. Well, I risk the possible odium that attaches to saying a few perhaps unkind things about the boys who do this.

This was the claim put in against our Government by this outfit which charged the Government the amounts I have stated for howitzer carriages.

Loss of earnings due to delays	$1,000,000.00
Profits earned and accrued	2,134,215.02

The boys had a good bookkeeper. They got in the 2 cents.

Remuneration for special service rendered	$890,908.36
Reimbursement for approved commitments	1,948,837.81
Reimbursement for incidental losses	322,250.53

Purely incidental to the company's operations.

Reimbursement for depreciation of facilities	$314,019.40

Uncle Sam was paying for all the depreciation. He had to get rooked and trimmed and bilked for all this, and did not own the equipment when the war was over. It would be better if he had owned it and kept it and had been prepared, instead of allowing the boys in Pittsburgh, or wherever it was, to rook him again in case of another war.

The sad part of it is that we are paying income taxes because we got rooked. Even my good friend the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is getting rooked, along with the rest of us, when he pays his income tax, because some of the boys in Pittsburgh had to get their hands into the Public Treasury clear up to the armpits.

We get rooked now, and are compelled to pay in income taxes this year for all this "rough stuff" put over by the boys back at the time of the war, because it is all written into Government bonds, now outstanding, which we are trying, rather vainly, to pay off.

Let us get back to the statement, however:

Compensation for plant occupancy after June 30, 1919	$300,000.00
Reimbursement for sums expended on Government buildings	65,760.32
Interest on profit and money borrowed	99,066.18

We had to pay interest on the profit they made. It really sounds like a story from Alice in Wonderland. It is a superheterodyne form of trimming the Government which was indulged in by those who did not want Uncle Sam to do the preparing himself. That is a fair example of the shocking things that went on during the war.

There is so much of this, Mr. President, that an attempt to put it into the RECORD would be an intrusion upon the time of the Senate. I have only been tempted to say what I have said for the reason that the Members of Congress and other officials of the Government must realize the necessity of their Government—not my Government alone but their Government—fortifying itself against the possibility of men doing this sort of thing to the Government again, and the only way to make certain that these things do not happen again is to have a club over the heads of these fellows. If we get into another war and do not take some preventive measure we will have a repetition of this thing.

I surrender the floor to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have always favored reasonable and adequate national defense. I have supported every appropriation which seemed necessary to safeguard the interests of our country, but I am convinced that the pending measure, appropriating nearly $600,000,000 for big battleships and other naval defenses, is unreasonable and unnecessary. I shall vote against it. I find that the people of this country are shocked at the enormous appropriations Congress is making for war purposes. They can see no reason at all why the United States, situated as it is geographically and economically and strategically, should declare it necessary to spend more than is spent by any other nation in the world in preparation for taking part in someone else's war. We are breaking all peacetime records in making these enormous appropriations.

It cannot be maintained that we need this enormous Military Establishment to preserve order in the United States. It cannot be maintained that we need it to defend the United States against attack. It cannot be maintained that we need it for a war of conquest. I refuse to believe these huge appropriations are being made solely for the benefit of munitions makers and shipbuilders. Can it be that back of it all is the intention of being prepared to take part in the next world war?

Mr. President, the people all over this country are greatly disturbed over the rapidly increasing tax burden. We continue to pile up billions of public debt. The taxpayers cannot carry the load. I say the time has come to call a halt. These huge annual deficits must be stopped. The pending bill offers a fine opportunity for showing the taxpayers we are sympathetic to their appeal for economy in public expenditures. We cannot possibly explain why this Congress has spent a billion dollars for Military Establishment at a time when we claim to be the greatest peace-loving Nation in the world.

I wish to call attention of the Senate and the country to a recent editorial on this subject by the Honorable Charles F. Scott, of Iola, Kans. Mr. Scott is widely known as editor and publisher of the Iola Register. He is a former Member of the National House of Representatives from the Second District of Kansas. He is well informed, patriotic, far from being a pacifist. Mr. Scott says:

MILLIONS FOR MEDDLING

"Defense Against What?" is the title to many editorials appearing these days in connection with the current appropriation of the largest peacetime fund in history for national defense. And it is a question which not a single protagonist of bigger and better armies and navies for the United States ever offers a word in answer.

There are four reasons why any country might need a military establishment; to preserve internal order, to defend the nation against attack, to carry on a war of conquest, or to be in a position to get into somebody else's war any time it might be of commercial or political advantage to do so.

The United States obviously does not need its Army to preserve internal order, at least it does not need a fraction even of its present entire Military Establishment. A well organized National Guard might always be desirable for this purpose, but that is about all.

It certainly must be equally obvious that to say our Army is needed for national defense is sheer hypocrisy. Is Canada—infinitely more American than British—going to attack us? Or impoverished Mexico? Is Japan or Germany or Russia going to sail ships across 2,000 miles of ocean to set landing parties on our shores? The line of suggestion is too preposterous to carry further. As far into the future as anyone can see now, the prospect of the United States having to carry on a war of defense from enemy attack is exactly zero.

Do we need an Army to carry on a war of conquest? We have needed one in the past for that purpose, but we certainly aren't looking forward to any such ventures in the immediate future. The United States has all the territory it wants or needs, probably for all time to come. No war of deliberate aggression need be prepared for.

That leaves one excuse for the billion dollars we shall spend on our Army and Navy this year—the possibility that we shall want it in order to get into somebody else's war. That's what we needed it for the last time and that's what we'll need it for the next time if we ever need it at all. National defense? Rubbish!

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MAY 7, 1936

The House met at 11:30 a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty One, Thou who art all in all, as we meet in prayer may we cherish these sacred moments. Here help us to realize the highest tones and capacities of our spiritual natures. Heavenly Father, let us pass into that communion that blossoms more and more unto the perfect spring. Speak the final word, blessed Lord, that both men and nations may learn that it is right and not might by which they are to live and endure. We praise Thee that Thy love is commensurate with Thy power, Thy promises are as immutable as Thy holiness, and that humanity's hopes are to be realized in the dateless Christ. Deliver us all from that selfishness which will not stop or be warned, that disregards human happiness, and for a trustless independence of our fellow men. In the name of the Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

JOSEPH GURNEY CANNON

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House time has been set aside for paying tribute to a former Speaker of the House, Joseph Gurney Cannon.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, we have set aside a brief few minutes today to pay tribute to one of the outstanding Speakers of this House, but the time is far too short in which to pay proper and deserving tribute to his memory—that of the Honorable Joseph G. Cannon, of the great State of Illinois, whom we honor on his one hundredth birthday anniversary.

He served in this House for 46 years—a longer period than any other man has ever served. It was my pleasure and privilege to have served with him for many years; and although I belonged to the opposite party and disagreed with him on many important policies, I nevertheless admired him for his ability, astuteness, courage, and fighting spirit.

I have served under seven Speakers—Cannon; Champ Clark, sometimes referred to as "the greatest Roman of them all"; the scholarly Gillette; the suave and affable Nicholas Longworth; the diamond-in-the-rough Garner; the genial and big-hearted Rainey; and the lovable and liberal Joseph Byrns.

They were all great men, but "Uncle Joe" Cannon, beyond any doubt, was one of the most outstanding and picturesque of them all. He was resourceful, able, and, as I said, fearless and courageous. Though a strong party man, he had as many warm friends on the Democratic side as on his own. In other words, in spite of all his faults, we loved him still.

While it is true many great men served in this body with and under Speaker Cannon, I must say in passing that we have just as fine and able a group of men here today. But as we all know, it is not the custom to pay tribute to the living but to reserve the flowers of praise and appreciation solely for the departed.

Cannon possessed great power, and knew how to use it, and did use it without stint. In fact, as Speaker he was the whole House, all by himself.

"Uncle Joe" ruled always with an iron hand. He determined what legislation should be passed and what defeated. He was able to do this through his power of appointment of committees. It was his custom not to appoint any Member to a committee until he ascertained from the Member himself how he stood on important legislation that would naturally have to be considered by such committee. If the Member could not satisfy "Uncle Joe" that he could be trusted implicitly to carry out his orders, he would not be appointed to that particular committee.

During his reign as Speaker, "Uncle Joe" was ably assisted by three powerful lieutenants, who, with himself, were known as the "big four", consisting of Sereno E. Payne, of New York; Sunny Jim Sherman, of New York, who became Vice President of the United States; John L. Dalzell, of Pennsylvania; and himself. The three held the big key positions, and were ever the trusted and loyal allies of the Speaker.

Although the Nation believed it was the "big four" who controlled the activities of this House in those days, I was always satisfied that it was the great Speaker, Joe Cannon, who himself and alone controlled the House, and controlled it even before he became the Speaker.

When he determined on a policy, the most influential and powerful opposition could not sway him, as the RECORD bears testimony. He was 86 years of age when he voluntarily retired from Congress.

Joseph Gurney Cannon was one of the most remarkable men of the ages. Even at the age of 86 his eyesight and hearing were remarkable, especially during the night sessions, as I can testify. I regret some of the other Members are not here who once joined in those famous night sessions, but, alas, most of them have gone with "Uncle Joe."

No one I have ever known has displayed the resourcefulness he showed during the turbulent and historical battle in 1910, which carried on for 2 days and 2 nights, when he held the House against his opponents on this side, supported by some Republicans, endeavoring to take away certain powers of the Speaker and to liberalize the rules of the House.

Having had a small part in that contest, I hope that I will some day have an opportunity to review that memorable battle in my humble way, and to portray his wonderful parliamentary generalship, and how finally, as he was wont to say, "Any majority can do as it pleases", even to declaring the Speakership vacant.

Even when the motion was made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to declare the Speakership vacant, it did not faze him. He then stated: "You are now in the majority and you have the privilege to declare the chair vacant"—knowing full well they would not do so. He, indeed, was one of the most remarkable and outstanding legislators and statesmen I have ever read of, heard of, or had the privilege of serving with.

Joseph G. Cannon's life was a colorful one—from log cabin to high office and from poverty to wealth and affluence.

He was born 100 years ago today in the little town of Guilford, N. C. Four years later his parents journeyed in a covered wagon to the West and settled in the town of Bloomingdale, Ind., where Joseph grew to manhood. His early ambition was to be a lawyer, and this ambition was fulfilled upon his graduation from the Cincinnati Law School when he was admitted to the bar and commenced practice in the city of Terre Haute, Ind., in 1858. Foreseeing the advantages in the development of the State of Illinois and that better fortune and opportunity awaited him there, we find the young attorney established at Tuscola, Ill., in 1859, and within 2 years he became State's attorney for the twenty-seventh judicial district of Illinois, serving in that capacity until 1868.

Resuming private practice, he gained the confidence and good will of the people of his community; they recognized his ability and determination, and in 1873 he was elected to the Forty-third Congress, and was reelected eight successive terms. Defeated in the Fifty-second Congress, he was a candidate for election to the Fifty-third Congress, and again the people of his district honored him with the Congress seat. Then followed continuous service through the Sixty-second Congress. Defeated for reelection in the Sixty-third Congress, he stood for election to the Sixty-fourth Congress, and was successful.

His service in the House ended with his voluntary retirement at the end of the Sixty-seventh Congress—a total service of 46 years as a Member of Congress.

"Uncle Joe" was several times spoken for the Presidency. The farthest he ever got in that direction, however, was that in 1908 he received 58 votes as Presidential candidate at the Republican convention that nominated Taft.

"Uncle Joe" was of a type of the western pioneer of which there are no more. He was plain, honest, rugged, and old-fashioned, and remained so throughout his life. High position did not change him in the least.

With his unlit stogie, cocked at a saucy angle so that it almost touched the broad brim of his great black hat, always with him, he presented a picture that no one who ever saw him will ever forget. He was never cartooned without that famous stogie.

Joseph G. Cannon was a pioneer of the type that has passed forever. We shall never see his like again. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SABATH). The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, when after nearly a half century of service in this House, longer than that of any other man, dead or alive, Joseph Gurney Cannon came down the main aisle, leaning upon the arm of a colleague, and passed out of yonder door never to return, it was amid silence and deep regret and with the affection and esteem of his fellow Members, regardless of party affiliations.

Soon thereafter he passed into the Great Beyond. Congress was not then in session to do him honor. But upon convening on December 7, 1926, the House of Representatives, in which were many Members who, like myself, had served with Mr. Cannon, adopted a resolution which expressed the true and sincere regard in which he was held, and adjourned in his honor. It was an unusual distinction accorded to an unusual man. That resolution so truly portrayed his character and was such a just and fitting tribute to his memory that I shall here quote it:

Hon. Joseph G. Cannon died in Danville, Ill., November 12, 1926. For 46 years he had been a Member of this House; for 10 years as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations; for 8 years its Speaker; and for several years chairman of the Committee on Rules. His service terminated with the Sixty-seventh Congress. Within this Chamber the scene of his life's greatest activities was laid. Here he rendered services to his country which placed him in the front rank of American statesmanship. Here he exhibited characteristics which compelled respect and won admiration. Forceful ability, intrinsic worth, strength of character, brought him popular fame and congressional leadership. In him, depth and breadth of intellect, with a full and well-rounded development, had produced a giant who towered above his fellows and impressed them with his power and wisdom. A distinguished statesman, a lofty patriot, a unique orator, an unmatched debater, a master of logic and wit, the great and representative citizen of the American Republic has gone into history.

Joseph Gurney Cannon, or "Uncle Joe", as he was affectionately called, was a North Carolina cracker, and, like Lincoln, went to Indiana, and, like Lincoln, settled in Illinois. He entered Congress when Blaine was Speaker. In his first speech in 1874 on a bill to reduce postage on books, periodicals, and papers, he said of himself that he had oats in his pocket and hayseed in his hair. In that speech he presented a standard for Congressmen, to which he always conformed. "No man", he said, "is a proper person to represent the people unless he has the honesty and the backbone to stand and do what is right and for the interest of the people, without reference to what anyone may say of him or what the action of the press may be in the premises."

This was "Uncle Joe's" creed, and he lived up to it. Courage was his dominant characteristic. He was an old-time economist. He hated and would fight any measure that looked like a raid on the Treasury. Withal he was constructive. Many governmental agencies had their genesis in his brain.

Mr. Cannon wielded greater influence upon the destiny of legislation than any other man in Congress in over four decades. But he was not an autocrat. When Speaker of the House he exercised no greater powers than had his predecessors; not as much as some. He never lost sight of the fact that he was the House's servant. The issue of "Cannonism", raised in 1910, was factious and fortuitous. "Uncle Joe" was a political target under a hot barrage of coalition fire, but he never flinched. His defy to oust him from the Speakership was magnificent and won even the admiration of his political enemies.

He was a stormy petrel throughout his long public career and loved a fight. He did not harbor animosities and was generous to friend and foe alike. Notwithstanding Speaker Clark's leadership in the memorable battle against "Cannonism", Clark and Cannon were very warm friends. Both men were much beloved for their rugged honesty and stalwart political convictions.

On the eve of his departure from Congress one of his friends said to him: " 'Uncle Joe', I am sad to think of your going." "Well, my boy", he replied, "it makes me sad, too. But I am an old man, and I ought to have gone out before, because I haven't been worth a damn around here for 2 years except to help make a quorum."

A statesman, a commanding figure, a great American, a unique character, a gentleman of the old school, a man of the people like unto Abraham Lincoln, of whom history will record:

He had the courage of his convictions and the approbation of his own conscience.

Upon the announcement of the death of "Uncle Joe" Cannon, an old employee, whose service in the House was contemporaneous with that of Mr. Cannon for many years, wrote what he styled a "parliamentary ode" to "Uncle Joe", which, in view of Mr. Cannon's eminent services upon the floor and in the Speaker's chair, is peculiarly appropriate to one so long in the atmosphere of parliamentary struggles. The parliamentary ode is as follows:

Here the gavel fell.
The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.
The previous question is ordered.
Debate is exhausted.
The subject is closed to amendment.
Points of order cannot be made nor reserved.
The Speaker has left the chair and gone into the Committee of the Whole,
Where the point of "no quorum" is never raised,
Where the great majority rules, and
From whence no adverse report ever comes;
Where no dilatory motions are entertained, nor Filibustering practiced;
Where minorities claim no rights,
Where rules are superfluous, decorum is preserved, and Where politics is adjourned.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, since the gavel usually beats us to the last sentence, I want to say first what I would wish to reserve for the last.

Mr. Speaker, considering the disparity between Joseph G. Cannon and myself, at that time a disparity in age, in birth, in background, in politics, in association, in experience, a disparity in almost everything that could distinguish two men, and culminating in my induction into the House of Representatives under his iron rule, perhaps the most sincere tribute one such man can pay to another such man is to say that during the quarter century which has elapsed since I last saw him, I have always remembered him never with any feeling of rancor but always with a feeling of affection.

Emerson said that when we see a great man he explains his fame. Joseph G. Cannon was truly self-explantory. He was original, he was picturesque, he was colorful, he was dramatic, he was dynamic, he was courageous, above all things he was, as the minority leader has just said, highly courageous, and all these qualities were reflected in his personality.

To me it is a solemn and impressive thought that for a half century, one-third of the life of the Republic, with only two short intervals, these walls looked down upon the form and resounded to the voice of Joseph G. Cannon. I think it is highly fitting that the House of Representatives should pause for a half hour in its labors to pay tribute to this truly remarkable man.

I lay no claim to a monopoly of affection for Uncle Joe Cannon. It was general. What was the secret of this universal feeling toward a man who as Speaker won the title of "Czar" Cannon and made "Cannonism" a national political issue? My answer is this, that while in the chair he ruled with an iron hand, embodying in himself all the powers of the House and wielding that power as a partisan and even factional leader; out of the chair he was utterly democratic, approachable, and companionable, chatting freely with the newest and humblest Member of the House. If he was a hearty hater, he was also a hearty lover. He was a red-blooded man. He was a "natural." This, in my opinion, was the secret of his long, successful public career.

If I may, I should like to take him down out of the Speaker's station and relate an incident or two on the personal, the human, side. If I mention myself in one of these incidents, it is only for the purpose of showing that he was what I have just said he was, for certainly there was no mutual-admiration society existing between "Czar" Cannon at the height of his power and a young western Democrat serving his first term. The occasion was a House vote on the veto by President Taft of an immigration bill. The Senate had overridden the veto by 4 to 1. The House was expected to follow suit, though by a smaller margin. Debate was limited to 1 hour. I had been given 1 minute. Feeling was so high that I surrendered the minute, then, regaining my courage, I recovered the time and used it. I was for the veto; the Speaker was for it. When the roll was called, it lacked five votes of the necessary two-thirds, and the veto was sustained. "Uncle Joe" came down out of the chair, sat down beside me, placed his arm across my shoulders, and said, "Young man, your speech saved the President's veto. You knocked just enough of them off the fence."

I recall my first contact with him. I said, "Mr. Speaker, I am a new Member from Colorado." And he replied dryly, "They generally are."

Here is an instance of his tolerance and unconventionality. While it involved myself, I did not see it, as you will see. I walked into the Chamber while the House was in session, took my seat with my hat on, and sat there smoking a cigar and reading a paper. A Member on the other side signaled the Speaker, who looked down at me for a moment with an indulgent smile and then looked away. In a few minutes I got up and went to the cloakroom, where I was followed by two or three Members, who related what had happened. "Uncle Joe" overlooked a fine chance, which was not unappreciated by me.

It was my privilege once to hear an observation from him which showed his indifference to criticism. He was sitting on the Democratic side chatting with the Republican floor leader. They were just in front of my seat. A Member down in the well was flaying "Cannonism." The gentleman with Speaker Cannon said, "Mr. Speaker, you had better listen to that fellow; he is talking about you." "Oh, well," rejoined "Uncle Joe", "he might be talking about a damn sight worse subject", and continued with his conversation.

I have always remembered the little two-chair table in the House restaurant just at the left-hand side of the door. On the second morning of the historic struggle against the Speaker in 1910 I walked into the deserted restaurant and sat down at this table. In a moment the Speaker came in and sat opposite me. He knew that I was thirsting for his blood, politically speaking, but he chatted unconcernedly. I remember one thing he said, and that was that he answered every letter he received from a constituent, even if it was only two lines. Yes; "Uncle Joe" was a politician as well as a statesman.

If I could pick some one thing for every old man in the United States to read, including every man who thinks he is old, it would be this: In the Sixty-second Congress, after "Uncle Joe" had been "dethroned", and after he had lost the Speakership through change in party control of the House, and when he was 75 years of age, I saw him make a 3-hour speech in the House, during which he paced the center aisle from the Well to the main entrance many times, throwing his arms in characteristic fashion and never sparing himself. It was a truly remarkable performance.

Mr. Speaker, just before rising, I told my good friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] that I would not have time to give more than a sentence of a story I told him the other day about the culmination of that most dramatic struggle in the history of Congress, at the time Speaker Cannon was stripped of his power, when Congress remained in session continuously for 3 days and 2 nights. After the battle was over and he had been shorn of his power, and even his tenure of office was trembling in balance, with the threat running through the House that he should be unseated as Speaker, he took the Speaker's chair and breathed defiance to his foes. He uttered one word in his characteristic manner, which was the high light of that whole dramatic struggle and the high light of his character, when he drew himself to his full height and shouted "Courage!" [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] for 5 minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I consider it a great distinction to be one of those permitted to speak briefly on this one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Joseph Gurney Cannon. It is very fitting that the House of Representatives should pause from its daily routine to pay respect to the memory of one who for 46 years was such an important as well as unique figure in its life.

It is not necessary to make direct reference to his great contribution to American history; but as it is now more than 10 years since he retired from this body, those of us who were privileged to serve with him can perhaps contribute to this record by personal reminiscences.

My first contact with "Uncle Joe" was soon after his memorable fight in the House to retain his position as Speaker. He came to Massachusetts to deliver an address. It was my privilege to attend the dinner. I can see him now after the lapse of nearly 30 years, describing his experience in that disagreement with his party associates. The fire in his eye, the vigor of his speech, and the spirit of his remarks were typical of his strength here.

I first sat on this floor as a Member-elect to the Sixty-third Congress during the closing sessions of the Sixty-second when so many Members were retiring as the result of political upheavals. An ex-Speaker and a future Speaker were among that number, "Uncle Joe" Cannon and Nick Longworth. I can recount a most interesting experience during the Sixty-third Congress when "Uncle Joe" came to see us as a visitor and was a guest of honor at a dinner at the Army and Navy Club given by former Representative Chipperfield. Among the guests was James R. Mann. The dinner was about half over when Speaker Champ Clark came in, the only Democrat among 50 Republicans. The speeches that "Uncle Joe" and Champ Clark made that night are outstanding memories in my membership, both reminiscing not only of the old days here but of their days back home in Illinois and Missouri.

One other personal word about "Uncle Joe." One very hot summer afternoon I asked him to ride home with me. We drove around the Speedway. I said to him, "Uncle Joe", the time is coming when you should write your personal reminiscences of your remarkable public career. No one can do it for you, and you owe it to the country to make a record of your service." He turned to me and said, "Young man, I have always made it a rule to look forward, never backward." The wonderful impression left by that remark of a man then over fourscore years has never left me; and from it I learned a great lesson, that we should endeavor to keep ourselves young as he did and improve the future rather than have regrets for the past.

Another reminiscence is the memorable ride I had in the train from New York one day with Champ Clark, when he gave me the complete story of the effort to retire "Uncle Joe" and its failure. Many a delightful evening did I, as a new Member, spend with "Uncle Joe" during our summer sessions in the Sixty-fifth Congress.

One of "Uncle Joe's" most renowned speeches was that made in support of a bill to create the American Academy of Arts and Letters, in which he recalled the pioneer days of his youth, when he began his journey westward with his parents from North Carolina. Listen to these words, which typify his powers as an orator:

> Now, then, take art. I do not know how many of you have gone to the western end of the Capitol and seen on the wall that picture entitled, Westward the Star of the Empire Takes Its Way. A great artist, I cannot recall his name now, painted that picture on the wall. There it is. It represents the pioneer from the Atlantic coast on his way westward.
> There are the steer and the mule hitched up together; there is the woman with the babe in her arms, sitting in the wagon; there is the little grave by the side of the road; and there is the pioneer with his coonskin cap and the little boy with his coonskin cap, the grandson or the son, carrying a rifle, followed by the faithful dog; another stands upon the mountain and looks to the westward.
> Ah, Mr. Speaker, I was a part of that picture in a way, and by that I mean I experienced most of what it represented in the pioneer days; and as I looked upon that picture the first time, though I am not given much to tears, I caught myself crying. And during all the years since, I have never glanced toward it without saying to myself, "God bless the man who painted that picture."

May I close these personal remarks with a reference to the last session "Uncle Joe" attended, on March 4, 1923? Mr. Sisson, of Mississippi, made these remarks:

> It has been my pleasure to know "Uncle Joe" intimately. I have learned to love him deeply, and it will be a source of satisfaction all my life to be able to say that I have known intimately one of the greatest men and one of the greatest characters that America has produced. When the history of this House is written, as it will be, when the history of the Speakers has been written, "Uncle Joe" Cannon will stand out in bold relief as one of the greatest men who has ever occupied this position in the history of this country.

My colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. Gallivan], in the course of his remarks, inserted a story from the Baltimore Sun entitled "Shed a Tear for 'Uncle Joe' as He Is Leaving Us Today." A truthful title. Certainly there was many a wet eye in this Chamber when the good-byes were said to "Uncle Joe." How strange it is to read in that article that when "Uncle Joe" was chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, Professor Langley, of the Smithsonian Institute, asked for an appropriation of $10,000 to experiment in flying. "Great heavens," exclaimed Mr. Cannon, "a flying machine to ride in the air. Whoever heard of such a thing?"

The article also contains many other interesting details, including a poem that "Uncle Joe" quoted when his length of service exceeded that of Mr. Morrill.

For the accuracy of history and the real judgment of the future, sufficient time has not elapsed in which to rate the character, personality, and service of "Uncle Joe" Cannon, but we can say that while America has produced many great men, to this day, in our judgment, it has not produced the like of "Uncle Joe." [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MEEKS].

Mr. MEEKS. Mr. Speaker, it was not my privilege to have been associated with Joseph G. Cannon in any official way. I knew him better as a citizen of my home town, Danville, Ill., and as a neighbor. He was the first Congressman I ever saw. I remember the incident distinctly when I looked through a window of his bank and saw him with his arms folded, standing erect and alert, looking at a map on the floor and discussing something with a caller who was interested in what was shown on the map. I was a farm lad then. I thought he represented the power and majesty of the United States Government.

Shortly after I was admitted to the bar I was a guest in his home with other members of the county bar, and I considered that a great event. It was the first time a Congressman spoke to me. I felt greatly honored by this attention. I was interested in all his later political campaigns, not as an associate, of course, but often as a participant, and I know well his political history at home. He was a unique, picturesque character, a forceful individual. I never saw another like him.

His history, however, would not be complete without the mention of an associate who always aided and sustained him in his official career until he became Speaker of the House. I refer to his brother, William P. Cannon, who was an able businessman and an astute political general who managed his campaign battles and who always rallied to his support in every contest in which Joseph G. Cannon engaged. He lost his life as the result of an accident shortly after his brother became Speaker. The association of these two men was a remarkable business and political partnership of two brothers.

Joseph G. Cannon was a man of the soil. He came to the prairies of Illinois after he had lived in Indiana. In early life he was a district prosecuting attorney riding the circuit as did the judges in those days. He was somewhat Lincolnesque in thought and spoke the language all could understand. He came to Washington at the close of an epoch and the beginning of a new. His life was identified with much of the history of this country. I suggested to him once that he write his memoirs because of their great value as a contribution to the history of this country and the intimate glimpses it would give of unrecorded official acts in our national life. I know of no other man who could have written memoirs of so great value. [Applause.] He declined to consider the subject on the grounds that he was too old for such long and exacting labor. The history of our country would have been enriched by this contribution.

At home, although we recognize the fact that Mr. Cannon was a great figure in the Nation's life, yet it was not as such that we thought of him mostly. He was a neighbor, a friend, a useful man in the community with simple habits and tastes and one upon whom we did not look with awe.

As a young man he settled upon the prairies of Illinois and was influenced by its expanse, its hard-working settlers, men and women who made a great State in a raw country. His travelings upon the circuit, his contacts with honest, earnest folks of the countryside, and small towns prepared him for his great usefulness and achievements in national affairs. He was a part of the community. He was usually called and referred to as Joe. It was not until he had lived the allotted span of human life that he was called "Uncle Joe." He cared little for the formalities and conventionalities of social life. There was nothing of show and glamor about him. His constituents understood him. They did not expect from him sonorous eloquent utterances. They expected him to speak the ordinary language which they all easily understood. He had no patronizing ways. He felt at home mingling with farmers and enjoying in their homes the ample meals which they served. He liked to talk with them about their problems and pleasures. He knew business in its various aspects. He knew farming. He knew about coal mining. He knew the country store, the country church, the country school. He soon became a familiar figure with his big black cigar and slouch hat. He was natural for he breathed the air of the expansive prairies. He upheld the majestic woodlands which abound in his district and the glories of abundant nature. He was inspired with the interests of his people.

Of course, we were all pleased when he became Speaker. It was at this point that he lost his brother William and at which another figure of importance came into his political life, his son-in-law, E. X. Leseure, whom I knew well and who was a friend of mine. His daughter, now Mrs. Abdill, occupies the old homestead on the principal street of the town.

It was the purpose of the people of Danville who knew him so long to hold memorial exercises on his one hundredth birthday. I am a member of the committee on arrangements. It has been decided to postpone the event until later in the year.

I have heard much about his courage, his determination to pursue a course which he wanted adopted against any opposition which might arise. His character was no enigma to those who knew him on the home ground. His struggle with early adversity on the undeveloped prairies of Illinois, where malaria, milk sick, and many other disorders prevailed, and where the hardest labor was necessary to wring from the soil sufficient crops to provide clothing and shelter for the large families, made him one of them.

These were elements which developed strong characteristics in individuals and Joseph G. Cannon was not exceptional as to these influences. They marked his life. When he came to Washington it was not with a polish acquired in society nor with the cultivated speech of the orator, which in those days swayed crowds, but with the sturdy traits natural to the individual qualified by hard knocks. They were necessary to one's survival and necessary for the achievement of great things.

Joseph G. Cannon came into notice immediately following the noted characters who made outstanding history in Illinois. These were Abraham Lincoln, Stephen A. Douglas, James C. Robinson, Usher F. Linder, Leonard Swett, Lawrence Weldon, David Davis, Oliver L. Davis, and among them but not the least of them, Daniel W. Voorhees, "The Tall Sycamore of the Wabash." These men were eminent lawyers in that period before many important decisions were made by our Supreme Court. Cannon and others took up the work where the former men left off. Necessarily, his name goes along with those in the annals of old Illinois and with its place in the Nation.

The narrative of these simple facts shows whence came those characteristics in the halls of Congress to which you have listened today. I saw him when I was a farm boy, and I saw him when the people of our city tendered to him, after his retirement—and to the Honorable Joseph B. Mann, the best all-around lawyer I have ever known—a memorial dinner and tribute. They were almost the same age, both retired and looking back upon earthly careers about to end. It was a notable event and scene. It was my privilege to see Mr. Cannon as a Congressman when I was a lad and my privilege to see him in my own office shortly before his death. There were intimate conversations. Although belonging to different political parties, this, on many occasions, was not a cause of differences between us. I shall always feel that it was worth something to have known him, that it was worth much to have him an important part of our national life, and to have had him in our community as a neighbor and as a friend. This sentiment cannot be erased nor obscured by any outstanding public career. After all, the great question is what kind of a man was one of whom we speak. I have attempted in these remarks to show something of the kind of man Joseph G. Cannon was, which, I think, will tend to explain the characteristics observed in him by his colleagues in this Chamber.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, if there ever served in this body a typical outgrowth of American ideals and institutions, it was the late Speaker Joseph Cannon, whom we have assembled to honor today.

This statesman whose memory we all cherish met every test and trial from his birth in North Carolina 100 years ago until the pale messenger approached his bedside at Danville, Ill., November 12, 1926.

It was my privilege and advantage to know him, to have voted for his reelection as Speaker of this House at the Sixty-first Congress, March 19, 1910. I have since served under Speakers Clark, Gillette, Rainey, and our own patient, able, and fair and esteemed Speaker, Mr. BYRNS. It was also my privilege to have served under Presidents Theodore Roosevelt, Taft, Wilson, Harding, and now President Roosevelt.

To be the only Republican now a Member of this body who voted in the Sixty-first Congress to elect Mr. Cannon Speaker, is an embarrassing distinction, for I feel my weakness in attempting to render in words such tribute to the grand old statesman as his memory deserves.

Although born in North Carolina, he had his mental and physical growth in the Middle West, at a time when men of the type of Lincoln and Grant and others who drew from the forest and plain that kind of rugged manhood and burning patriotism that has shown across the pages of history ever since.

Speaker Cannon was a type possessed of characteristics that grew and flourished on the broad philosophy of common sense.

It is yet too early in the march of time and understanding of this type of men who helped build the Republic strong and enduring, to set down a correct estimate of their contributions to our progress and civilization. When it is recalled that it was 250 years after the death of Cromwell that Thomas Carlyle ventured an estimate of Cromwell's purpose and accomplishments, our task today may be better understood, for aside from decapitating Charles I and destroying or making Ireland unhappy for many years, we see nothing of special note, with the return of Charles II, upon the failure of Cromwell's son to carry on.

It has been so as to the genius of Napoleon, which in military mastery and democratic progress and the immortal code, for it has been 115 years since he died and the recent book by Ludwig is the only fair estimate we have yet found excepting in a work by Thomas Watson, of Georgia, formerly a Member of this body.

Therefore we may not expect to have the virtues of Speaker Cannon portrayed or the value of his life to his country and the world understood and translated so soon after he passed from the stage of earthly activities, swift competition, and the asperities which hedge about us all, particularly in a life of political service which an economist has declared to be only a little less violent than war, hence politics must be encompassed by stern realities.

We have evidence of the fine judgment and confidence in him, and another grand old commoner, Champ Clark, when for their good judgment and honesty these two men were placed among those who erected the first House Office Building and the Lincoln Monument.

As an evidence of Speaker Cannon's good judgment in selecting advisers he had as his counselors, in what was characterized a "kitchen cabinet", Senators James Watson, of Indiana; James Sherman, of New York; James Tawney, of Michigan; James Mann, of Illinois; and James Heminway, of Indiana. The five Jims. And three of these Jims later became United States Senators and one a Vice President.

"Uncle Joe" Cannon freely extended the hand of fellowship to new men coming to Congress in form of sound advice. I sought his counsel on more than one occasion, and he directed me aright. I recall one instance when I was anxious to have a bill passed. I spoke to Mr. Cannon and he gave directions how to comply with the somewhat different rules than I had been familiar with in the Pennsylvania Senate and Assembly, but was afraid to ask that a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and lay that motion on the table believing such action could not possibly be ethical. But "Uncle Joe" replied that that was the practice, and in fact is now.

Probably the climaxing triumph of his life came when he completely routed an element of the Republican Party which sought to divest him of his power as Speaker. This pursuit was carried across the country, and all Republicans had to meet the issue and win or lose for or against Cannonism. Truth is, the Cannon rules were the same as the Crisp, Randall, and Reed rules used before his advent. But the showdown came on March 19, 1910, and it was a day fraught with the most dramatic and truly thrilling situations I ever witnessed in conventions and legislative bodies. I was witness to it all and followed as I could the strategy of Speaker Cannon, James Watson, of Indiana, and William A. Rodenberg, of the Twenty-second Illinois District. Every minute was tense, but the House came out of every charge straight and erect under the rules that the motion to adjourn had to be first acted upon before the resolution offered by Congressman Burleson could be voted up or down.

Here I wish to insert Mr. Cannon's short speech, which time will mark and perpetuate as a classic defense of his position under the rules.

THE FAMOUS RESOLUTION DEFEATED

After prolonged and heated discussion on the resolution introduced by Congressman Burleson, of Texas, the Speaker pro tempore said:

The yeas and nays have been ordered on the resolution. The Clerk will call the roll. As many as are in favor of the adoption of the resolution will, as their names are called, answer "yea", those opposed will answer "nay"; and again the Chair cautions the House to keep in order during the roll call.

The resolution read as follows:

Resolved, That the office of Speaker of the House of Representatives is hereby declared vacant, and the House of Representatives shall at once proceed to the election of a Speaker.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 155, nays 192, answered "present" 8, not voting 33.

The only present Republican Member of Congress who voted against the resolution was BENJAMIN K. FOCHT, of the Eighteenth Pennsylvania District.

SPEECH OF "UNCLE JOE" CANNON

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted and to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska moves to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to and to lay that motion upon the table. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The Speaker asks the indulgence of the House for not exceeding 3 minutes to make a statement.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to withhold the motion.

The SPEAKER (Mr. Cannon). Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, actions, not words, determine the conduct and the sincerity of men in the affairs of life. This is a government by the people acting through the representatives of a majority of the people. Results cannot be had except by a majority; and in the House of Representatives a majority, being responsible, should have full power and should exercise that power, otherwise the majority is inefficient and does not perform its functions. The office of the minority is to put the majority on its good behavior, advocating, in good faith, the policies which it professes, ever ready to take advantage of the mistakes of the majority party, and appeal to the country for its vindication.

From time to time heretofore the majority has become the minority, as in the present case, and from time to time hereafter the majority will become the minority. The country believes that the Republican Party has a majority of 44 in the House of Representatives at this time, yet such is not the case.

The present Speaker of the House has, to the best of his ability and judgment, cooperated with the Republican Party; and so far in the history of this Congress the Republican Party in the House has been enabled by a very small majority, when the test came, to legislate in conformity with the policies and the platform of the Republican Party. Such action, of course, begot criticism—which the Speaker does not deprecate—on the part of the minority party.

The Speaker cannot be unmindful of the fact, as evidenced by three previous elections to the speakership, that in the past he has enjoyed the confidence of the Republican Party of the country and of the Republican Members of the House; but the assault upon the Speaker of the House by the minority, supplemented by the efforts of the so-called insurgents, shows that the Democratic minority, aided by a number of so-called insurgents, constituting 15 percent of the majority party in the House, is now in the majority, and that the Speaker of the House is not in harmony with the actual majority of the House, as evidenced by the vote just taken.

There are two courses open for the Speaker to pursue—one is to resign and permit the new combination of Democrats and insurgents to choose a Speaker in harmony with its aims and purposes. The other is for that combination to declare a vacancy in the office of Speaker and proceed to the election of a new Speaker. After consideration, at this stage of the session of the House, with much of important legislation pending involving the pledges of the Republican platform and their crystallization into law, believing that his resignation might consume weeks of time in the reorganization of the House, the Speaker, being in harmony with Republican policies and desirous of carrying them out, declines by his own motion to precipitate a contest upon the House in the election of a new Speaker; a contest that might greatly endanger the final passage of all legislation necessary to redeem Republican pledges and fulfill Republican promises. This is one reason why the Speaker does not resign at once; and another reason is this: In the judgment of the present Speaker, a resignation is in and of itself a confession of weakness or mistake or an apology for past actions. The Speaker is not conscious of having done any political wrong. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] The same rules are in force in this House that have been in force for two decades. The Speaker has construed the rules as he found them and as they have been construed by previous Speakers from Thomas B. Reed's incumbency down to the present time.

Heretofore the Speakers have been members of the Committee on Rules, covering a period of 60 years, and the present Speaker has neither sought new power nor has he unjustly used that already conferred upon him.

There has been much talk on the part of the minority and the insurgents of the "czarism" of the Speaker, culminating in the action taken today. The real truth is that there is no coherent Republican majority in the House of Representatives. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] Therefore, the real majority ought to have the courage of its convictions [applause on the Republican side] and logically meet the situation that confronts it.

The Speaker does now believe, and always has believed, that this is a government through parties, and that parties can act only through majorities. The Speaker has always believed in and bowed to the will of the majority in convention, in caucus, and in the legislative hall, and today profoundly believes that to act otherwise is to disorganize parties, is to prevent coherent action in any legislative body, is to make impossible the reflection of the wishes of the people in statutes and in laws.

The Speaker has always said that, under the Constitution, it is a question of the highest privilege for an actual majority of the House at any time to choose a new Speaker, and again notifies the House that the Speaker will at this moment, or at any other time while he remains Speaker, entertain, in conformity with the highest constitutional privilege, a motion by any Member to vacate the office of Speakership and choose a new Speaker [loud applause on the Republican side]; and, under existing conditions, would welcome such action upon the part of the actual majority of the House, so that power and responsibility may rest with the Democratic and insurgent Members who, by the last vote, evidently constitute a majority of this House. The Chair is now ready to entertain such motion. [Loud and long-continued applause on the Republican side; great confusion in the Hall.]

In conclusion let me observe that, as Shakespeare made Marc Antony say in his majestic oration that his heart was in Caesar's coffin, I believe that on this day, the one hundredth anniversary of Mr. Cannon's birth, there will be countless thousands who will recall his life with admiration and affection. Solon, the Greek philosopher and codifier of the laws of his country, admonished Croesus that nothing which might vanish can bring perpetual joy, and our departed friend of whom we have humbly spoken was free from all vain conceit, and we believe, with Solon, that "him only to whom the divinity has continued happiness unto the end we call happy."

The last days of Speaker Cannon were spent at his home at Danville, Ill., in the peace and quietude of the sear and yellow leaf of life, drawing solace and consolation from the philosophy and spiritual glow of the Holy Bible, and passing into the shadows beloved and lamented.

CONTRIBUTION BY HON. WILLIAM A. RODENBERG, WHO REPRESENTED THE TWENTY-SECOND ILLINOIS DISTRICT IN CONGRESS AT THE TIME, MARCH 19, 1910

Today is the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of a great American, who occupied a commanding position in national affairs for half a century. On May 7, 1836, Joseph Gurney Cannon was born at Guilford, N. C. His parents belonged to the Society of Friends, familiarly known as Quakers. In 1840, when Joseph was 4 years of age, the family moved to Bloomingdale, Ind., where some years later the father, who was a practicing physician, lost his life while attempting to ford a swollen stream on his way to call on a patient. The good doctor left his family in moderate circumstances, and at an early age Joseph secured employment as clerk in a country store, thus enabling him to contribute to the support of the family.

On one occasion, as a youth of about 20, he attended a famous trial in Bloomingdale, and so impressed was he by the eloquent arguments of the attorneys in the case that he resolved then and there to become a lawyer. By practicing the strictest economy he was able to save enough to spend a year at the Cincinnati Law School. In 1858, at the age of 22, he was admitted to the bar and commenced practice in Terre Haute, Ind. Not meeting with much success, he decided to migrate to Chicago, which then gave every evidence of becoming a great metropolis. The story is told—and I am sure that it is authentic—that his funds become exhausted long before reaching Chicago and that, upon the urgent solicitation of the conductor, he was compelled to leave the train at Tuscola, which had just been designated as the county seat of Douglas County, Ill. Undaunted and undismayed, the hero of this sketch proceeded to the only tavern in the new town, explained his predicament to the proprietor, and asked for "room and board" until such time as he might be able to pay. The proprietor was impressed by the earnestness of the young man's plea and consented to the arrangement. In later years Mr. Cannon was wont to tell with much relish that his first legal fee was 50 cents for writing a deed. In 1861, or 2 years after his arrival in Tuscola, he was elected State's attorney for the twenty-seventh judicial district of Illinois, which position he held until December 1868. His incumbency of the office of State's attorney covered the exciting days of the Civil War, and no civil officer in the great State of Illinois rendered more effective or patriotic service to the cause of the Union than Joseph G. Cannon. Douglas County was one of the hotbeds of southern sympathizers, and, despite threats of personal violence, the aggressive young State's attorney did not hesitate to prosecute them fearlessly and relentlessly. His activities in this crucial time in the Nation's history established a bond of undying personal friendship between himself and the immortal Abraham Lincoln.

In 1872, at the beginning of President Grant's second term, Mr. Cannon was elected to Congress, and with two intermissions he continued as a Member of Congress from 1873 to 1923, covering a period of 50 years of the most momentous history of the world. For 46 years he was a Member of this body, which up to now has established a record for all time.

For 8 years, from 1903 to 1911, "Uncle Joe", as he was known to every man, woman, and child in America, presided as Speaker of the House. There are only seven Members of the present Congress who had the honor and distinction of serving under his Speakership: The present distinguished Speaker, JOSEPH W. BYRNS, the beloved dean of the House; ADOLPH J. SABATH and JAMES MCANDREWS, of Illinois; EDWARD T. TAYLOR and JOHN A. MARTIN, of Colorado; WILLIAM A. ASHBROOK, of Ohio; and he who is now addressing you, Mr. FOCHT, of Pennsylvania.

I account it an honor and a privilege, which I am sure is shared by the others whom I have just mentioned, to pay tribute on this centennial anniversary of his birth, to the memory of the hero of a thousand legislative battles, a man of character, of courage, of integrity, of patriotism, who had justly endeared himself to posterity as one of the Nation's idols, "Uncle Joe" Cannon, of Illinois, born May 7, 1836, and called to his reward on November 12, 1926. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the Speaker of the House.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, as one of those who served under the former Speaker of this House, Hon. Joseph G. Cannon, I cannot refrain from saying just a word with reference to my great admiration and my very real affection for him and his memory.

When I came to Congress he had begun his last term as Speaker. In the next Congress his party assigned him as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, of which I had the honor to be a member.

It was my privilege to sit beside him in one of the important subcommittees of that committee during the consideration of bills pending before it. Because of this close association I came to know him intimately during this time. As a member of that committee he showed the same courage, the same loyal regard for his country, the same earnest desire to protect the Treasury of the United States during this time that I am sure he had shown during the time he was chairman of that great committee before he was elected Speaker.

Mr. Cannon was one of the truly great men of his time. Some of us differed from him upon policies of government, but no one ever questioned his honesty, his sincerity, or his patriotism, and he wielded an influence second to none, not only in that committee but in the Congress. As we all know, he was known to his colleagues in the House as "Uncle Joe", a term of affection and endearment; in fact, he was so known all over this country, and when after many, many years of public service he felt it necessary to voluntarily retire, a short time before his death there was not a Member on either side of the Chamber who did not feel a sense of deep personal regret, and there is no Member who ever served with him who will not always remember him for his loyalty and his patriotism. He was one of the last of the Speakers who had the responsibility and the privilege of naming the standing committees of the House. He was the last of the Speakers who was chairman of the Committee on Rules, a committee, as I recall, consisting of five members, and the committee which shaped the policy and the program of the House. He exercised tremendous power, but he was always fair and just. Of course, he fought vigorously for those things in which he believed. He never surrendered a principle, but I feel that every man who ever served under him felt that "Uncle Joe" was anxious to see that every Member had all the privileges that he should have upon the floor of this House.

I will always remember and feel proud of the fact that it was my privilege to serve under him as Speaker for one term and then to serve with him in the Committee on Appropriations where I gathered wisdom from his earnest, patriotic, and sincere efforts to protect the Treasury of the United States and his great legislative experience. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that not only those who have spoken but that all Members may have the privilege of extending their remarks in the RECORD with reference to the late Speaker Cannon for 5 legislative days, and may I make the observation, Mr. Speaker, that one of his oldest friends desired time, but, unfortunately, it was impossible for me to yield to him and, therefore, I especially desire that he should have the privilege of extending his remarks. I refer to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MCANDREWS.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MCANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor of being a Member of the Fifty-eighth Congress, when Uncle Joe Cannon was first elected to the Speakership of the House. At that time he was 67 years of age, had already served more than a quarter of a century in Congress, but there was no Member of the House who was more vigorous, physically and intellectually, than Uncle Joe. He seemed to be in the very prime of life and towered like a giant among his fellow Members. He was a master of debate, forceful, courageous, and resourceful, neither asking nor giving quarter. With a wealth of knowledge gained in the great school of human experience, the school that has given to the Nation many of its best and greatest statesmen, Joseph G. Cannon was thoroughly equipped for legislative work. His memory was most remarkable and he could draw on his wonderful store of knowledge of men and events without the slightest hesitation. Whenever he addressed himself to any subject of public interest he always commanded the rapt attention of the House, because every Member felt that Uncle Joe would throw real light and information on the subject under discussion. He never talked simply to be talking. He believed that the time of the House was too valuable to be wasted in idle chatter.

While an intense partisan of the old school, yet he was always so frank, so fair, and so disarming in his inherent honesty that he commanded the full respect of all of us who sat on the Democratic side of the House. When Uncle Joe was elected to his first term as Speaker, the brilliant and versatile John Sharpe Williams, of Mississippi, was elevated to the position of minority leader. Upon the end of the first day of the new Congress, John Sharpe called on the newly elected Speaker and, after extending his personal congratulations, observed, "Uncle Joe, now that you are our Speaker, I hope that during your incumbency you will always treat the Democratic side fairly and justly." Uncle Joe grasped the minority leader's hand and replied: "John Sharpe, I will be as fair and just as the exigencies of politics will permit me to be." Incidentally, there was never any interruption in the cordial personal relations between Uncle Joe and John Sharpe Williams, or his illustrious successor as minority leader, the greatly beloved Champ Clark, of Missouri.

It was my good fortune to come into close personal contact with Mr. Cannon, and the memory of that delightful friendship will abide with me until the end of time. I admired and loved him for his many kindly human qualities. He was the very soul of personal and political courage and integrity. While tenacious in his political opinions, knowing him as I knew him, I feel justified in saying that Uncle Joe never knowingly did an injustice to any human being. Broad in his sympathies and always tolerant in his views, he endeared himself to his legion of friends and commanded the respect and admiration of those who were politically opposed to him. "Of such is the kingdom of the heaven that I hope to inhabit."

DIGEST OF TESTIMONY—HOUSE HEARINGS ON $1,500,000,000 RELIEF PROPOSAL, APRIL 8–13, 1936

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein certain tables.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, President Roosevelt sent a message to Congress on March 18, 1936, requesting an appropriation of $1,500,000,000 for the continuation of the Works Progress Administration through the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937. Hearings were held on this proposal April 8–13 before a subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations.

At the hearings, the principal witnesses were: Harry L. Hopkins, Administrator of the Works Progress Administration, and Daniel W. Bell, Acting Director of the Budget. The principal points of the testimony at the hearings will here be summarized with interpretative comment.

GENERAL STATUS OF RELIEF FUNDS

The funds requested are in addition to balances from the $4,880,000,000 appropriated last year for the works program, to be available until June 30, 1937.

Mr. Bell testified that when the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 was approved on April 8, 1935, $4,576,000,000 was actually available and the remainder had been used to repay transfers previously made to the Federal Emergency Relief Administration out of former appropriations. On March 31, 1936, all of this $4,576,000,000 had been allocated to specific projects with the exception of $68,000,000. Of the $4,508,000,000 that had been allocated, $3,466,000,000 had been obligated and $2,515,000,000 had been actually expended and thus on March 31, 1936, $2,061,000,000 was unexpended, of which $1,110,000,000 was unobligated. Monthly expenditures from this fund are being made at the rate of more than $229,000,000. Mr. Hopkins estimated that something over a billion dollars of the funds appropriated in 1935 for emergency relief would remain unexpended on June 30, 1936. Mr. Bell stated that he believed that approximately $1,780,000,000 would remain unexpended from funds appropriated by Congress during the period 1933 to 1935 for the purpose of relief.

It is to be noted that with the addition of the proposed $1,500,000,000 the administration would have nearly $3,300,000,000, the amount of the original N. I. R. A. appropriation in 1933.

In his message to Congress President Roosevelt estimated that there were at that time about 5,300,000 relief cases, of which 3,800,000 were being cared for by the works program and the remainder by the States. With all the funds available during 1937—the billion and one-half dollars requested, the unknown amount, exceeding $1,000,000,000, which will remain unexpended on June 30, 1936, from the $4,880,000,000, and the funds requested for the continuance of the C. C. C. and for the construction of regular Government public works—Mr. Hopkins estimated that only 2,843,000 relief cases could be taken care of through the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937. He stated also that he did not believe that the relief load would decline during the next fiscal year.

He went on to admit that he did not believe the funds requested by the President would be sufficient to carry on the work-relief program during the fiscal year 1937. He also stated that it was his personal belief that additional funds would have to be requested from Congress for the continuation of the program to June 30, 1937. Mr. Hopkins estimated that 2,000,000 people could be given work relief for 1 year with the $1,500,000,000 requested by the President. The cost would then be approximately $750 per man. At another point in the testimony Mr. Hopkins stated that at the present time work relief under the W. P. A. was costing the Federal Government approximately $792 per year per man.

All of the new funds requested are ostensibly to be utilized for the Works Progress Administration. This was not true of the $4,880,000,000 appropriated last year which was earmarked by Congress for certain classes of expenditure. Only $1,363,926,901 of that sum was allocated to the W. P. A. For the continuation of relief through December 1935, $938,530,085 was allocated to the F. E. R. A. To the Public Works Administration $447,476,447 was given. The Resettlement Administration received $230,308,400 up to March 31, 1936. Five hundred million dollars was allocated for the construction of public roads and grade-crossing elimination. The C. C. C. received $527,479,450. The rest of the sum was allocated to numerous other agencies.

NEW FUND NOT EXCLUSIVELY FOR W. P. A.

Mr. Hopkins stated on a number of occasions that all of the funds requested would be utilized for the continuation of the W. P. A. But this is not accurate, as his testimony at another point in the hearings demonstrates. He estimated that $90,000,000, or 8 percent of the requested fund would be used for rural rehabilitation and direct relief to farmers. When pressed on this point he admitted that this money would be expended through the Resettlement Administration.

(His reticence in admitting that any of these funds would be used for the Resettlement Administration is founded on an obvious reason. If the President or Mr. Hopkins made an outright admission that part of this appropriation would be used for the continuation of the Resettlement Administration there would be a very good reason for calling Dr. Rexford Guy Tugwell, the Administrator of the Resettlement Administration, to take the stand. Many Members of Congress, both Democratic and Republican, would like to see Mr. Tugwell put on the stand in an investigation. This does not seem to be desired by the administration leaders.)

The complete break-down of the proposed expenditure of this requested billion and one-half dollar fund is as follows: Highways and streets, 29 percent; public buildings, 11 percent; parks, 11 percent; public utilities, water supply, and sanitation, 12 percent; flood control and conservation, 9 percent; white-collar projects, 6 percent; women's projects, 6 percent; national youth administration, 5 percent; rural rehabilitation, 6 percent; and miscellaneous work projects, 5 percent.

In the absence of earmarking in the pending bill, Mr. Hopkins could allocate to the Resettlement Administration portions of the funds covered by other items in this break-down. Or, of course, for that matter, there probably would be nothing to prevent Mr. Hopkins from entirely disregarding this break-down in the expenditure of funds.

ALLOCATION AMONG STATES

When Mr. Hopkins was asked how W. P. A. funds had been allocated among the several States, he answered as follows:

> Of course, our wage rate varies in various parts of the country, depending in part on the cost of living. Therefore, that affects, of course, the amount of money in dollars paid in a particular State for the same number of people. It takes fewer dollars to take care of the same number of people in Mississippi than to take care of them in New York. You will find that we have a larger work program in one State than we have in another with the same population, the reason being that the degree of unemployment is greater and the degree of need greater in one State than in another. The program must be adjusted to need (p. 180).

This statement does not indicate the existence of any standards that can be used in allocating funds, as the following data show: Per-capita allocation of W. P. A. funds were as follows (selected States):

New York	$20.63
Virginia	4.83
Colorado	17.25
Utah	13.71
North Carolina	3.84

These States received the following per-capita total allocations under the act of 1935:

New York	$43.61
Virginia	23.69
Colorado	56.92

The Works Progress Administration has allocated $1,113,271,212 to more than 80,000 works projects. Local sponsors will contribute $254,790,522 for these works projects. Thus the local contribution will average about 18.6 percent. Concerning the method used in determining the contributions to be made by sponsors, Mr. Hopkins had this to say:

> Now, the extent of their contribution was determined by the type of work to be done, the financial condition of the local sponsoring agency, and the estimate of the locality's participation in other parts of the program. In that connection you could get a higher percent of contributions for one kind of work than you could for another. Our policy in securing local contributions was a policy of insisting that the local government put up as much as was reasonable. That varies, of course, in various places, and I have no doubt that some injustices were done as between one area and another and as between one State and another. We had to take into consideration the fact that one State had put up a lot of money for Public Works Administration projects. They had put up their money, whereas in another State they may have had no Public Works Administration projects, and consequently had put up no funds. We took all of this into consideration (p. 180).

Let us see what the picture is when the sponsors' contributions are considered by States. In Wyoming sponsors contributed 43 percent of the cost of all projects undertaken, whereas both in West Virginia and in the District of Columbia such contributions were only 8.2 percent. The figures for a few other States follow: Idaho, 40.6 percent; Georgia, 40.3 percent; Rhode Island, 34.1 percent; Vermont, 31.6 percent; and Kentucky, 30.8 percent.

Sponsors' contributions varied widely with the different kinds of projects. Twenty-six percent of the cost of sanitation projects was contributed by sponsors. On the following type of projects the sponsors contributed the indicated percentages: Public buildings, 22.5 percent; highways, 22.2 percent; parks, 11.4 percent; and goods (sewing, canning, etc.), 9.2 percent.

RELIEF STANDARDS NOT CLEAR

Supposedly the program under the Emergency Relief Act of 1935 is for the purpose of giving work relief to unemployed employables on relief. Mr. Hopkins admitted that he had no accurate information concerning the number of unemployed, the number of employables who are unemployed, or the number of people who are registered as being on relief at the present time. The determination of the question of who is and who is not to receive relief is left up to the States. The W. P. A. has not defined standards of what constitutes a person on relief, and no check is exercised over the States in determining who is and who is not to be put on relief. The determination of who is or who is not employable in the last resort is determined by the United States Employment Service or the United States Reemployment Service, which are Federal agencies. The formulation of standards to determine the employable character of a person then rests primarily with the Federal Government, but Mr. Hopkins admits that no such standards have been formulated. Concerning this problem he says:

> "Employability is largely a question of the economic condition of the country. That is, when times are booming, almost everybody is employable, then all of a sudden there is a depression and then a lot of people are unemployable and all big industries change their standards of employability. The question of determining who is employable and who is not is a very difficult matter, and I think strict regulations about employability do a real injury to a lot of the people who may have slight injuries—competent, able people" (p. 225).

Yet, in another place in the same hearings, after admitting a lack of data concerning the exact number of those on relief and the number of employables on relief, he asserted that 85 percent of the employables on relief in January 1936 were being taken care of through Federal work-relief projects. How did he know? Of the 3,763,334 persons being employed on the entire work-relief program, exclusive of administrative employees, 364,928, about 9 percent, were not taken from the relief rolls, and 8.4 percent of the pay roll on work-relief projects is being used to pay persons who are not on relief. During March the total administrative staff being paid from this relief appropriation was 144,095.

ACTUAL BENEFITS TO UNEMPLOYED NOT SHOWN

Mr. Hopkins at no point states the man-years of work that will be secured from the $4,880,000,000 appropriation. In fact, no data are presented in the hearings on which anyone could compute the number of men that could be put to work for 1 year with this sum. There are no data presented in the hearings from which a person could determine how much of this vast sum of money is actually being expended for work-relief purposes and how much is being expended for such visionary purposes as land purchases.

All persons who are given employment on work-relief projects must have been on State relief rolls during the month of November 1935. Mr. Hopkins admitted that there was no logic behind the setting of the November deadline for the determination of who should or who should not be given work relief, and that probably it should be revised.

ALIENS ON RELIEF

Mr. Hopkins also admitted that aliens were receiving work-relief jobs. He did not seem to be able to see anything wrong in this situation. He could furnish no data on the number of aliens who are employed under the work-relief program. He also admitted that aliens illegally admitted to the country were being employed, and he did not appear to believe that this was an undesirable situation.

PROPORTION OF W. P. A. FUNDS SPENT FOR RELIEF LABOR

To employ one man for a year under W. P. A. costs an average of $972, of which $600 goes to the man as wages, while the additional $372 goes for materials and supervision. The Federal Government pays for approximately $192 of this overhead and the local sponsors contribute $160. This means that approximately 38 percent of all funds expended under the W. P. A. program are spent for other purposes than for the wages of persons on relief, and it should be recalled also that approximately 9 percent of the nonadministrative staff on all works projects are persons who are not on relief.

The average monthly rate of pay on work-relief projects under the W. P. A. varies from $72.23 in New York City to $23.93 in North Carolina. The average for the entire country is $50.06. The differences in monthly wage rates supposedly is determined by differences in the cost of living, but the monthly-wage rate in Connecticut is $64.33, in Rhode Island $56.93, and in Massachusetts $59.38. Mr. Hopkins at no place stated how the cost of living is determined. The average hourly rate of pay on work-relief projects is 41.6 cents. In New York City it was 65.2 cents, and for the rest of the country it was 38.4 cents.

W. P. A. FUNDS TO BE EXHAUSTED SOON

Of the somewhat over a billion dollars that has been allocated to the Works Progress Administration, approximately $371,000,000 remained unobligated and approximately $583,500,000 remained unexpended on March 31, 1936. The W. P. A. is spending approximately $191,000,000 a month. If it is to continue in operation until July 1 approximately $150,000,000 will have to be transferred from other funds to it, according to Mr. Hopkins—but it will probably be more than that. Mr. Hopkins asserts that all projects undertaken under the W. P. A. will be completed on that date, but he did admit that many projects, such as highways, would only be partially completed on that date.

When Mr. Hopkins was asked for information concerning politics in the administration of the Works Progress Administration he assumed the general attitude that he was not responsible for such circumstances, if they existed. He seemed to feel that he had done his part when he had written to the local administrators informing them that campaign contributions were not to be solicited from employees on work-relief projects. He did not seem to realize that inasmuch as all officials of the W. P. A. are Federal employees, and not State or local officials, he was directly responsible for their actions.

F. E. R. A. COSTS OF ADMINISTRATION

These hearings brought to light some evidence previously unobtainable relative to the administration of relief under the F. E. R. A. For the first time figures on administrative expenditures incurred by the States and the Federal Government for the administration of relief under the F. E. R. A. were made public. During the entire period of 1933 to 1935, 10.7 percent of all funds expended for relief went for administrative purposes. Administrative costs were lowest in the State of Vermont, where they only accounted for 5.4 percent of the expenditures. They were highest in South Carolina, where they were 18.3 percent. The figures for the following States may be of some interest: Georgia, 17.7 percent; Virginia, 17.5 percent; Kentucky, 16 percent; Maine, 6.1 percent; and Massachusetts, 5.8 percent.

The trend of relief as shown by the figures contained in the appendix to the hearings is of some interest. In July 1933 there were 3,908,068 relief cases. By January 1935 the number had increased to 5,273,472, and in June 1935 there were 4,530,852 relief cases. (It is interesting to compare these figures with the estimates of unemployment prepared by the National Industrial Conference Board. According to these figures there were 11,809,000 unemployed in July 1933; in January 1933 the figure was 10,340,000; and in June of the same year it was 9,092,000.)

The cost of relief per family increased tremendously during the period from the inception of the F. E. R. A. to the present time. The monthly payments per family in May 1933 were $15.15, and in January 1935 the figure was $30.45.

HOW MANY COULD BE CARRIED ON DIRECT RELIEF?

When Mr. Hopkins was asked how many families could be taken care of under direct relief for 1 year through the utilization of all funds available to the W. P. A., Mr. Hopkins estimated the number to be 3,226,800. In arriving at this estimate Mr. Hopkins stated that the average cost of relief per family per month during the last fiscal year was $33.66 (p. 177).

ALLOCATION OF F. E. R. A. FUNDS TO STATES

These hearings contain no additional data concerning the method of allocating funds to the States for the purpose of relief under the F. E. R. A. In fact the data contained in appendix F to these hearings, covering pages 375 to 418, does not give even as lucid an explanation of the matter as did Mr. Hopkins in his letter to the Senate printed in Senate Document 56, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session.

In the appendix to the present hearings it is stated on pages 396 and 397 that the following considerations determined the size of the relief grants that were given to the several States: First. The extent of the program currently operated by the States. This supposedly meant the relief program that a State was willing and desirous of administering. Second. The general administrative policy of the Federal Government toward relief; that is, whether the Federal Government believed it desirable to raise or lower the general standard of relief for the whole country. Third. The number of relief cases in each State. Fourth. The cost of relief per case in each State. Fifth. The nature of the relief program of the State; that is, whether the State was operating on the basis of direct relief only or on the basis of direct relief and work relief. Sixth. Seasonal factors; that is, relief costs are lower in warm weather than in cold. Seventh. Emergency situations, such as floods, earthquakes, strikes, and so forth. Eighth. Administrative considerations. In a few instances where the Governor or legislature of a State failed to make adequate funds available the F. E. R. A. temporarily withheld funds or reduced grants until the situation was remedied. Ninth. The total funds available for the Nation.

It should be noted that this statement does not indicate that the financial abilities of the several States were taken into consideration when relief funds were allocated. Relative to the determination of the financial abilities of the States, Mr. Hopkins made the following remarks:

> Now, it is patently the case that we do not pay the same percentage in all States, for simple reason that the per-capita wealth in one community that may have a great deal of unemployment may be very low, while the per-capita wealth of another community with the same amount of unemployment may be twice as much.
> Now, obviously, one community is more able to pay than the other. We have been unable to find any criterion by which you can determine accurately and scientifically what a community can or cannot afford to pay or whether they can afford to pay a higher percentage than they have been paying.
> We have simply acted on the basis of the best advice and information we could get. If you will look at the figures of the money that was distributed, you will find that the most dollars were distributed to places where there was the greatest unemployment and heaviest relief program. The argument always centered around whether the percentage that goes to a State is too high and not whether the number of dollars is too great (p. 151).

Obviously, with such a long list of factors to be considered in the allocation of relief funds, and in the absence of any objective standard to determine the relative weight to be given each factor, no scientific basis seems to have been used for apportioning the funds among the States. The wide variations in Federal apportionments per relief family among the various States suggest the possibility that funds were given out arbitrarily according to the wishes of the administration.

Mr. Hopkins repeatedly said that more money is now being secured for relief purposes from States and local government than was being secured several years ago, but during the first quarter of 1933 the Federal Government paid 58.4 percent of the total cost of relief, and during the first quarter of 1935 it was paying 77.8 percent of the total cost of relief.

TESTIMONY CONFINED TO W. P. A.

Throughout the hearings on the requested relief appropriation the members of the House Committee on Appropriations were greatly hampered by the fact that Mr. Hopkins alone was called to give evidence. He repeatedly took the attitude that he was only to give evidence on the administration of the W. P. A. and F. E. R. A. rather than to give data concerning the administration of the entire $4,880,000,000 appropriation of 1935.

There were a number of occasions when members of the subcommittee requested information concerning the administration of the entire work-relief fund, but to the question of these members Mr. Hopkins gave answers only concerning the Works Progress Administration. For example, he was asked for information concerning radio broadcasts. To this question he answered that the Works Progress Administration had no funds for such purposes. He did not tell the members that funds had been allocated to the Office of Education for the purpose of developing a program of radio broadcasts in connection with the Civilian Conservation Corps. It was also impossible to get from Mr. Hopkins data on the costs of work relief per man in agencies other than the Works Progress Administration.

The accompanying table compares the allocations from funds appropriated under the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 with the relief case load in the several States for the month of June 1935—the latest obtainable complete figures.

It will be noted from the table that there are wide differences in the total amounts allotted to the various States per relief case in those States. Over $3,600 was allotted to Wyoming per relief case while in Pennsylvania $670 was allotted per relief case and in South Dakota $548 per relief case.

The allocation of funds only for W. P. A. as contrasted with allocations for all agencies indicates similar striking differences. Allotment was made to Maryland of $291 per relief case, $132 in South Dakota, $176 in Kentucky, while in New York $479 was allotted per relief case.

EULOGY TO THE MOTHERS OF AMERICA

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein my personal eulogy to the mothers of America, National Mother's Day being May 10 next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, next Sunday, May 10, will be the Mother's Day, and, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my personal eulogy to the mothers of America:

Perhaps the most important and widest-reaching of all influences which constantly bear upon us in this world are those which arise from the nature and relationships of our home. A combination of instincts and circumstances, some of which we hold in common with the lower animals and some of which are higher and quite peculiar to ourselves, make a home essential to our well-being and happiness. And it is home that has given unto us the goddess of love on earth, "Our Mothers." Home is the central spot on earth about which lodge three-fourths of the pleasant or sorrowful memories of life. The tendrils of the youthful heart wrap themselves around it so tightly that even the shock of years or the deadening strain of distance cannot pull them away. And there was never a home but what was spun from the gorgeous fabric of motherhood. There is no other such charmed word in the English language as that little word "mother." There is no other song that can thrill the soul with such magnetic power and can so surely melt the stony heart to tears as that song of life which has an unwritten melody in the heartstrings of us all—that song which mother sang in the crooning lisp to a babe upon her knee. God, in all His infinite majesty, sought out a monument on earth never to be destroyed by selfishness; He patterned his structure after His own beauty reflected in the garden of roses; He painted it with the iridescent colors of the mirrored lake at sunset overcome with its own serenity and reflecting the diadems of heavenly stars as they glitter their jealous sparkle into its bosom of softness.

He touches its finished texture with the sweetness of Mary Magdalene, and then to set it apart as the earthly masterpiece of things humanly divine, he added patience, kindness, and love, and no man shall ever put asunder amid humanity's afflicted masses, this monument of God erected on earth in the form of "Mother." And what is this motherly patience of which I speak? It is the angels who sit by man, holding out a full bowl of life's rich contentment. And what is this motherly kindness? It is the pleasant words, the gentle smile, the loving forethought which mothers never fail to lavish upon us and which overcomes despair to make life a dream of happiness. And motherly love—that something which knows no depth, no faltering, no conquering; that tenderness of care born of the heavens above; that pureness of care that rides the juggernauts on life's tempestuous sea as though on the calm of even'tide—in short, that which only a mother can give.

My mother, your mother, our mothers—God bless them all—sweet mother, kind mother, whose unjeweled hand smoothed the sweetness of baby fingers; whose sweet, tender voice was alike unto the echo of evening zephyrs hallowing the environment of home; with eyes in whose clear depths the love-light shone; soft, brown hair just threaded with silver, lying smoothly upon her cheek; dear old wrinkled hands, worn with toil, gently guiding our tottering steps in sickness; even reaching out in yearning tenderness to when her sweet spirit was baptized in the early spray of the river of hope. Ah, perhaps you who are listening to me, cherish with me the memory of the mother who has gone on to her great reward—a memory that floats to us now like the beautiful perfume from the flowered dells of our Southland. The music of other voices may be lost, but the entrancing memory of hers echoes to our soul forever.

Hundreds of stars in the silent sky,
Hundreds of shells on the shore together,
Hundreds of birds that go singing by,
Hundreds of bees in sunny weather,
Hundreds of dewdrops to greet the dawn,
Hundreds of lambs in the purple clover,
Hundreds of butterflies on the lawn,
But only one mother the wide world over.

And it seems so sad that human frailty causes such a serious neglect of appreciation of the living mother. I am wondering if you whose mothers are either by your side or elsewhere are fully cognizant of the tide of motherhood that is ebbing slowly but surely away—if you have considered the truth as it is, that she is the living friend who knows no end to save and sooth your pain; that bouquets and love baskets will best meet your hopes and wishes now while she might inhale the sweetness of their odor and bathe in the parental joy of your thoughtfulness? Give her that soft and caressing kiss that she so yearns for. Feed her upon the daily thoughtfulness that she so richly deserves but which most of us so negligently and carelessly fail to give her. Give her a moment of your time to listen to the sweet reminiscences of your early childhood which she holds so dear to her heart. Put aside the selfish ideas that only one day in the year is Mother's Day, because I tell you religiously that when the soft steps of her sacred feet shall have faded from earth and the shadows of death shall have enveloped her precious earthly soul, there will never be a day in your life but what will be filled with stern grief over the loss of your mother, because, when all is said and done and she has gone on to the Father of us all, you will find that—

You've lived to learn that friends grow weak
When trouble marks you for its own—
The ones you love oft turn aside
And leave the fight to you alone.

And, in the words of another:

When mother has gone, your supplications will be offered fourfold, only to find them too late.

I've stood on many scenes of strife, I've stood where care and pain assailed; and tho friends often turned away, yet, mother's hand has never failed.

As in childhood far removed, she smoothed my brow and dried each tear, still in young manhood's troubled hour with loving words she hovered near. Oh, fickle love and friendship false; Oh, glittering dreams and hopes bewailed, you weakened in life's darkest hour, but mother's love has never failed. Whatever God shall choose to do with this frail tenement of clay; whatever use he finds for it along life's dark and dreary way, that much shall be a monument to tell mankind, wher'er assailed, a mother's love, a mother's prayers, a mother's hand has never failed.

And how mortally true are these words—how many times when the tempter lures us on has the memory of that sacred hour, that mother's words, her prayers, saved us from plunging into the deep abyss of sin. Years have filled great drifts between her and us, but they may not take from our sight the glory of pure, unselfish love. And as I have said before, other faces may fade and be forgotten, but her's shall shine on until the light from heaven's portals will glorify our own. When the fitful pauses of busy feet wander back to the old homestead and cross the well-worn threshold, stand once more in the low, quaint room, so hallowed by her presence, how the feeling of childish innocence and dependence comes over us and we kneel down in the molten sunshine streaming in at the window covered by the morning glory, just where long years ago we knelt down by our mother's knee lisping:

Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name; Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil, for Thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, forever and ever. Amen.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. BUCHANAN, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 12624) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1936, and June 30, 1937, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 2591), which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all points of order against the bill be considered as waived.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to ask a question. Just exactly what does the gentleman have in mind in asking that all points of order be waived? Does the request apply also to any amendment that may be offered to the bill?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It would not apply to any germane amendment. The request simply waives all points of order against any provision in the bill and the bill is to be considered under the general rules for the conduct of business in the House.

Mr. SNELL. The request applies to nothing further than what is contained in the bill at the present time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is correct.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is an appropriation bill and the request is very unusual. It would be a bad precedent to establish, and I object.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; I will reserve the objection, but unless some good reason is given I shall object. A precedent is being set with respect to an appropriation bill which would make it impossible to raise a point of order if there was anything in the bill that would be subject to a point of order, and in this connection let me call attention to the fact that the bill has just been made available to the Members and there are over 2,000 pages of hearings which no one has had an opportunity to read and I do not think we should waive all points of order against something that no one has any information about except the members of the committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that we are trying to expedite the consideration of the bill as much as possible consonant with its intelligent consideration. We propose to be liberal in debate and to sit until midnight tomorrow night if necessary.

Of course, objection to waiving points of order on the bill will cause a rule to be brought in and consume that much more time. To refuse to waive them will not accomplish any good purpose, but will simply cause that much more trouble.

Mr. MICHENER. Does the gentleman mind stating the irrelevant matter in the bill that you will have to sustain by a rule?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will state to the gentleman some of them. I do not know that I can state all of them, but I may say that the principal one is with respect to relief. There is no law authorizing an appropriation for relief and this provision would be subject to a point of order. This item amounts to $1,425,000,000.

Then, there is an item of $65,000,000 for public buildings throughout the United States and every congressional district will probably get one of them. There is no authorization of law for that and on a point of order this item would go out of the bill.

The Civilian Conservation Corps paragraph is subject to a point of order and there is a number of smaller things in the bill not so important. If points of order were made and sustained under the rule there would be no use in reporting the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. As I understand it, the granting of the gentleman's request will have no effect whatever on amendments which may be offered outside of the provisions in the bill. The regular rules of the House will still prevail and amendments that are not in the bill will have to be germane if points of order are raised against them.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman's understanding is correct.

Mr. MICHENER. That was stated in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]. If that is all there is to it, I shall withdraw my objection, but I do want it understood that in the future I shall object to any waiving of points of order, especially on bills of which the House has no information. The majority has the votes and the power; any objection on my part could accomplish nothing but would take up time.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman what is the total amount to be appropriated in this bill?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Less than $25,000,000 of actual deficiency.

Mr. RICH. We have just now received the hearings and bill under discussion, which I hold in my hand. This is the first opportunity Members of the House have had to know anything about this bill. It seems to me the chairman of this committee and the membership of the House should know something about the bill at least a day before they bring up appropriation bills and ask the membership to pass upon them, especially one appropriating over $2,000,000,000.

I do not think it is within rhyme or good reason or good sense to do things the way we are doing them. Then the gentleman asks us in 2 days to consider and pass a bill appropriating more than $2,000,000,000. I do not think we ought to do these things in this way. The Members of this House should have such a bill at least 1 week previous to its consideration, in order to study its contents; not a bill appropriating $2,000,000,000 given us 10 minutes before its consideration on the floor. The largest business in the world, the United States Government, conducting itself in very poor business procedure. Why, Mr. Speaker, do we do it?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I simply want to say that it is not conceivable to me that Members would object to relief appropriations or public works mentioned here. If that is the only two points that are waived, it is inconceivable to me that the waiver is necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12624) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1936, and June 30, 1937, and for other purposes. And pending that, I would like to fix the time for general debate.

Mr. TABER. I suggest 7 hours' general debate confined to the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate continue for 7 hours, confined to the bill, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill. Pending that he asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 7 hours, to be confined to the bill, and to be controlled equally by himself and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]. Is there objection?

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to ask the gentleman from Texas whether if there is to be a roll call on the bill the vote may take place on Monday next.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have no authority to do that now, but I have no objection to such an arrangement.

Mr. PARSONS. Several Members are away who will be back on Monday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, if we happen to reach a final vote on this bill Friday night and the previous question can be ordered on the bill, as far as I am concerned, I have no objection to its going over until Monday to take the vote.

Mr. TABER. Or a final vote on a motion to recommit, provided the previous question is ordered.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12624, the deficiency appropriation bill, with Mr. MCCORMACK in the chair.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], who will relieve me somewhat because of my physical condition.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, the bill (H. R. 12624) now being presented to the Committee of the Whole, is very comprehensive. It covers a great many subjects and appropriates a lot of money. However, in the years that I have served on the Committee on Appropriations I have never known a bill to receive more careful deliberation, consideration, and scrutiny than the one we bring to you today. In spite of the fact that our beloved and distinguished chairman has not felt well, he has labored long and hard in the preparation of this bill, oftentimes over the protest of his colleagues, and he would probably be down here now explaining the bill to you had it not been for some of us insisting that he keep his seat. Also, the minority of the committee, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON], and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THURSTON], have attended the sessions of the subcommittee and have interrogated the witnesses. They have scrutinized the requests for appropriations in connection with this bill. We bring you comprehensive and voluminous hearings, 2,000 printed pages, which I believe will show that the subjects have been gone into very carefully. I say this merely as a prelude to this proposition, that we ask you to give consideration to the fact that your committee, minority as well as majority, brings you the result of their deliberations and consideration.

Very likely during the course of the bill there will be differences of opinion about certain items in the bill, but the issues have been narrowed. The facts are here, and the evidence is here, and you gentlemen will be the arbiters.

I do not want to consume a lot of time. It would be very easy to discuss this bill all afternoon. It has broad ramifications and covers many subjects. I shall hit the high spots, what I think to be the major items, and then endeavor as best I can to answer any questions that may be propounded.

The total Budget estimates sent to us for this bill amounted to $2,388,088,980.91. We bring you a bill totaling $2,364,229,712.53, after having deducted $23,859,268.38 from the estimates. Perhaps that does not seem to be a very great reduction in so large a total, but when you consider the fact that approximately a billion and a half dollars in one lump sum is the item for relief, that something like another half billion dollars goes for the social-security program, and over three hundred million for the C. C. C., I feel that we have made substantial reductions in the bill at points where it could and should be reduced. I call attention to the further fact that although this is called a "deficiency" appropriation bill, yet the real "deficiencies" carried in the bill are something like 1 percent of the whole amount, or less than $25,000,000, the remaining items being for the Tennessee Valley Authority, public buildings, and for regular

Federal activities. The following table gives a bird's-eye view of the estimates and appropriations:

Purpose	Budget estimates	Amounts recommended	Increase (+) or decrease (−), bill compared with Budget estimates
Works Progress Administration (1937)	$1,500,000,000.00	$1,425,000,000.00	−$75,000,000.00
Emergency Conservation Work (1937)	246,000,000.00	308,000,000.00	+62,000,000.00
Social Security:
Social Security Board (1937)	195,800,000.00	187,800,000.00	−8,000,000.00
Treasury Department (1937)	270,831,860.00	270,831,860.00
Public Buildings, Treasury Department:
Outside the District of Columbia (1937)	53,350,000.00	63,350,000.00	+10,000,000.00
Within the District of Columbia (1937)	7,700,000.00	2,200,000.00	−5,500,000.00
Tennessee Valley Authority (1937)	43,000,000.00	39,900,000.00	−3,100,000.00
Post Office Department (40-hour week and increased business) (1936)	40,581,250.00	40,506,250.00	−75,000.00
All other purposes (supplemental amounts for 1936 and 1937 and deficiencies for 1936 and prior years)	30,825,870.91	26,641,602.53	−4,184,268.38
Total	2,388,088,980.91	2,364,229,712.53	−23,859,268.38

I shall talk now for a few minutes about the Works Progress Administration, because that is the largest item in the bill, and I have an idea it will be one of the items which will engage your interest during the consideration of the bill. The President's request for this appropriation was for a billion and a half. The committee brings it to you $1,425,000,000, and the reduction of $75,000,000 was occasioned in this wise: It will be recalled that there was a great deal of interest manifested when it was announced that a reduction in the Civilian Conservation Corps camps would be made about the 1st of April, and that many Members of the House, on both sides of the aisle, were interested in seeing that part of the recovery program continue as long as possible. After conferences it was agreed that the President should allocate to the C. C. C. program a certain sum of money which would carry them along during the remainder of this fiscal year, and that there would be supplied in this bill an additional $62,000,000 to bring the amount up from $246,000,000 to $308,000,000, which would continue the more than 2,000 camps, with 350,000 enrollees, during 9 months of the next fiscal year. So we have carried here the additional $62,000,000 for the Civilian Conservation Corps for the 9-month period, which will give an average of 2,066 camps during that period, with an enrollment of 350,000.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does that mean the 9 months immediately succeeding June 30 next?

Mr. WOODRUM. It is the first 9 months of the next fiscal year.

Mr. MAY. And that begins June 30?

Mr. WOODRUM. That begins July 1. It runs from then to March 31, 1937.

Now, let me say this about the camps. We are all interested in the camps, but bear in mind that the entitlement to enrollment in the camps is that the enrollees be taken from the relief rolls, and you will find in your districts now that the camps are having a great deal of trouble keeping up their enrollments. So we feel that under this appropriation the camp work will be carried on as far as it is possible to carry it out for enrollees, so long as we keep strict entitlement to enrollment, which I think every Member approves.

So much for $62,000,000 of that $75,000,000 reduction. The Budget estimates provided for $50,000,000 for the regular public-works program under the Procurement Division. That is to say, these types of public buildings provided for which are built upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General. You will find in the hearings two lists of projects. One list totals about $59,000,000 and the other about $58,000,000. Under this bill the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General, acting jointly, have a right to select from these combined lists public-building projects in the United States, to the amount carried in the bill. I say the Budget estimate called for $50,000,000. We believe it would take at least $60,000,000 to carry forward that program—that is, the regular building program—and provide as near as possible one building project for each congressional district, bearing in mind always, of course, that the congressional district would have a qualified building project that was logical and needed and appropriate. So we put $10,000,000 on to that $50,000,000, raising that to $60,000,000 for that building program, and we took that $10,000,000 from the $1,500,000,000 relief fund.

That brings us to the $1,425,000,000 for relief. Statistics vary as to how many people are unemployed. Under this program it is estimated that during the next fiscal year the Works Progress Administration will be able to keep an average of approximately 2,000,000 at work. Let me direct your attention to this: We should do well to bear this fundamental fact in mind as we consider this bill, or as we consider any possible question of ear-marking funds: I believe we all agree that the Federal Government should withdraw from the field of relief as quickly as possible, and that it should be left to communities and localities just as speedily as they are able financially to take care of the load. There is no difference of opinion about that. The President of the United States is just as heartily in favor of that as any Member of the House or any citizen of the Nation. Therefore, the relief funds asked in this bill are to take care of one particular group, the destitute unemployed. When I tell you that the entitlement to get jobs under W. P. A. is that the person shall be upon relief rolls, you will answer that we penalize a group of citizens who have not applied for relief but who need jobs just as much as somebody else. That is true. That may be said in testimony to the patriotism and courage of that person who has not applied for relief, but bear in mind that it is the duty of a citizen not to apply for relief unless he has to do it.

While it is true that there may be people upon the relief rolls less deserving than some one who has not applied for relief, the fact remains that the man who is not on relief has been able to swim so far. The only yardstick, the only measurement you could possibly have as to the people who need it most—and that is what we are trying to find, the group who must have it—and unless they do have relief of some sort they are going actually to suffer, is the relief rolls that have been established by the communities, the cities, and the counties.

Let me say to you that when some constituent tells you he does not approve of the Federal program for relief because he knows Bill Jones down in some part of your district is on relief and he has no business to be there, you may answer by saying, "If that is true, it is not my fault. It is the fault of that community, because they put him there." The Federal Government so far has not undertaken in any sense to prescribe the entitlements for this relief. The people who are on relief are put there by the authorities, the associations, and organizations of the particular communities wherein they reside. Why? Because logically they are the ones, the friends, neighbors, and fellow citizens, are the ones who are best able to determine who is deserving of relief. So there is no way you can work out a program or a formula to find these people who just must have assistance, unless you leave it to the local authorities. Even then you will find people sometimes on the outside more deserving than those who are on relief.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Right on the subject which the gentleman is discussing is a matter of vital importance in connection with the Civilian Conservation Corps organization. It has been known for some months that some of the camps were about to be retired for the reason that they were not able to fill their quotas. I believe, and I think each community would appreciate it, if it was made possible for them to employ in the camps what are known as "locals." That is, men who are idle without employment and not on the relief rolls, just the class the gentleman has been discussing, but who are not within the age limit. In that way you keep them from ultimately going on the relief rolls.

Mr. WOODRUM. Answering my friend, I want to say that the Federal Government wants to close the camps just as soon as it can be done; as soon as the need for them ceases to exist they should be closed. We could, of course, devise some formula to keep them open. We could relax the rules, but I want to say to my distinguished friend from Kentucky that once you relax the rules that a person has to be on relief to get in a camp, then your trouble begins, for any citizen in the gentleman's district who has an incorrigible boy he would like to get placed in some job for the summer will come to the gentleman and ask him to get him in. The gentleman will reply that it cannot be done, but his constituent will point to the fact that John Smith's boy got in, and he was not in need of it. Then the gentleman will come back at him with the statement that "it will only take a certain number of boys to bring up their enrollment to capacity, and we cannot get your boy in."

I may say to my friend that this situation has been given very careful thought. Neither the E. C. W. nor the President thinks this rule ought to be relaxed.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman made the statement that local authorities were responsible for the type of people on relief. Does the gentleman mean by "local authorities" these social workers sent in by this relief administrator? Are they the "local people" who determine who shall go on the relief rolls?

Mr. WOODRUM. Nobody dictates to anybody who shall be put on relief, I may say to my friend from Idaho. He knows the situation—that in each community there is a committee of the welfare society oftentimes or the mayor's committee, whoever it is, a local committee passes on qualifications for admission to these relief rolls. Oftentimes they do take on social workers, who go in and assist them; but, after all, it is the local people of the community who determine it; the Federal Government does not do it. We have never done that. If there is a single person on a single relief roll who should not be there he is there because his friends and neighbors have countenanced the fact that he is there; it is not the fault of the Federal Government.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. What would be the status of a person who has been dropped from relief because of shortage of funds? What would be his status under the present law and under this bill?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is the very question, I may say to the gentleman from Oregon, that I asked Mr. Hopkins, during the hearings, and he will find in the hearings that very question brought up.

The gentleman will recall that the relief rolls were frozen about November of 1935. Undoubtedly cases of the character the gentleman suggests have arisen since then, cases where very deserving people are in urgent need. Mr. Hopkins stated to our committee that if these additional funds are appropriated it is the intention of his administration to make a careful study of that, and, in some measure, relax that rule so as to add to the rolls cases which have arisen since that arbitrary date on which the present relief rolls were frozen. I believe the situation will be reached, and that these very deserving cases will be cared for.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. RICH. I notice in this bill there are additions for salary for the Department of Agriculture, $200,000; the Bureau of the Census, $200,000; for salaries and expenses, buildings and grounds, District of Columbia, $2,041,090; and increases for various other departments. Despite the remarks made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] that Budget estimates were one thing, but what Congress appropriates is another, I wonder if the gentleman's committee has gone to the bottom of things to know whether these requests from the departments are absolutely necessary.

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say to the gentleman, answering generally, because his question is general, that the committee has gone into each departmental item carefully, as he will find from the hearings. In one department here the administrative expenses are reduced $8,000,000, or 20 percent, for the next fiscal year. This should gladden the heart of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. I have the most profound respect for my friend the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], for the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], gentlemen from both sides of the aisle, who wield much power in the Committee on Appropriations, because I know they stand for economy; but, even so, these departments make such extravagant demands that I sometimes wonder whether we ought to give them anything more this year, whether we ought not make them get down to real bare-bone economy in the operation of their departments.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLS. I wonder whether when the Relief Administrator was before the committee, the committee ascertained what would happen to these people who are now on relief, and by reason of the forced reduction in relief rolls occasioned by the scarcity of funds, whether or not those people who were taken off of relief by reason of that fact would be prejudiced when they attempted to return to the relief rolls when more funds are made available.

Mr. WOODRUM. I understand what the gentleman has reference to, but I may say to the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma that the relief rolls are being restricted and contracted in every county and in every State and in every municipality. With the approval of the Federal Government, the relief rolls are being carefully scrutinized and are being purged as fast as possible of those not needing relief, not only for the purpose of getting people off the relief rolls but in order to offer an additional inducement and incentive to private industry to take up the unemployed load. In other words, we are getting out of it just as fast as we can.

The specific question was whether a person taken off the relief roll may be prejudiced in coming back. I gave the answer to that question a few moments ago to another gentleman that the Relief Administration is trying to revise and revamp its rules with reference to the relief rolls in order to take in this group of people in the most equitable manner possible.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PARSONS. On page 9 there appears an item of $400,000 for the Federal Communications Commission. May I ask the gentleman if any part of that $400,000 will be used to pay more than $3,600 a year to an attorney for the Commission, the $3,600 a year being the maximum amount paid attorneys for investigation committees at this time?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman is asking whether any part of the $400,000 appropriated for the A. T. & T. investigation will be used to pay attorneys more than $3,600 a year?

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; I imagine it will be used for such purpose. They have a list of attorneys who are receiving more than $3,600 a year; and, of course, this $400,000 will be used to take care of the pay roll. I am not debating whether that investigation should go on or should have been started in the first place, because we have started it, and it is going on. The Communications Commission have their attorneys sitting across the table from the best lawyers in the United States, the highest priced counsel of the country, and the gentleman from Illinois knows we cannot get lawyers to represent the Government at $3,600 a year who would have the ability, experience, training, and background to cope with these high-priced gentlemen.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman will remember that the House decidedly defeated a bill that was brought in here sometime ago which would have appropriated $10,000 to pay an attorney for about 6 months' work.

Mr. WOODRUM. That had to do with an attorney for a special investigating committee of the Senate, and I do not think the situation is comparable to this at all.

Mr. PARSONS. This is to be used for the same purpose as provided in that bill which was defeated?

Mr. WOODRUM. No. This is an investigation of great magnitude by an executive organization, as the gentleman knows, and I may say it is showing some signs of accomplishing a great deal.

Mr. PARSONS. In order to get this thing straight, the $400,000 then is not to be used for the purpose of furnishing money or funds to cover the proposition involved in the bill that was brought in here a few weeks ago?

Mr. WOODRUM. Not at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The gentleman has made some remarks concerning relief rolls. I have received complaints, and I think every Congressman has, from parties who claim they have been removed from the relief rolls or have not been placed upon the relief rolls and requesting my assistance. As I understand it, the matter of determining who goes on or who goes off the relief rolls is not determined by a Federal agency. That is done by either a State agency or a local agency and the Federal Government has nothing to do with that matter. In other words, we simply contribute to the various States our pro-rata part of the funds as we do in connection with funds used for highway purposes, and then the State authorities determine the matter from then on.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. Referring to the question of the gentleman from Illinois, I merely wanted to say that the limitation of expenditure of $3,600 per annum to employees of investigating committees applies only to the contingent fund of the two Houses and not to the agencies of the Government generally.

Mr. STUBBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. STUBBS. May I make an observation with reference to the C. C. C. camps and the young men in my district? Seven young men came to my office and I took them down to see if I could get them placed. Because their parents were not on the relief rolls they were not permitted to get these jobs, even though some of them were the sons of widows. My objection is the rules and regulations that are placed upon these young men make it impossible for them to secure the jobs when the jobs are there, and my objection further goes to the administrative department that makes such rules and regulations. I think this Congress should take some notice of that very thing.

Mr. WOODRUM. May I say in answer to the gentleman that I believe he has not entirely taken into consideration the fundamental purpose of the Civilian Conservation Corps? It is not to provide jobs for people; it is not to provide jobs for estimable young men, but has one particular purpose, and that is where a family is on relief and it has a young man within the age limit, instead of giving the family cash, it permits the boy to go to work and have a useful employment and $25 a month of the funds to go to his family. Every Congressman here has had the experience that my friend has just related. There are fine young men in the community who have gotten out of school, or who have not anything to do. Time is hanging heavily on their hands, and in many cases, perhaps, the family needs the added revenue of a few dollars a month, but the family is not on relief. Somebody in the family is working, and they have been able to keep away from relief. Under those circumstances the boy cannot get into a Civilian Conservation camp. Now, that is the rigid, strict rule that the President inaugurated when he set up these camps. It is that fact that has kept the C. C. C. clean and above any scandal which we might have had if we had opened the door wide so that boys could have been jammed into the camps by some Congressmen picking them out and putting them in there.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Did the gentleman's committee give any consideration to the need for a direct relief appropriation to care for those who are on relief but who could not get work because the work funds are not sufficient and who are in just as great need of relief as those who did get work?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman refers to the billion and a half. The billion and a half is to give work to the destitute unemployed as far as we can take care of them.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. But it will not.

Mr. WOODRUM. No; it will not; but I want to say to the gentleman that some reference has been made to earmarking this fund. If there is any criticism of the one and a half billion, it is that it is not enough. We hope it is enough, and we are going to try to make it do, because we are trying to get out of the business. We are trying to close up shop as soon as we can and not cause reputable and honest American citizens to suffer too much. We are trying to pull away from it as fast as this can be done. The billion and a half will not give jobs to all the destitute who are now on relief, but it will go as far as it can—and bear in mind that every dollar you take away from this fund and put into something else, you are keeping some man from getting a job who does need it and needs it worse than the other fellow.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. For instance, in my district, there are at least three or four thousand on relief rolls who are qualified in every way and cannot get work because the funds are not sufficient. If we cut off direct relief, they are outside the pale of all forms of public relief.

Mr. WOODRUM. If this billion and a half does not reach them, then I will say to my friend from Colorado that the State government and the municipalities will have to assume the burden.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. What developed in the hearings as to the plan of the Works Progress Administration with respect to projects that cannot be completed by June 30 next? Do they plan to carry on and finish these projects?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman means June 30 of this year?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. The W. P. A. has just about enough money to run until the end of this fiscal year, and, of course, we are hopeful this appropriation will pass and permit them to go ahead. They figure they will spend this money in the next fiscal year.

Mr. RAMSPECK. But the question I have in mind is whether or not they will continue with projects that are uncompleted or whether such projects will have to be resubmitted and acted upon again.

Mr. WOODRUM. My understanding is they will continue with uncompleted projects as long as the relief load in such community requires them to keep it up. Of course, these projects are conducted on a cooperative basis with the local communities.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Virginia 10 minutes more.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Virginia yield for a brief question in that connection?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. This appropriation will also enable the directors in the various districts to embark upon new projects that have already been approved?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; certainly.

Mr. PARSONS. Where the relief load in the community is sufficient to furnish the labor.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is correct.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think we could discuss with profit and clearer understanding for quite a little longer period this one particular matter, but I want to make this statement to my colleagues. I commend to your consideration the hearings before our committee on the Works Progress Administration or the relief item. I ask you to look at the record, and in this connection I want to make a confession. I want to say to you that, like a good many citizens and like a great many Members of the House, I went into this hearing as a member of the committee very skeptical of the program as it was being conducted by the Works Progress Administration; but I believe I voice the sentiments of the members of the committee, or certainly most of them, when I say that that Administration came before our committee with a clear, frank, and open disclosure of its activities, gave all the information requested without evasion or any effort to conceal anything and frankly admitted shortcomings and failures and frailties that may have beset their activities, and, as one member of the committee, when the hearings were concluded I came to the conclusion that the Works Progress Administration was doing the very best job it could in a very bad situation for anyone to handle under any circumstances. I ask you to read the hearings. There is the record.

Mr. Chairman, I wish I had an hour to discuss with you the boondoggling propositions in the W. P. A. There are about 100 or 150 projects in the W. P. A. that have been singled out by the critics of the program in newspapers and by speeches and held up to ridicule. Of course, many of them seem utterly ridiculous and indefensible. Some of them, no doubt, are indefensible. There are between 100 and 150 of such projects. They affect probably 2,000 people out of nearly 3,000,000 people employed. If all of them were bad, if all of them were indefensible, and if each one of them had been thrown overboard and not undertaken, they would constitute one-seventeenth of 1 percent of the program, or one-seventeenth of 1 percent of the 170,000 projects carried on by the Works Progress Administration.

When you look at the matter in this light, it is so small and so infinitesimal that it is not worthy of consideration. When you look at the larger proposition and consider the fact that this program has actually put to work between two and three million people, who needed employment, you will see that it has met the load that had to be carried, and I say to you that I feel it has done a good job on the whole.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. CARPENTER. I realize there have been a good many criticisms and various aspersions cast upon the Relief Administration and upon Mr. Hopkins, and I regret that there have been a great many on this side of the House, and by certain members of the Democratic Party, but I wish to say that I believe Mr. Hopkins has had the hardest job of any one in the United States, not excluding even the President of the United States, and that all in all he has done a mighty good job. Most of these boondoggling projects have been advocated and promoted by the local communities and they are the ones that should bear the blame if any blame or criticism is due on account of them.

Mr. WOODRUM. I am glad the gentleman made that statement. Nearly all of these projects were sponsored by and paid in part by local residents.

Mr. CURLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. CURLEY. I want to call attention to the fact that the word "boondoggling" was coined originally in an investigation by the Board of Aldermen of the City of New York in 1935. It was in connection with rhythmic dancing under the administration of the city of New York.

Mr. WOODRUM. I thank the gentleman for the contribution.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman says only one-seventeenth of 1 percent is a very small matter. I am reading from the hearings:

> Mr. THURSTON. The Reedsville project was definitely turned down by Congress, but funds were allocated to that project in the face of that action by Congress.
> Mr. WOODRUM. That was a relatively small proposition.

Was there no policy involved there?

Mr. WOODRUM. I have said that mistakes have been made, but the gentleman from Massachusetts does not understand the situation. The gentleman is one of the group that wants 100-percent perfection.

Mr. GIFFORD. We are "too damned dumb."

Mr. WOODRUM. I would not put it that way.

Mr. GIFFORD. The man that the gentleman is defending did.

Mr. WOODRUM. I am not defending anybody. If the gentleman will read the hearings——

Mr. GIFFORD. I have just received the hearings.

Mr. WOODRUM. Well, read them tonight. Harry Hopkins was put on the stand and grilled by both minority and majority members, and asked for statement after statement.

Mr. GIFFORD. And made a statement one day and changed it the next.

Mr. WOODRUM. Nothing of the kind. There is no justification for a statement of that kind.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am glad the gentleman denies it if it is not true.

Mr. WOODRUM. It is not true. I have had an opportunity of hearing the witness and the gentleman has not. There was not a question by which Harry Hopkins was embarrassed at any time or where he refused to give a fair, honest, and definite answer. I do not say that you have to approve everything he does. The gentleman from Massachusetts belongs to that class that requires 100-percent perfection. According to his philosophy, if one-seventeenth of 1 percent is wrong, then the whole thing should be condemned.

The theory of those who criticize seems to be, if you make a mistake on a few boondoggling projects, all the rest is wrong. We, of the administration, admit that we are human and that we as human beings are liable to err. We do claim that we are trying to administer honestly and courageously and effectively.

But let us pass on. Another large item in this bill is for the Social Security Act, which appears for a full fiscal year for the first time. The Budget estimates for the Social Security Board amounted to $195,800,000 for the next fiscal year. That sounds like a large amount of money. It is a lot of money. Of that total $157,000,000 is for grants to States. Twenty-three million dollars of the $195,000,000 is for administrative expenses. The committee cut that to $18,400,000. Fifteen million eight hundred thousand dollars was the Budget estimate for securing the initial wage-record data of the beneficiaries of old-age benefits, which, of course, is the first step in that program, a step that almost staggers the imagination in its magnitude.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take this time. It is as hard on me as it is on the Members here, but I think this explanation should be made. This list, it is estimated, will comprise 26,000,000 people. It is a gigantic undertaking. Our committee, without any partisanship, looked into the matter as carefully as we could and we made a 20-percent reduction in the administrative expenses. That is a substantial cut. And I say with deference to the members of that board that they took it on the chin. They believe that we have not given them enough money, but they are going ahead with what we have given them. If they need more later, that can be considered.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Did the gentleman say that there would be twenty-six-million-and-odd beneficiaries of the Security Act?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is in connection with old-age benefits under title II.

Mr. MOTT. But there are not more than half that many in the United States who are over 60 years old.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is under title II of the act—the old-age benefits.

Mr. MOTT. There are only 10,000,000 people in the United States over 60 years of age, and our present Social Security Act takes care of only a fraction of those, and how could there be 26,000,000 people involved?

Mr. WOODRUM. I think the gentleman does not understand the provisions of title II. That is the Federal old-age benefit scheme. Taxes are imposed upon employers and employees with a view to building up a reserve fund for the payment of old-age benefits commencing in 1942. No one is eligible until he reaches age 65, but the taxes are based upon wages and commence July 1, 1937, and continue until the wage earner reaches 65. It will be a big preliminary job to take the census and get the initial information concerning everyone affected by the title. This title should not be confused with other provisions of the act that have to do with grants to States for old-age assistance under State law.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. MAY. I have been under the impression that the administration of the Social Security Act in all its phases was under the jurisdiction of the State, and I am wondering why it is necessary, if that is true, to have such a large Federal Board.

Mr. WOODRUM. Title II, old-age benefits, is entirely a Federal project.

Mr. MAY. But the other features of the bill are all under the States.

Mr. WOODRUM. But the Federal Government must supervise the administration of the State plans after they have been approved to the extent of seeing that they conform to the requirements of Federal law. The total appropriation for the social security in this bill is $458,631,860. We did not make any cut in the grants to the States for old-age assistance, unemployment compensation, dependent children, or aid for the blind. We feel that perhaps in some instances the amounts were pretty liberally allowed; but, after all, if the States cooperate and comply, the money must be provided; and if they do not, the money will not be spent. So there will be no point in making an arbitrary cut in that item. We do make a cut of 20 percent in the administrative costs, which, after all, is where we have to try to save the money.

There is one other large item in connection with social security which comes under the Treasury Department. That is an appropriation of $265,000,000, which is the estimated amount of the first annual premium for payments required under title II of the act, to be placed in the old-age reserve account and to be invested by the Secretary of the Treasury for the account. The amount appropriated is based upon calculations made in connection with enactment of the Social Security Act. It is estimated that a sum adequate to provide this appropriation will be realized from the taxes imposed under title VIII of the act. The estimated collection of such taxes for the period from January 1 to June 30, 1937, is $305,000,000. Making an allowance of $40,000,000 for administrative expenses, leaves the figure of $265,000,000 as equal to the amount appropriated for the old-age reserve account for the fiscal year 1937.

I think the House will be interested in the itemization of the various appropriations on account of the Social Security Act in this bill. I will insert a table giving a recapitulation of them:

Social Security Board, salaries and expenses	$18,400,000
Grants to States for old-age assistance	85,000,000
Grants to States for administration of State unemployment compensation plans	29,000,000
Grants to States for aid to dependent children	35,000,000
Grants to States for aid to the blind	8,000,000
Securing and maintaining wage records for old-age benefits (nonrecurring)	12,400,000
Total	187,800,000
Treasury Department:
First increment for old-age reserve account	265,000,000
Salaries in connection with maintenance and development of the old-age reserve account	31,860
Collection of taxes under titles VIII and IX by the Bureau of Internal Revenue	5,800,000
Total	270,831,860
Grand total, Social Security Act	458,631,860

I do not want to consume any more time. I have taken more than I intended already.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. And that has reference to the question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON]. The Federal Government, the gentleman says, does not assume responsibility in the picking of employables. Will the gentleman tell us about the ruling that went from Washington on having to be on the relief roll in November in order to get a job. Was not that an edict from Washington?

Mr. WOODRUM. Oh, yes; to that extent it had the effect of freezing the relief rolls as of that date, but it has never undertaken to say who would be entitled to be on relief rolls. If more people were certified from relief rolls than could be employed on a project, the W. P. A. would exercise a judgment as to which of those certified would be employed. But that is all.

Mr. GIFFORD. But they undertook to say that unless they were on relief rolls in November they could not get a job.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is true.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Is this total for the Post Office Department, forty-million-six-hundred-thousand-and-odd dollars a customary amount for a deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. WOODRUM. Twenty-three million dollars of that is on account of the 40-hour law that was passed; the necessity for additional employees because of the 40-hour law. That law became effective October 1, 1935. This is the first appropriation made for that purpose. The rest of it is salaries for postmasters, costs of transportation, and additional employees on account of increased business. There has been a great acceleration in post-office business and that is a good omen of the progress of recovery.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. How did the committee arrive at the figure of $85,000,000 for grants for old-age pensions?

Mr. WOODRUM. It is figured out on the basis of the number of States that have qualified. Twenty-nine States have plans already approved for participation. Based on plans submitted but not yet approved and based upon sessions of legislatures that are expected to pass cooperative laws this winter, this $85,000,000 is the best calculation that can be made this far in advance. It is a pure estimate.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I figured out that only about 416,000 persons would get $15 a month.

Mr. WOODRUM. Sixty million dollars might have been enough, or it might take $100,000,000. We thought that $85,000,000 would be about the right amount. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, at this time I am only going to discuss the Works Progress appropriation item in this bill. Whatever I have to say on other items in the bill I will say as the items are reached when the bill is read. I propose to have something to say with reference to the Tennessee Valley operation, because I believe that needs considerable attention. I propose to say something about several other smaller items in the bill.

With reference to the action of the committee and the report on the bill on the question of social security items, I would say that with reference to the allotments to States and the appropriations which are required to be made for the set-up for reserves, which were described by the gentleman from Virginia, I do not see how there is any possible way of disturbing those items. Undoubtedly there will be demands for most of the funds, if not all of them, that are set up in the social security appropriations with reference to allotments. Of course, the item for reserve is an item which no one can tell about, but it is based upon estimates of the Treasury Department, largely, with reference to the amount of taxes that will be received.

With reference to the administrative expenses there is one thing to say. I think the committee has been a little liberal; but it is a new agency, and with the 20 percent below the Budget estimates on operating expenses, probably that is as well as we can do for the time being. I am in hopes that when they take their census they will take it on a basis which costs much less than the $12,400,000 which has been allotted to them.

With reference to the Works Progress Administration appropriation, those of you who have a copy of the bill in front of you will find this item on page 21. It authorizes, roughly, the use of the whole of the $1,425,000,000 for relief, or it authorizes the expenditure of not to exceed 15 percent above a definite figure which is named in the bill for different projects.

For instance, for highways, roads, and so forth, $413,250,000.

For public buildings, $156,750,000.

For parks, $156,750,000.

For public utilities, including sewers, water supply, airports, and transportation facilities, $171,000,000.

Flood control and other conservation, $128,250,000.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. What is contemplated being used in the regulation to describe "other conservation" besides the flood control? The bill reads "and other conservation."

Mr. TABER. I do not know. No one has told us.

Mr. PARSONS. What do the hearings disclose in that connection, if anything?

Mr. TABER. The hearings disclose that $45,000,000 was to be used for water conservation. Page 142 of the hearings deals with that particular subject, and the item is particularly expected to be expended in the Mountain States, such as Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Nevada, California, Oregon, the Dakotas, Montana, Texas, and Oklahoma. We have a big program of this character in Oklahoma. Those are local projects in contradistinction to the big national project, the whole idea being to raise the water level in all of those drought States.

Mr. PARSONS. There is nothing in the hearings to indicate that any part of that would be used for reforestation as a means in aid of flood control?

Mr. TABER. Nothing that I can remember.

Mr. PARSONS. Would this language, "other conservation", prevent this fund being used under the terms of this bill for the acquisition of forestry lands and reforestation as an aid in assistance of flood control?

Mr. TABER. I do not think it would. I think it would be possible to do that.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. May I say it would probably embrace soil erosion; the different methods of dealing with soil erosion.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman think it would embrace the methods of handling soil erosion? Frankly, I do not. I had never heard of that. I asked them to tell us what it would do, and that is what I got. I did not know that that was involved in this particular item.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. MAVERICK. Where the gentleman was reading it gives $85,500,000 for rehabilitation and relief to farmers.

Mr. TABER. I have not gotten that far yet. The last item I read was "flood control and other conservation, $128,125,000."

White-collar projects, $85,500,000.

Women's projects, $85,500,000.

Miscellaneous, $71,250,000.

National Youth Administration, $71,250,000.

Rural rehabilitation and relief to farmers, $85,500,000.

Mr. MAVERICK. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. MAVERICK. Will the gentleman tell us in some detail what this money is to be used for, if it is to be turned over to Mr. Tugwell?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MAVERICK. Is that going to be just turned over to Mr. Tugwell or is it going to be for real assistance to farmers?

Mr. TABER. I think this is going to be turned over to Mr. Tugwell. Frankly, I do not know any other way it can be done, or else Mr. Hopkins is going to take over the Tugwellian activities with reference to that subject. We were not told in the hearings, frankly.

Mr. MAVERICK. How much has Mr. Tugwell had annually; does the gentleman know?

Mr. TABER. I do not think he has had anything annually. Mr. Tugwell has had for the resettlement outfit out of the big appropriation of 1933, $23,000,000; out of the appropriation of 1934, $3,000,000; out of the appropriation of 1935, $227,900,000. This, in effect, cuts him down to $85,500,000. I do not know, frankly. There are several items that can be used for the Tugwellian activities. The resettlement activities can be carried on under two or three different items.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. MAY. The chairman of the committee just advised me this morning, in answer to a question, that there were no funds here that could be used by Mr. Tugwell for resettlement.

Mr. TABER. But there are. This item for public buildings could be used on what they call the resettlement activity, $150,750,000. This item for miscellaneous projects, $71,000,000, could be used for that. It would have to be under the direction and supervision of the Works Progress Administration, but Tugwell could be designated to take charge of it. There is nothing in the world to stop it.

Mr. MAY. And the Administrator of the Works Progress Administration would have power under this bill to allocate it to Tugwell or any other bureau he wanted to?

Mr. TABER. He could put Tugwell in charge of it, certainly; there is no question about it. Frankly, I expect to offer an amendment when we get to that stage to prevent any funds being used for the effectuation of these foolish projects.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Just a question about white-collar projects, $85,500,000. Would this cover such activities as the one known as Federal project no. 1? I have received many letters asking about that activity.

Mr. TABER. I do not know what Federal project no. 1 is, but it would cover eurythmic dancing, and it would cover this Baedeker book that the wife of the publicity agent of the Soviet Embassy has charge of, which has cost very nearly $3,000,000 and on which about 5,000 people are working.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Can the gentleman say whether it covers music, painting, and the arts?

Mr. TABER. It does.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. It is for that classification of activities?

Mr. TABER. Yes; but it might be used for other projects, too; it might be used for bookkeeping, accounting, auditing, checking up on income-tax returns, almost anything.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is that an increase or decrease for this activity?

Mr. TABER. Oh, it is hard to tell. I would say there was not much difference.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. CHURCH. Even though specific items are mentioned in the bill I do not think there is anything under this heading "Works Progress Administration" that prevents this whole fund being turned over to Mr. Tugwell.

Mr. TABER. Nothing would prevent its being turned over to him any more than designating the amounts to be used by any particular type of project; but Mr. Tugwell could be put in charge of the whole performance, so far as that goes.

Mr. CHURCH. Not even a dollar could be spent for these special items?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes, and I shall be obliged not to yield during this time because there are a few things I want to say myself.

Mr. Chairman, beginning in 1933 when the Roosevelt administration came in, there commenced a direct control over relief expenditures, a direct Federal control over every operation of every Federal contractor. There has been appropriated for relief, exclusive of credit agencies in that time, $11,732,000,000.

Of this amount, in all probability about $1,200,000,000 to $1,300,000,000 will be left unexpended on the 1st of July. This estimate, of course, is more or less guesswork, and it might run up or down a couple of hundred million dollars.

Mr. Chairman, the gross national debt as shown by the daily Treasury statement at the present time is $31,425,000,000. The Federal guarantees amount to $5,000,000,000. The bonus liability is $2,500,000,000. This makes a total national debt of $38,928,000,000.

The deficiency for the current year to date is $2,637,000,000. The estimated deficiency for 1936 is $6,000,000,000. At the present time there are approximately 22,000,000 persons dependent upon relief and relief employment, with a national deficit rolling up and a national expenditure for relief of three and a half to four billion dollars. The number of Federal employees on the Federal roll has gradually increased until at the present time there are 800,000 under the civil service, which does not include the numerous other agencies.

Mr. Chairman, the whole situation is a delicate one. That amount of national debt disturbs me, and it disturbs every thinking American. This should not be a partisan question. It should be a matter of American patriotism. [Applause.] Unless we get to the point where we can reduce the expenses of the Government to the point where we can meet our bills by the taxes collected we will soon get to the end of our rope, and that day will come at some time when most of us least expect it.

Frankly, I do not believe we can afford either the W. P. A. performance or any P. W. A. performance to provide employment. I do not believe that carrying folks on relief is half as demoralizing as putting them to work on these W. P. A. projects where they are supported by their shovels all day, just as that crowd is over there in front of the Supreme Court Building at this moment. The Members may go over there and look. They do not have to take my word for it. I do not believe we can pay out from $1,000 to $1,200 a year, and that is what the hearings show it costs for these W. P. A. employees, when, as a matter of fact, we can take care of a relief case for an average of $33 per month or approximately $400 per year.

This Federal contribution to relief under Federal direction has been completely demoralizing. In some States no contribution is made at all. In one State it amounts to less than 1 percent, and in 13 States to less than 10 percent. Efficient relief cannot be had in any State unless that State contributes enough toward the relief so that it will be interested in seeing that the relief money is honestly and efficiently spent. I hope it may be possible for the Congress to appreciate these problems and to realize that regardless of our desire for buildings, regardless of our desire to have fine structures and fine roads built in our respective districts, we cannot afford to go on with this P. W. A. relief or work employment for the poor people at the rate we are doing.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. If every Member of this House will just cross the Capitol grounds here and go to the Congressional Library and look at that W. P. A. job over there, which has been going on for 2 weeks, and observe that army of lazy, indifferent colored men standing on the handles of their shovels all day long doing nothing, they would get disgusted with the whole W. P. A. work.

Mr. TABER. It is completely demoralizing.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; it is completely demoralizing. They are doing nothing. They are lazy and indifferent and will not work when they have work to do.

Mr. TABER. It destroys any pride they may have.

Mr. BLANTON. I have been watching them for 2 weeks in going back and forth to the House Office Building.

Mr. TABER. That is the existing situation. When the proper point is reached in this bill, I am going to offer an amendment which will turn this money over to the States with the provision that they contribute a reasonably decent amount, the work to be administered locally by people who know the local situation, who will be required to do it honestly, and will be interested through a legitimate, reasonable, local contribution. Let us see if we cannot cut down this terrific expense of relief.

I do not see any other way out of the matter. This demoralizing work is worse than no work at all. This terrific expense puts heavy taxes on the people and demoralizes and prevents an increase in employment. In spite of the terrific taxes which have been imposed in recent years, industry has added a million men to its rolls in the last 2 years, and this in spite of every discouragement to business and industry. Why can we not give industry and the workingmen a chance?

Mr. Chairman, let us give the workingman a chance to look forward to a coming day when again the skilled workmen may receive $40 to $50 a week for his work instead of being on a dole or a dole job at $10 or $12 a week.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, when the House of Representatives passed the Social Security Act, every Member of the House believed that act meant that where a State provided payment of $15 a month pension to its aged citizens, 65 years of age or over, the Federal Government would match the sum and pay, through the State, an equal amount of $15, so that each pensioner would receive $30 per month. That was understood by every Member of the House. If I am incorrect, I yield to any Member to say he or she did not so understand it.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. As I understand the gentleman's statement, it is with the limitation that the States would comply with the provisions of the Social Security Act.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. Now, after some of the States have changed their constitutions and are providing to pay their $15 per month, a new ruling has been made. For instance, Texas on August 24, 1935, had a State-wide election and changed its constitution by an overwhelming vote to pay a pension of $15 to its citizens 65 years of age or over, to match a like sum of $15 to be paid through it by the Government. Now, in Washington they have construed that to mean every State must pay $30 and then be reimbursed $15 by the Government. Inasmuch as the State of Texas is authorized to pay only $15 per month, under such ruling, it would be reimbursed only $7.50 by the Government, and instead of the aged people getting $30 per month, as was intended by Congress, they will receive only $15 per month, unless this Congress rectifies the matter by passing a proper amendment.

Now, is there a Member of the Congress here on the floor who understood there was to be any such interpretation as this? No; we all believed it would be a question of 50–50, $15 from the State and $15 from the Government, with such $30 paid by the State, and we ought not to allow this interpretation to stand.

Mr. PIERCE. What is the difference?

Mr. BLANTON. There is just this difference, I will say to my friend. The State of Texas, thinking that this was the proper interpretation, passed a constitutional amendment authorizing a payment of only $15 per month. It does not authorize a payment of $30. The State cannot pay a pension of $30 and then get $15 back from the Government, because the Constitution does not authorize it, but that is what the Government is demanding of the State, and after passing a constitutional amendment whereby the State has authorization to pay $15 a month, the Government now says that the aged people of Texas will get only $15 a month, $7.50 from the State and $7.50 from the Government, paid through the State, because the Government will pay the State of Texas $7.50 of the $15 it pays to its people.

This is a fraud, not only upon the people, but a fraud upon the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment, I will yield.

I understand the Ways and Means Committee is arranging now to bring in an amendment to cover this question and provide for a proper interpretation, that where a State has arranged lawfully to pay a pension of $15, the Government will come in and furnish its $15 in accordance with the understanding of the membership of the Congress. This matter ought not to be delayed. The provision ought to be brought in by the Ways and Means Committee right away and passed and signed and become a law before we adjourn.

I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. In view of the gentleman's rather broad question to all the Members and the fact I asked him to yield before, I may say I did not fully understand the gentleman's position when I asked him to yield before. The question which the gentleman is now discussing has been considered by some of my colleagues and myself, and I understood the matter at the time, I will say to the gentleman, as the Federal authorities are now interpreting the law—that is, that the Federal Government would contribute one-half of what the States gave, or reimburse the States one-half of what they paid out in old-age pensions, up to $30 a month, but not that they would match the amount that the States gave. This was my understanding of the law.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I am sorry, but I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman addressed a broad question to the Members of the House and should yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I regret that the few minutes I have remaining will not permit my yielding. There is one other matter that I wish to discuss.

ALIENS HERE UNLAWFULLY MUST NOT TAKE WORK FROM NEEDY AMERICANS

There has been a careful check-up by various organizations in the United States in behalf of American citizens, and it has been ascertained that there are in the United States right now at least three and a half million aliens who are here unlawfully and ought not to be here. Of this number there are at least 400,000 unlawful aliens who have been getting relief and who are now taking work under W. P. A. and under P. W. A. jobs all over the United States that American citizens are entitled to and should fill.

There is not another government in the world that would permit this except the United States. Great Britain will not allow an alien to hold a job as long as one of its nationals is without a job. The Government of France will not allow an alien to hold a job in France as long as one of its nationals is without a job. The Government of Germany and the Government of Italy will not allow an alien to hold a job as long as one of their nationals is without a job. Our country is the only one that will permit aliens to be cared for in this way when there is an American citizen wanting the job that the alien holds.

There is going to be an amendment offered from the floor to stop this, and the amendment will provide that no alien who has come here unlawfully since 1924 shall get paid out of the $1,425,000,000 provided in this bill.

I hope to see this amendment passed unanimously. Our friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] is going to offer the amendment. I am going to vote for it. It is a good amendment. It is an American amendment and one that ought to pass. The idea of taking care of aliens who have come here from other countries unlawfully when American citizens who were born here and whose families have lived here for generations are without work and with wives and little children starving! It is infamous to think of it. We ought to pass such an amendment without any hesitation whatever, and I hope there will not be a vote against it in this House. Such an amendment should become the law.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SPENCE. Reverting to the Social Security Act, my State has made provision for an appropriation or expenditure of $7.50 to be matched by the United States Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Then your State will get only $3.75 from the Government, and you will be able to pay only $7.50 monthly pension to your citizens unless we pass an amendment. If that is the provision of law in your State, the old-age pensioners in your district will receive only $7.50 per month and your State will get back from the Government only $3.75 on each of them.

Mr. SPENCE. Is that the ruling they have made?

Mr. BLANTON. That is the ruling, but it is not what was understood by the membership of this House.

Mr. SPENCE. No; it is not.

Mr. BLANTON. And it ought to be straightened out right away. The people of this country are entitled to have the will of their Congress put into effect and not misconstrued or misinterpreted in this way.

Mr. SPENCE. It was not understood in that way by the people of Kentucky.

Mr. BLANTON. No; it was not.

Mr. SPENCE. Because since that time they have amended their constitution so that they could make the necessary appropriations.

Mr. BLANTON. Everyone here so understood it, and the entire debate indicated there would be a matching by the Government of the $15 provided by the State, though paid through the State. It was said here a hundred times on this floor that the State would give $15 and the Government would give $15, all paid through the State, which would make up the $30 monthly pension to our aged people.

The Ways and Means Committee should bring in a provision which should be passed by unanimous consent to straighten this out.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes for the purpose of clarifying the RECORD and to relieve the apparent apprehensions of my colleague from Texas.

If there is any misapprehension of the Social Security Act, it is not due to ambiguity or lack of clarity in the act. There is nothing in the language of the act which with the wildest stretch of the imagination would allow the people of Virginia to believe that if they paid $15 the Federal Government would pay $15, that whatever Virginia paid they would match it with an equal amount.

It is unfortunate if some States have adopted a constitution under a misapprehension or changed their constitution under a misapprehension, for I do not believe that there are many Members on the floor who had a contrary understanding if they paid any attention to the debates at the time.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. This is a matter which has been discussed between some of my colleagues and myself. Did the gentleman speak advisedly when he said the Federal Government would match the allowance of the States?

Mr. WOODRUM. Reimburse the States.

Mr. MAPES. My understanding was that if the State agreed to pay $10 a month or $5 a month, or any amount up to $30, the Federal Government would contribute one-half of the sum, or reimburse the State to that extent.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is correct.

Mr. MAPES. But not that the Federal Government would match or duplicate the amount of the State contribution——

Mr. WOODRUM. The Federal Government would reimburse the State 50–50 up to $30 a month.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. I agree with the gentleman entirely. That is my understanding of the law. Does not the gentleman believe, in view of the fact that Texas and perhaps some other States have changed their constitutions under an apparent misunderstanding, it would be easier for the Congress to change the law so that it would conform to the constitutional provisions of the States? I think we should do that at this session.

Mr. WOODRUM. I quite agree with that, and I hope that the Committee on Ways and Means can find a way to have it carried out in the way that Congress desired, but I don't think it is fair to say that any arbitrary decision of the Security Board or somebody else has altered the will of Congress.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. KENNEY. Under the ruling is a State required to pay every month, or could it pay every 6 months?

Mr. WOODRUM. The Federal Government advances to the States on a quarterly basis on the basis that they furnish data as to what they are paying on old-age assistance on a monthly basis.

Mr. KENNEY. The State must pay out every month?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is my understanding.

Mr. KENNEY. They could not pay out 1 month for 2 months?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think so. It is on a monthly basis.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I want it understood that my remarks this morning will be made in the performance of my duties as a member of the Committee on Expenditures. As the ranking man on that committee, I feel that it is my responsibility to help the minority members of the Committee on Appropriations. They, however, have had somewhat the advantage of me. I cannot get my committee to function.

This report came out only this morning. The latter part of it consists of tables. I have been able to skim over fairly well the rest of the report in order to get the gist of it. This will be a difficult vote for me next Monday, after the criticisms which I now expect to make and the feeling I have about it, but it is the only relief bill that we will have brought here. I recognize the problem of relief, and I want to vote adequate money therefor, and in consequence I shall probably vote for this measure. But do not misunderstand me; do not think that is any surrender of my viewpoint on the manner in which relief has been, or should be, distributed. I have often spoken on these relief measures; and if any of us dare to criticize, our words are often misinterpreted and purposely so. The opponents will take one brief sentence out of our remarks and without further explanation use it for political purposes. I realize how dangerous it is to talk about relief, but my position here will not allow me not to do so.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], who spoke for the committee today, said that he was won over after listening to Mr. Hopkins; that Hopkins had a hard job and boondoggling represented only one-seventeenth of 1 percent—too small to talk about. And the Reedsville proposition—that is also a small matter, too small to talk about! He was not asked regarding resettlement, about which I have much material which I ought to have time to read. It is an unfortunate thing that we have to search through all these periodicals and newspapers to get information which we have reason to believe to be authentic, because we cannot get it from the officials themselves, who ought to have appeared before my committee. I should like to have had Mr. Rex Tugwell before my committee to explain about resettlement matters. Perhaps he would win me over, as Harry Hopkins won over the gentleman from Virginia.

Then the gentleman tells me that I have not read the report and do not know anything about relief. Come into my office and let me show you my scrapbooks, gotten together over a period of 3 years and consisting largely of editorial criticism and general information telling of the failures which you yourselves now acknowledge. I took the floor here and suffered the weariness of the struggle for the truth concerning that C. W. A., which you are now only too anxious to forget. Then you switched to the F. E. R. A., but after a year of that you were again anxious to change the whole policy. It did not work either. Now you have the W. P. A., and Harry Hopkins told you there was no politics in it. You apparently fell for that, apparently believed it, and you did not question him very much about it after he had stated, "I will put into the record here the results of our investigations." Then you dropped the subject. You say that he did not change his opinion from day to day. Why, he had to. Questioned from day to day as to how he arrived at allocating the money to the different States, he was obliged to change his statements. After 3 long years of experience, 3 long years, you are no nearer to knowing how to spend the money than you were at the beginning. But no advice is wanted. Why did you set on that committee and let him tell you there was no politics in Pennsylvania or in New York? At least one gentleman from Pennsylvania—a real Democrat—will talk about this. There are going to be a few Democrats here who will have the courage to stand up and show where, even in the matter of nominations as between Democrats, the relief rolls were used to defeat candidates. We have such an abundance of that sort of thing that Harry Hopkins' words here are but a hollow mockery.

After 3 long years what I am particularly interested in is the policy of handling funds for relief.

An amendment will be offered that half of this money be given over for direct relief. That is becoming the really approved method of using such funds. Change the present policy. It does not work. I deeply regret that our Committee on Expenditures has not been permitted to function. It is not the policy of this administration to have expenditures investigated. The matter is left wholly with the overworked Appropriations Committee, which has but little time for it. Their business is to look into future appropriations. We have to rely on getting our information from other sources, perhaps you think in devious ways. Although General Johnson's report was suppressed, I will quote what now seems to be admitted as true. General Johnson says they purloined his report. Somebody stole it. What a pity that you have to steal reports regarding public business!

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman care to yield for a moment?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. With reference to the question of whether or not the Appropriations Committee went into the question of relief carefully, I call attention to the fact that the hearings number 490 pages, and they consumed a number of days, and we had such distinguished and able members of that committee as the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON], and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THURSTON].

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, that is the entire deficiency report.

Mr. WOODRUM. Well, that is on relief.

Mr. GIFFORD. That is on your C. C. C. and different credit agencies. I am talking about W. P. A., which is this separate report.

Mr. WOODRUM. This is the investigation of relief which the gentleman condemns and is going to vote for.

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not condemn relief. Let the gentleman get that into his mind. I will vote every dollar necessary for relief which is not wasteful, extravagant, and based on the wrong policy. I love my people who are poor, just as much as the gentleman loves his people who are poor, and I will match the gentleman in what I will do for those people at any time at any place.

Mr. WOODRUM. But how can the gentleman vote for such an iniquitous administration measure as he is now condemning?

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Roosevelt is the only President we have. This is seemingly the only way he will do it. If I do not vote for it, I get nothing. We well understand that. Why try to put me in that sort of position?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman puts himself in that position. I did not put him in it.

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, no. I began by telling you why I would vote for it. The gentleman knows why he would like to put the Republican Party in that position. We disapprove of your methods; but after our futile efforts are exhausted, you in the majority will have to take the responsibility, and there is nothing for most of us to do but to go along. We recognize that. General Johnson did say, and he tacitly admitted that he said it, "that 60 percent of this inventive work is unwholesome, wasteful, and a fatuous gesture." The only argument is that it preserves pride instead of creating the humiliation of home relief; yet to get on work relief the rules require that a man must go on home relief. And to get there he must submit to the equivalent of a pauper's oath and a most humiliating inquisition. If a man on relief earns a fugitive dollar in any private employment, he risks the loss of any kind of relief. Quoting further from General Johnson:

> More than half of all this effort is pretense, justified by nothing. I note that the Government relief plans will be all work and no dole. If it is, imagination must become more fanciful, and practical results more parsimonious.

What does Mr. Ritter, the present man in charge of New York City relief, say?—

> One of the main problems we face now is trying to adjust the situation so as not to make W. P. A. so pleasant, so interesting, and so secure that people just come here and stay.

He goes on to say that their relief rolls have increased 50 percent. Hopkins has made relief work so attractive that, where people were taking care of relatives heretofore, they are now going on relief. No wonder Hopkins says it is permanent. That has nothing to do with bringing the country back to prosperity. There are a million and a half on relief as a result of the scarcity doctrine of A. A. A. Now, you say you can take care of only 2,000,000 people. There are a million and a half to be taken care of right there. You have to take care of many, even in my section. Of course, I am to vote for relief. Our people are frightened. If they have a dollar, they will not spend it. It is frozen. We used to be able to live a good deal through each other. We would hand work back and forth and get along. Now everyone hesitates to risk anything. The wheels of industry are moving, but individuals all over the country are still afraid to risk whatever they may possess, no matter what this Government has done to allay such fears. It has guaranteed bank deposits; it has thrown the whole Government behind everything; yet the individual will not employ his neighbor, lest he be not employed in return. If he has a dollar, he is hanging on to it.

As an illustration: In my section there is a little summer community of 80 homes. They have a caretaker who is a carpenter, a plumber, a painter. He can do almost anything. There are 80 homes owned by summer people, supposed to be fairly well to do. Every winter heretofore he has had considerable work. He has not had 1 day's work from December 1 to March 1 this year. Yet you say prosperity has returned. Confidence has not returned. A million and a half of sharecroppers thrown on relief and other millions still out of jobs, because of this lack of confidence. Of course, relief is here to stay, no matter how prosperous industrial business may become. This relief business, in Mr. Hopkins' opinion, seems to be permanent. Our people have been taught that the Treasury of the Federal Government is inexhaustible. They appear to believe that we have plenty of money here, an invisible supply. They do not seem to understand that the funds we are now voting them must all be paid back by themselves, even with interest added.

What a time we had last November when men who had kept off relief could obtain no recognition for W. P. A. work. They saw others, who might need aid much less than they, taken on P. W. A. projects while they, simply because they were not on relief in November, were ruled out. By whom? By the edict from Washington.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Up to about 100 years ago it was the accepted practice in surgery to bleed the patient, no matter what the ailment was. We are now trying to bleed ourselves well.

Mr. GIFFORD. Apparently. We are giving ourselves presents that we shall have to pay for.

Boondoggling! I am not criticizing it per se, but we hear even dancing masters say they are forced to close their dancing schools and themselves go on relief because the Government is competing with them and teaching dancing without tuition cost. Many such legitimate private enterprises are going by the board, because of Federal interference with private business. Boondoggling! That is only one-seventeenth of 1 percent of it, they say; it does not amount to anything. But the policy amounts to something. It is so small a part of these relief expenditures, they assert. I wonder if resettlement plans are also regarded as too small a matter to discuss?

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. CURLEY. The gentleman mentioned boondoggling.

Mr. GIFFORD. I will call it "votedoggling", if the gentleman would prefer.

Mr. CURLEY. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the word "boondoggling" was coined by a Republican administration of the city of New York, and the man who coined it came from the gentleman's own State, Mr. John Marshall. This statement comes from the official record of the investigation of relief in the city of New York.

Mr. GIFFORD. Be he Democrat or Republican, he believes, undoubtedly with President Roosevelt, that this word "is to be enshrined in the hearts of the American people."

Mr. CURLEY. I would inform the gentleman also that eurythmic dancing also originated under a Republican administration in the State of New York.

Mr. GIFFORD. But all this is a small matter. I should not criticize it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is not that the only good thing about it?

Mr. GIFFORD. Now I come to a report of the situation in Pennsylvania. You must have read the criticism of the former director of relief of that State. Are we not going to be impressed by the reports of men who formerly had charge of these matters? I want a little of it to appear in the RECORD, and now I shall read an extract or two regarding Pennsylvania. There are no politics in relief in Pennsylvania, are there? Hopkins says he has investigated them and has fired anybody who played politics with relief. Of course it is now fixed up all right.

This former relief administrator of Pennsylvania stated:

I believe the sooner the present works program is given up the better it will be for President Roosevelt's political future and for the Nation at large.

Not only are the workers themselves, in the main, dissatisfied, but the taxpayers, watching thousands of workers on W. P. A. projects doing little more than killing time, are becoming embittered toward relief expenditures of that kind.

Originally, I felt that President Roosevelt and Harry Hopkins were dead right in starting the works-progress program, because I thought, as they did, that it would be possible to give municipalities needed improvements at a low cost and at the same time give workmen the self-respect that comes from earning what they are receiving.

But the sad fact is that municipalities are getting improvements that could be supplied much more cheaply under contract and with up-to-date equipment. The other side of the picture is that a workman does not gain in self-respect by knowing that he is doing with a shovel and a wheelbarrow what could be done 10 times more efficiently and economically by a steam shovel and a truck.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. FORD of California. Why is it, then, that mayors of all the cities of the country come to Washington to have the work-relief program continued?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, the gentleman knows full well that the mayors of cities, and many very wealthy cities, are very careful about the money from their own funds that they spend for relief. I know of municipality after municipality which do not owe a dollar, with a very low tax rate, that are begging for the money. Some of them say: "Why should we not take it, why should we not ask for it, we contribute largely, do we not?" Think of it! You may be assured that the people of New England, in their town meetings, watch the tax rate closely and watch very carefully how they pay money out for relief. Why should they not take the money from W. P. A. when they witnessed in 1933 the pressure put on Hopkins to spend the money by Christmas? He sent a check to every municipality, no matter how wealthy it was. You remember that. What a method of distributing funds for strictly "relief" purposes! And after 3 long years they still do not know how to spend money for real relief.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Tugwell has spent $46,000,000, but it cost $19,000,000 to spend it. Some explanation of that fact would seem to be in order. But in the hearings there seems to be none.

They spent this W. P. A. money largely for what, in your community and mine? They got us to put in water plants and all sorts of things. They baited us by stating they would give 45 percent, although in many of the States the Federal Government gave practically the entire amount.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM. My friend has been speaking of politics and relief. I am wondering what my friend would think of the proposition of severely condemning the administration of relief as is now being administered, and then voting for it? What about a little politics in that?

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman seems to delight in bringing that matter up.

Mr. WOODRUM. No; but I would like to know what my friend thinks about that matter?

Mr. GIFFORD. We have to vote for relief, and this is the only relief bill that we shall have a chance to vote on. I want to provide relief just as much as the gentleman does.

Mr. MORAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. MORAN. The gentleman has referred to other States where relief has been mishandled, in his opinion. Does the gentleman intend to insert a list of projects in his own congressional district that he disapproves?

Mr. GIFFORD. I could insert a lot of them. I could name a long list, which involved our going in debt for something for which we could not afford to pay.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. In answer to the gentleman who spoke on behalf of the committee, are we to blame if they bring in a skunk with a litter of kittens and we have to take them?

Mr. GIFFORD. If the gentleman from Virginia has to resort to that sort of thing he cannot get very far. That does not excuse the bill or the failures in the bill.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I have the greatest respect for the gentleman's ability and earnestness, but I am wondering if he will not agree with those of us who believe in public works that now when we have great distress in the country we should engage in all possible public work which will build America?

Mr. GIFFORD. If the P. W. A. would help unemployment, all right, but it did not do that in England, and it has not accomplished its purpose here. It is too slow. We cannot seem to have projects planned and in readiness to proceed upon.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I may say that the group with which I have been associated has always advocated national planning—getting ready for adverse times in times of prosperity so that when famines and depressions come we are ready. That is the reason we have failed at this time. We were not ready when the depression came. There was no national planning in advance.

Mr. GIFFORD. You might make a report and hand it to Harry Hopkins, but he would say: "I should cry. Send that to the poor." That is what he said when he got a certain report from one group of real businessmen.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HEALEY. I have been listening with interest to the gentleman's remarks, and I conclude from his remarks that the gentleman is in favor of a relief appropriation and recognizes the necessity for making a relief appropriation?

Mr. GIFFORD. I certainly do.

Mr. HEALEY. But the gentleman is criticizing the administration of the present relief program?

Mr. GIFFORD. I am.

Mr. HEALEY. The gentleman does admit, however, there is a dire necessity for a relief appropriation and he is going to vote for it?

Mr. GIFFORD. I would be very foolish not to do so, and there is no politics in my vote. I want to remind the gentleman who mentioned politics for voting for relief that no one can suggest that I have shown any lack of courage in my votes on the floor of this House.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman, or anyone else, explain to us what justification there can be for the sum recommended in this bill while 700,000 W. P. A. employees are being thrown out and discharged? What provisions are being made to take care of them except private business?

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman well knows this sum does not take care of them. In New York City unemployment has grown 50 percent, and yet the gentlemen on this side get up here and praise God for the way industry has come back.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, we love to hear those speeches on prosperity. Certainly industry is coming back. But the number on relief rolls is growing greater on account of the Soil Conservation Act, on account of the continuation of the A. A. A., and the punitive measures adopted affecting industry. What are we going to do with this army that has been deliberately thrown out of work?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it not true that while industry is coming back the dividends of many of the great corporations are constantly increasing, and that the reason for the continuance of a vast amount of unemployment is those corporations are not willing to divide their profits with the men who work in their mills and factories?

Mr. GIFFORD. No; that is not the answer. The answer is the A. A. A. and the Soil Conservation Act and other punitive measures directed at industry. With this fund we can take care of only 2,000,000. The gentleman was not here a few minutes ago when I stated the answer to his question. It is a country-wide proposition, not an industrial one. The ordinary country person will not pass his money about as he used to. That is the answer. Industry itself has to a large degree recovered, but free interchange of labor is almost entirely lacking over the entire Nation outside of the industrial districts.

Mr. WITHROW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. WITHROW. The gentleman criticizes spending money for rural resettlement. Does the gentleman realize that the money spent by Mr. Tugwell's department for rural resettlement in the State of Wisconsin has been money very well spent; that they have received back a dollar for every dollar that has been spent; and that there is a real demand as well as a real need for additional allocations in the State of Wisconsin?

Mr. GIFFORD. Well, has the gentleman read the story of Jasper County? Has he read many other stories that I could furnish him; and why should Wisconsin or any other State be picked out, or any particular locality selected, to carry on such an experiment when any relief expenditures should be universal? What right have we to select any special community to put over something of that kind?

Mr. WITHROW. There has been nothing pulled over in Wisconsin. The project is being administered properly there.

Mr. GIFFORD. All these expenditures should be used in such a way that every community would be treated according to its needs; and it should be done under State and local supervision and by direct relief. You will learn that this is the only answer, and 1 year from now you will come to it yourselves. There is an absolute demand that everybody who is now suffering shall be taken care of, and it cannot be done by trying to scheme out some form of made-work relief. Why can you not recognize this now and confess that your present plan is a failure? It is a failure, and everybody knows it. Your President said he would recognize failure and he would invite criticism, but he never recognizes a mistake and never stands for criticism.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. How would you do it?

Mr. GIFFORD. By direct relief. That would be the easiest way and would do away with all this bureaucracy. I do not know that I pronounce the word correctly, but it is a word that is causing concern in the minds of the people of the country generally.

Mr. KELLER. How would you get away from that?

Mr. GIFFORD. With respect to your people in Missouri, I do read occasionally about St. Louis, Mo., and the Pendergast machine. Perhaps politics would get into it even there, would it not?

Mr. KELLER. I do not think so.

Mr. GIFFORD. If politics would not get into it in St. Louis, then it would not get into it anywhere; but direct relief is the answer. The present method has failed to provide adequate relief to those in need thereof, because it is a wrong method.

Mr. KELLER. I am asking for the gentleman's remedy.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK].

W. P. A. O. K., BUT SO IS PUBLIC WORKS AND RURAL RESETTLEMENT

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat in the same position as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD], who preceded me. I am a little bit confused, and I am going to make a few criticisms as I go along, and, like the gentleman from Massachusetts, I am going to vote for the bill. I say nothing, however, in bitterness.

I just want to converse on this question of legislation in general for a moment. The manner in which this bill is brought to the floor has been customary, I presume, for a hundred years. But, Mr. Chairman, this bill comes in here without anybody except a subcommittee knowing anything about it. And the first thing we all do, by unanimous consent, including our opposition over here [Mr. MAVERICK indicating the Republican side], is to make a waiver by which we absolutely abandon our legislative processes as applied to all the other committees. The Appropriations Committee offers their bill, and I presume there is considerable legislation in it, and we have waived all points of order. So the result is going to be there will only be one committee of any importance in the House of Representatives, and that will be the Appropriations Committee. If this is true, I hope I get on it.

In any event, we gave up our legislative rights in this particular case, and I have no particular criticism, because I could have objected but did not. But neither did the Republicans; it is merely an example of Congress abandoning legislative processes and railroading ourselves out of our rights.

PRINT OF BILL NOT EVEN AVAILABLE TO CONGRESS

Another thing is that the bill was not available, and this is customary and has been the custom for years. But how can a man make an intelligent talk on this bill or a constructive talk when we are handed the hearings of probably 1,000 pages on which these other gentlemen have worked for 2 months, and then we are supposed to get up here and debate the bill and vote with deliberation. In fact, the bill is not even available at this time. I tried to get a bill for about half an hour, and finally I borrowed one from the courteous chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. WOODRUM], the gentleman from Virginia. This is the only way I was able to get a copy of the bill.

It would seem to me that we should adopt a policy of getting out reports at least a week ahead on ordinary legislation like this. With reports gotten out ahead we could inform ourselves and legislate more carefully, and certainly with more knowledge.

ARMY AND NAVY—DO WE DISCUSS FUNDAMENTALS?

Let us talk about legislation in particular reference to this matter, because it is more or less relevant. When we are talking about the Army and the Navy we talk about battle cruisers and cruisers and battleships, and we bandy statistics around. But we say nothing about the economic background in reference to these huge appropriations.

I come from the biggest military district in the United States and, I think, the biggest one in the world. My district probably profited financially from the World War. We suffered a break-down afterward, of course. My people are assisted, to a large extent, by military appropriations. But

I do not think that my district or this Nation can have permanent prosperity entirely by military and naval appropriations. I just do not think we can do that. We must develop our interior and our exterior, world trade, and promote peace. I think some day we ought to get down to it and discuss whether it is really necessary to have one of the biggest navies in the world, which is to go all over the world in some sort of fantastic empire.

You know civilization has always been destroyed when there is a great concentration of wealth, along with the building pyramids or nonproductive buildings of all kinds, developed side by side with a royal military force. It seems to me that we are headed somewhat in that direction. I voted for the Navy appropriation bill, and I voted for the Army appropriation bill, but I wonder if we are solving our problems in this way.

POLITICS IN W. P. A.?—NOT MUCH, BUT THEY ARE HUMAN

Now, let us get down to this W. P. A. appropriation we are debating today. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to say publicly or privately that Harry Hopkins is one of the ablest men in the United States, and he is doing a fine job. Has there been any politics? Of course, there has been politics in the W. P. A., just like there was politics in the Republican days, and just as there will be if that party comes into power again; or just as there will be if a third party comes into power.

But I will say this, that there has been a minimum of politics, and Hopkins has been doing a fine job under the most difficult conditions.

I am wondering this: Is there any permanent recovery under the W. P. A.? Are we going to put people back to work permanently by the W. P. A. appropriations? Personally I do not think so. I think the W. P. A. is absolutely necessary, but there is no permanent benefit coming from it.

RURAL RESETTLEMENT SHOULD BE CONTINUED

Let me say a word or two about the rural resettlement. That is criticized to a large extent because it is under Mr. Tugwell, called both doctor and professor, who went to college and got more than one degree. They say there is something wrong in a man that gets two degrees from college.

The rural resettlement is doing just about the most important work in the United States today. Suppose you put aside Mr. Tugwell—suppose you send him back to college—the work will have to go on just the same. Soil erosion, destruction of forests, the poverty of the rural people, tenants, and sharecroppers everywhere—something must be done about it, and we should not abandon our program.

Now, what is Mr. Tugwell, or rather the Rural Resettlement Administration doing? The Administration has taken 600,000 farmers off relief and put them back into self-respecting productive work. That is a substantial accomplishment, and more must be done, whether Tugwell lives or dies.

When you put a man on relief you have to keep feeding him forever. When you get him back on the land and back in the economic system, you have done something worth while. And that is what rural resettlement is doing.

As I understand, last year he got something like $250,000,000. This year, although his Department is not mentioned here, he is to get something like $85,000,000. If we appropriated $250,000,000 last year, $85,000,000 this year is not sufficient.

SHALL WE EARMARK $700,000,000 FOR W. P. A.?

Take the W. P. A.—there are a large number of Congressmen who want to earmark $700,000,000 of that for the Public Works Administration under Secretary Ickes.

I have been talking about that thing, and I have been studying it. One billion five hundred million dollars does not appear to be enough; at least, last year we appropriated $4,800,000,000. I make bold to say that and I am willing to vote an increase in the appropriation if the expenditure can be invested intelligently and conservatively, as I think has been done under the Public Works Administration.

MONEY PROPERLY INVESTED IS NOT WASTED

They say, "Where are you going to get the money?" When you take money and put it into permanent economic programs you get the money back, and then you are not wasting money, but you are investing money wisely. Let us say that the P. W. A. has about a billion dollars worth of work that they can start now. They make a grant on that of 45 percent, or $450,000,000. That money all practically comes back to the Federal Treasury, because P. W. A. charges a rate of interest of something like 3½ or 4 percent, and the Government borrows the money at a much lower rate. This may be stretching a point, but it is true P. W. A. is legitimate, sound business.

I believe some way should be found, if possible, to increase this appropriation for the P. W. A., because the P. W. A. is doing a permanent, high-class piece of work in this country.

P. W. A., they say, has been slow. Possibly that was for the best; Ickes is a cautious man and has been careful from every angle. But slow or not, the P. W. A. is ready now with legitimate, self-liquidating projects that run at least seven hundred million and probably a billion dollars.

P. W. A. AND RESETTLEMENT OUTSTANDING AGENCIES

In a general way the Rural Resettlement and the P. W. A. are really the outstanding agencies in the Government today that are doing work which is of a permanent nature, from the viewpoint of rehabilitating rural people and agricultural land and city people and industrial business, in an economic structure. For that reason we ought to do something about keeping these agencies going.

Ickes and Tugwell and Hopkins get a lot of criticism, and largely because they have hard jobs to fill. I asked a colleague a minute ago which he like the best, Tugwell or Hopkins, and he said he liked one just about as much as he did the other, and he meant by that that he did not like either one of them. He has never met either of them, but has had some pleasure in hating them at a distance. We get a lot of criticism from the other side of the House on our Administrators, and some from our own side. The Republicans are constantly talking about "Tugwellian philosophy" and about "boondoggling", which, in my opinion, is entirely superficial criticism, because no sensible substitute or program is offered.

Some day we must get down to the fundamental question of what we—and I here mean Republicans and Democrats, Progressives and Farmer-Laborites, all of us—are going to do. And let us discuss some of the things that we have not done. We have not even gotten the Bankhead Tenant Act on the floor, which is to rehabilitate sharecroppers, tenants, and landless agricultural workers. We have not gotten out any housing bill, and we have not gotten out any real conservation bill. All these matters concern permanent recovery, and those matters I mentioned must be faced. As far as I know, we have not any particularly well-integrated or definite plan of what we are going to do.

This is not an anti-Democratic speech. I am for the Democratic Party. I am for President Roosevelt. I am for what we are trying to do, but sometimes I am not sure that we are doing everything that we should. Sometimes I think we wince under superficial criticism of the Republicans and our reactionary enemies—and they have not any program, nothing to offer, or anything sensible to say. I have heard the Republicans talk today, and all they have done is stand in this well and criticize what the Democratic Party is doing. They make absolutely no constructive suggestions whatever. They say we are doing wrong, and that we have to stop this relief program, this, and that, with some talk of alphabets, although no more talk about the "brain trust." What the Republicans think does not seem to be much. The question is, What are we going to do?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. I gladly yield to the distinguished leader of my party.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman have some hopes that the new Republican "brain trust" may evolve some policy for the Republican Party very soon?

Mr. MAVERICK. I am afraid not. I have found out that they have one man in the Republican "brain trust" who is a Socialist from way back, and I have walked the floor at night a great deal about that. Then there is something else that I have heard. Last night there was a red flag hung on the Supreme Court flagpole, and they found a Harvard magazine under it, and I think that must have been Professor Carver, of the Republican "brain trust", who did that. I understand that he was in the neighborhood just about that time.

TUGWELL TRADES CAP AND GOWN FOR STEEL HELMET AND RHINOCEROS HIDE

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. No matter what the Republican "brain trust" does, it cannot hope to equal the Democratic "brain trust" in damn foolishness——

Mr. MAVERICK. Brains—you mean in brains. You cannot hope to equal the Democratic "brain trust" in brains. You know that you are jealous.

Mr. LUCAS. The gentleman spoke something about Mr. Tugwell leaving his office and what might or might not happen should that come to pass. Does the gentleman believe that perhaps we may be able to go to the Republican "brain trust" and find somebody to take his place?

Mr. MAVERICK. No, and I will tell the reason why you cannot. You cannot do it for two reasons. One of them is that the Republican "brain trust" has not as much brains as the Democratic "brain trust", and the second is that Tugwell has been in for 3 years now, and he has gotten a good deal of the doctorate worn off him, he has been kicked around so much, and has now become a pretty good administrator. He has traded his cap and gown for a steel helmet and a rhinocerous hide.

Mr. GIFFORD. And what the gentleman is trying to say, paradoxically, is that a "brain trust" is an asinine thing anyway.

Mr. MAVERICK. The Republican one; yes. Our "brain trust" is a good one. But I want to say in conclusion that I really believe, instead of voting for this bill as it is, that we ought to do something for the P. W. A. and the Rural Resettlement.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman made one observation that I am very much interested in and I want to see if I understood him correctly. I understood the gentleman to say that Tugwell had been given $250,000,000.

Mr. MAVERICK. Last year.

Mr. CRAWFORD. With which he had cared for 600,000 farm families.

Mr. MAVERICK. That is what I understand the figures show, and he has not only cared for, but has rehabilitated many of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. TABER. I yield the gentleman 1 minute more.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then if that is so, if my figures are correct, that, of course, would be $411.66 per family.

Your observation startles me. It is some information I have overlooked. I want to ask where I can get the details on this statement.

Mr. MAVERICK. From the Rural Resettlement; and you can also find that there has been comparatively more permanent rehabilitation per dollar than there has been through any other agency. I cannot give statistics, but from a viewpoint of principle the idea is right.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does the gentleman know of any Republican in the House who claims any interest in that "brain trust" and who is not willing that you should take over whatever they may have down there at Republican headquarters?

Mr. MAVERICK. But you know they hired that "brain trust."

Mr. HOFFMAN. Who hired him?

Mr. MAVERICK. Your own leaders, of course; BERT SNELL and your other leaders. You know very well you agreed on that "brain trust." You cannot deny that.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman is mistaken. We do not have any "brain trust." You have a patent on the "brain trust."

Mr. MAVERICK. You have what purports to be one; the fact remains you complained of a Democratic "brain trust" for 3 years, then studied the matter over and hired one yourself.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Is it not a fact that what Tugwell is doing is paying relief to 200,000 farmers, and that he has not taken any off of relief?

Mr. MAVERICK. No, no. Mr. Tugwell—that is, the Rural Resettlement Administration—is rehabilitating some 600,000 farmers, many of whom to all intents and purposes are rehabilitated permanently.

Now, let me conclude with a short review or with some repetitions. First, legislatively, either we are all passing the buck, both Republicans and Democrats, or giving up many of our legislative processes such as in the waiver we unanimously passed today. That is a bad precedent. Second, the idea of bringing in a bill which no one has had a chance to read seems to me to be a bad policy, and that a better one would be to bring in a bill ahead of time and give the Members a chance to study and therefore legislate intelligently. Third, W. P. A. is absolutely necessary, and we must pass at least the $1,500,000,000 bill. But, aside from that, the Rural Resettlement and Public Works Administrations are both essential to the economic set-up of this Nation and should be carried on as absolutely necessary on the part of our economic system. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN].

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Chairman, on January 14, 1936, I made a speech on the floor of the House in which I made some comments on President Roosevelt's message of January 3 on the state of the Union. I did not expect any reaction or comment from the President or members of his Cabinet. I did not suppose that any of them had time to read speeches of a new Congressman of the opposite political party. A portion of my speech was intended as a challenge to the members of the President's party, who constitute a majority of the membership of the House.

Under date of March 14, 1936, I received a communication from the Honorable Harold Ickes in which he calls my attention to the fact that I made the following statement in that speech:

> The misfeasance—and I may add the malfeasance—in the administration of W. P. A. and P. W. A. projects as partisan enterprises for political profit has reacted against the administration and its sponsors.

And the Secretary of the Interior concludes his communication as follows:

> If I have been guilty of anything in the administration of the Public Works program it is that I have been overzealous in my insistence that the program be administered without scandal and without regard to partisan politics. I feel so strongly on this point that I must challenge the truth of your charges and demand their proof.

Evidently the Administrator of Public Works is particular about the company in which his alphabetical symbols are found. Most of us who make up the membership of this House commenced our educational processes by learning the alphabet. Today pursuant to some strange pedagogical theory, children learn to read without learning the alphabet. Until the advent of the administration of "Roosevelt the Lesser" there was grave possibility that our youngsters would grow up without learning the alphabet. It is an amazing but somewhat serious fact, that our young people are at quite a disadvantage in their efforts to locate words in the dictionary. They have trouble finding names in the telephone directory because of their lack of familiarity with the alphabet. Many of our youngsters are rusty on the sequence of the letters of the alphabet.

Now we have the confusion of youth complicated by the difficulties of the older generations. In the midst of this alphabetical uncertainty in the schoolrooms, along come Tugwell, Hopkins, and Ickes with 57 variations of alphabetical readjustment. Out of this maze of letters come the familiar symbols "W. P. A." and "P. W. A." As a new Congressman I am not embarrassed to admit that I was quite unacquainted with the fine distinctions connected with the order of arrangement of these mystical letters. I knew that regardless of the order of arrangement they emanated from the bureaucratic satellites of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. And I was, and still am, of the opinion that any political reaction that may accrue because of the activities of any division of the governmental program will affect Mr. Roosevelt and his chances for reelection. The average voter, like your new Member of Congress from the Third Congressional District of Michigan, will be hazy in his distinction between P. W. A. and W. P. A. And if the management or administration of either department produces what may be fairly designated as "malfeasance" or "misfeasance", the reaction will be against the Democratic ticket in November. And no one will stop to consider whether Mr. Ickes is the Simonpure nonpartisan, or whether Mr. Hopkins is to be the scapegoat for all the partisan patronage that is being dispensed under the cloak of human relief.

It is probably true that P. W. A. had nothing to do with the circumstances occurring in my district in the months of November, December, and January, on which my remarks were based and for that reason I retract the reference to P. W. A. in my speech of January 14, page 399, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and ask to have, "and P. W. A." stricken from the permanent record.

Mr. Chairman, when this Committee rises it is my intention to ask unanimous consent that the RECORD be corrected in that respect.

As a matter of fact there were five or six projects just getting under way in my district in November, December, and January under the auspices of the P. W. A. and I am only too glad to state that the methods of administration in those particular cases appeal to me as infinitely superior to the methods adopted by W. P. A.

But, Mr. Speaker, I cannot resist the opportunity of pointing out the very obvious fact that from the very nature of the circumstances, so long as the abbreviations, P. W. A. and W. P. A. are used, there will continue to be confusion and uncertainty as to the history, background, and responsible governmental agency connected with a given project.

The newspapers supply ample proof that there is much confusion as to whether the $25,000 municipal dog kennel at Memphis is a W. P. A. or a P. W. A. project. I understand that this particular dog house is a public building but perhaps that does not bring it under Public Works Administration, and I am of the opinion that that particular project might better be designated as a W. A. P. project. And it might even be advisable to insert the letter "S" and make it W. A. S. P., as I am quite sure somebody is going to get "stung" as a result of that item of public works.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAIN. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What kind of a house did the gentleman refer to?

Mr. MAIN. A dog house.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it really true that such a house has been built?

Mr. MAIN. Yes; at a cost of $25,000.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman used the initials "W. A. P."

Mr. MAIN. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I would call that "wash all pups."

Mr. MAIN. I thank the gentleman. That is a very practical suggestion.

While I am perfectly willing to smooth the ruffled feelings of Secretary Ickes by asking to have the reference to P. W. A. withdrawn from my speech of January 14, I cannot refrain from reminding our Democratic colleagues that the President has a curious assortment of advisers and coworkers. Of course, we cannot blame Mr. Ickes for being anxious to see that his Department is absolved from all criticism. But the fact remains that the Democratic candidate in November will be Franklin Roosevelt and not Harold Ickes, and if there has been misfeasance and malfeasance in scattering the spending power of this Nation broadcast across the land, regardless of the alphabetical sponsorship under which such program is carried on, it will be the Democratic Party that must suffer the consequences.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAIN. I yield.

Mr. FORD of California. I wonder if the gentleman read the returns from California?

Mr. MAIN. I read the returns from California; yes. If the gentleman gets any particular consolation out of those returns, he is welcome to it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAIN. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. For the benefit of the gentleman I think there were 25,000 McGroarty-Townsend votes in California.

Mr. MAIN. Now, if the gentleman is interested in Townsend votes, I would like to know why his Townsend investigating committee is acting like the pup that I used to know about that was always chasing the cat, but he always regulated his speed so that he never quite caught up with the cat. Why this 2 weeks' postponement in completing the examination of Dr. Townsend?

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I insist on order among the Republicans.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, in fairness to the gentleman from Michigan, I think the RECORD should show that Mr. HOFFMAN is not responsible for the 2 weeks' adjournment, and that that should be laid at the door of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield further. I am devoting these remarks to Mr. Ickes and not to Mr. HOFFMAN. [Laughter and applause.]

So far as I am concerned, the Honorable Mr. Ickes and his Department are relieved of any and all charges of misfeasance and malfeasance or discrimination in the selection of employables on projects in the Third District of Michigan during the months of November, December, and January last. But let it also be said that the wise and judicious spending of certain millions from the Federal Treasury under the banner of P. W. A. will not eclipse or justify the unwise squandering of other millions from the Federal Treasury, regardless of the manner in which the alphabet is juggled. It is difficult for the people of my district to comprehend any good reason for failing to approve the proposed addition to the school building in the township of Comstock, Kalamazoo County, costing less than $50,000, with the local contribution in cash ready for use, while Federal money was being spent in providing shower baths for stray dogs in the city of Memphis. The fact that Mr. Roosevelt is following the suggestions of Harry Hopkins, instead of accepting the counsel of Harold Ickes, will not satisfy the school children of Comstock who are denied the benefits of a gymnasium, even though the homeless hounds of Memphis are bedded down in sanitary kennels.

Mr. Roosevelt may be well pleased with the personnel of his official advisers, but in my opinion his administration will come to an abrupt end because of his indiscriminate and flagrant disregard for the laws of party tradition. The performance of the party in power appears to have followed the platform of the Socialist Party for 1932 instead of the Democratic platform adopted in Chicago 4 years ago. The appointees and responsible advisers of the President lack regularity in their political ancestry and in their political outlook. Some of their program seems to bear the stamp of foreign origin. Like the Government mule, who, because of too flagrant violation of the laws of animal husbandry, can have neither pride of ancestry nor hope of posterity, so some of the political cross-breeds in the Roosevelt administration family suggest some unholy alliance of the Democratic donkey with one of the nightmare delusions from Russia. Hybrid advocates of political experimentation, like the mule, may be tough and hardy while they last, but can boast neither of political ancestry nor can they have reasonable hope for political posterity. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the question asked by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN], who just had the floor, as to the reason for the adjournment of the investigating committee, of course, as the gentleman well knows, I do not know why an adjournment was had, because I am only one member of a committee of eight, and, unlike the gentleman who just preceded me, I do not assume to know all that the others know, and I do not assume to speak for anyone but myself. However, I have learned somewhat indirectly that the adjournment was had to enable counsel for the committee to have here in Washington some of the information which they have obtained in California, so that they might accurately quote documents which were put in evidence there.

Personally, I am somewhat hasty, somewhat abrupt at times, and somewhat inclined to form quick conclusions. But I can say to the gentleman that from the day that committee first met it was my understanding that they were to meet and question Dr. Townsend and Mr. Clements on the following Friday, and I have been willing and am now as a member of that committee to go through with that examination. I did learn while up in the gentleman's district last week that it was being represented up there to the voters, to those who were asked to contribute their dimes and quarters, that if they would pay, not $1.20, because the district manager said he did not put forth that statement, but that if people would contribute $1.45 a year to the Townsend organization, which claims credit for the gentleman's election, there would be paid to everyone eligible a $2,400 annuity each year, or $200 a month.

Let me quote from the instructions to all area managers under the jurisdiction of the central regional office at Chicago.

> If every member will pay his or her 10-cent quota promptly each month during 1936, and we win the next Congress, that means the 12 monthly quotas plus the 25 cents membership fee, a total of $1.45, is all it costs to win an annuity of $2,400 a year—$200 per month and assured employment at living wages for every worker. Do you know of any investment anywhere that will yield such value that costs so little? No matter what any club member's circumstances may be, it would seem the part of wisdom to make a real sacrifice to pay this small monthly quota of 10 cents. It is the lifeblood of your organization; it is practically all we have to use in the fight against the powerful and abundantly financed groups and individuals who are spending so freely to defeat our purpose. Please, please, please get this thought before every Townsend club in your area, because we are falling behind other regions in meeting our club quotas.

Now, if it takes a little bit of time to demonstrate that that has been the course the country over, that the people have been deceived, that they have been defrauded out of their dimes and quarters, that they are to be induced to vote for someone as a candidate for Congress upon his promise that if they would give their $1.45 a year and elect him that he in return would assist in enacting legislation which would give this annuity of $2,400, I think the adjournment is a good thing, because it is well they should know that not only in Michigan but everywhere such promises have been put forth.

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield for a question.

Mr. MAIN. I wonder if the gentleman found out that a statement over my signature stating my platform in that campaign contained the announcement that I would vote for the McGroarty bill, H. R. 7154, and that was the limit of my statement with regard to promises as to Townsend-plan legislation? I am glad to stand by that promise when and if the opportunity comes to vote on that bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I did not inquire as to the gentleman's platform, because it was in the papers at the time of the campaign. I did not, I do not, consider the gentleman's platform conclusive on this matter. As these questions were asked of different witnesses they informed me—they volunteered the information—that the gentleman from Michigan was the standard bearer, being the first man in Congress, the first congressional candidate who had been elected by them, by the Townsend organization; and I learned that he, the gentleman from Michigan, had appeared on the platform with Dr. Townsend or Mr. Clements and with Townsend speakers during the campaign. I know also, from all the Townsend publications, the Townsend plan as set forth, for instance, in this month's issue of their paper that they, the Townsend organization, stand without compromise for $200 a month; and we know there is no such bill before this Congress at the present time. I know also that the McGroarty bill, according to the testimony of the man who was called as an expert by Dr. Townsend—I refer to Dr. Robert R. Doane—will not produce more than $33.33 per month, and he finally testified under oath that if the amount raised by the McGroarty bill was distributed among 10,000,000 pensioners it would give approximately $30 per month. These figures do not allow for any administrative costs, which, of course, would make a material reduction in the amount actually received by the pensioner.

He concluded his testimony on this subject with the statement that the pension which would be received under the McGroarty bill would purchase about $6 worth "of our present goods."

The doctor further testified that the Michigan pension law, as it now exists, would produce more in actual purchasing value to the pensioners than would the pension under the McGroarty bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of appropriating $1,500,000,000 for work relief, as provided in this measure, largely because a great deal of the money will be used in the so-called boondoggling program; and I will state my reasons: In the so-called boondoggling program the money has been spent on what type of person? On the white-collar individual. What does he comprise? He comprises a class of persons whom it would be impossible to utilize in any kind of a P. W. A. project because of the fact that they have had no training or experience with manual labor.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of California. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. Is that the reason they lean on their shovels instead of using them to raise material?

Mr. FORD of California. Possibly so; but they do not do that. You see, I am talking about the white-collar people. Who are they? They are artists, singers, musicians, actors, dancers, school teachers, and persons engaged in all the finer forms of artistic endeavor. Of course, if we do not want to help the artist who has no work, we can take him out, as some of the opponents of this bill would do, and shoot him. How about the vocal artist? We would still the singer's voice; we would numb the harpist's fingers; would we leave those whose gifts are along artistic and cultural lines to starve, freeze, and go naked?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of California. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. These musicians and artists must live like other citizens; they should have an American standard of living.

Mr. FORD of California. Absolutely.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I can see no reason for not helping them. I think the administration deserves credit for doing something for them.

Mr. FORD of California. The distinguished gentleman is correct, and I thank him for his contribution. He, of course, has a great heart, like all his progressive neighbors, and he believes in things that have for their purpose the bettering of human beings.

The gentlemen who are so much opposed to these boondoggling projects—who are they? They are the gentlemen who sit in palatial offices, who have a dozen secretaries at their command; they are the gentlemen who control the destinies of the railroads, the banks, and the great industrial corporations, and all the rest of it. They would leave the artists, the musicians, the singers, the dancers, and all that great mass of people whose aims and ambitions are concerned with the finer, the higher, the more artistic things of life—they would leave them out, they would leave out the school teacher who is unemployed to starve, the dancing teacher and any other class of people whose activities and training and background and experience disqualify them for the pick or the shovel or the maul or any other implement that is used in manual labor. That is what I like about Harry Hopkins.

Harry Hopkins has a broad comprehension of human needs, which is not confined to any one single class. He has done a courageous and splendid job.

Mr. Chairman, I would vote for adding another $700,000,000 for W. P. A., but I shall not vote to take $700,000,000 from the present appropriation. I am opposed to that from the start, and I am going to fight it with all the strength and ability I have at my command, because I want this money to use for the creation of jobs that may be started quickly and which will put the maximum number of people to work for the maximum length of time. It is beyond my understanding how Members of this House can oppose the use of this money for the type of project contemplated by the Works Progress Administration. In doing so they are unconsciously joining with the interests that oppose everything and would adopt a do-nothing policy.

The "old guard" reactionary opposition to the New Deal has been one of attack, with the only alternative a return to laissez faire. Nothing constructive, nothing that squarely faces the spectacle of poverty in the midst of plenty, of unemployment, while industrial profits mount, of the sweatshop and the slum, of child labor and the destitute aged, has come from the reactionary leadership which controls the G. O. P. But now, at last, the Republican National Committee has realized that some alternative plan must be offered, if the ever-growing tide in favor of the New Deal is to be stemmed.

Hence we read of the Republican "brain trust", headed by Dr. Thomas Nixon Carver, professor emeritus of political economy, Harvard University. Dr. Carver is noted as a dry-as-dust economist of the old school, who interprets political economy in terms of capital, wages, profits, supply and demand, and who excludes all reference to human welfare, to widening opportunity for all the people, to methods of securing a higher standard of living for the multitude. He, of course, is opposed to W. P. A.

For the Republican National Committee Dr. Carver has evolved a plan, which for cold-blooded calculation, for gross materialism, for a repudiation of every principle of democracy, cannot be matched in the known world.

Here it is, as given in the press:

1. Easing or elimination of Government regulation and restraint on business.

2. Reduction of the supply of labor by sterilization of the "palpably unfit"; widespread use of birth control; exclusion of all immigration; checks on marriage. Marriage would be barred until the parties could afford to buy and operate an automobile.

3. Organization of the "substantial people of America" in a national party to stamp out radicalism.

4. Curtailment of unemployment relief by forcing idle off rolls by "severe regulations."

The central idea of this plan is to reduce as rapidly as possible the supply of labor, looked upon not as human beings, but as instruments to create profits for the substantial people of America, who are to unite to stamp out what the pundits choose to brand as radicalism. America is thus envisioned as a closed corporation, owned and controlled by the capitalistic few, and conducted as a great industrial and business organization, producing enormous incomes for those in control. All who dare to oppose such an order, once it is established on what was once free America, are to be dealt with as radicals. There is no thought of so adjusting our almost unlimited power of production as to enable all our people to enjoy an increasingly high standard of living; there is no recognition of the fact that this is an age of plenty and that it is only a complete failure in distribution that makes want and privation, lack of opportunity, unrest, and despair rampant.

There is in Dr. Carver's document this pregnant sentence: "Possibly Mussolini and Hitler are more farseeing than the rest of us." Certainly Hitler is, if by this we mean that he is succeeding in regimenting the German people, in depriving them of the freedom of speech and of the press, of a free parliament elected by the people, of the right to worship according to their convictions, of justice under the law, regardless of race or creed or political opinion. All these sacred rights, which we Americans cherish as we do our own souls, Hitler has taken from the German people. And to this a respected professor from a university that has long stood for American ideals gives his implied approval.

I do not believe that Republicans generally approve such doctrine. It is only that small group of reactionaries, backed by limitless money, who accept these Fascist theories, who advocate such an un-American and un-Christian plan as Dr. Carver's. The rank and file of the Republican voters will repudiate it, along with all the other free-minded Americans who still insist that the welfare clause of the Constitution means precisely what it says, and that America was meant to be, and shall continue to be, the land of opportunity for the great common people, whether they be artists, musicians, actors, or writers, and not a bonanza for the money grabber.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks which I made earlier in the day and to insert a few brief abstracts from the hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, the first deficiency appropriation bill for 1936, which is presented here, I shall support in its entirety. There are, however, some phases of the bill with which I am not in entire agreement, and therefore I should like to make certain suggestions to the Committee with reference to modifications and changes.

Insofar as the W. P. A. is concerned, this agency of the Government presents certain definite problems which affect the Members of this House coming from various districts throughout the Nation. This is particularly true and applicable as far as the big cities are concerned, where larger W. P. A. projects are necessary. Where the unemployment problem is large it is natural that the individual project should be large. I have in mind, for example, an artillery armory in my district. The War Department is very anxious to locate a motorized unit in the city of Detroit because it is the heart of the automobile industry. The University of Detroit has a very fine engineering school with a campus that is very attractive for this purpose, but the W. P. A. does not seem to be able to decide on going through with the project.

In the first instance, when the application was made, the ruling of Mr. Hopkins was that the per-man-unit costs were too high. These were later restudied and reduced to conform with the general outlined requirements of the Department. Then the ruling was made that because of the size of the project it could not be finished before July 1 and, accordingly, was definitely disapproved.

The Members of the House know that the W. P. A., and P. W. A. for that matter, will not cease at the expiration of the month of June. We know that unemployment at least to a certain extent will still be with us. I fail to see why a worthy conforming project of the kind I just mentioned in a large community, such as I represent, cannot be given approval and a continuing cash allowance made for its commencement, with further allowances until it is finally completed, instead of saying: "Since we cannot start and finish the project before July 1, it must be disapproved and rejected." We know that small armories of $60,000, $70,000, and $80,000 have been and are still being built in the smaller communities and smaller cities and towns. A small project of that kind in my district would be absolutely worthless and could not be considered. It is absolutely essential in a community where the unemployment problem is greater to have a project correspondingly larger. The only way to solve that sort of problem is to have a continuing appropriation. I shall expect appropriate remedies to be incorporated in this bill before the final vote upon adoption.

Another phase of the first deficiency appropriation bill I should like to discuss has to do with the salary increases for deputy United States marshals. Here is a group of men throughout the Nation that render a splendid service. Some very fine men are connected with the United States marshal's offices throughout the United States. They receive approximately two-thirds of the amount ordinarily paid deputy sheriffs and in many instances less. The only reason the salaries of these people have not been increased commensurate with their service is because they are not an organized group and not in a position to force their demands. The Attorney General states in a written communication to me that he is willing and anxious to have these increases made. Why the Appropriations Committee does not do something about it is a matter I cannot understand. Perhaps the committee spokesman will tell me and the Members of the House that the Bureau of the Budget refuses to make the recommendation; however, regardless of who is to blame, something should be done to correct the situation. The Attorney General is favorable; Members of this body, upon whom rests the responsibility, know the claim of these faithful employees is just; so let us tell the Director of the Budget what he must do. He is the servant, not the master, of the Congress. I think it is high time that the Appropriations Committee assume its full duty and correct the situation. These men are giving of their best effort in the Government service. They work all hours of the day, serving summons as late as 10 or 11 o'clock at night. When they serve two or three summons in distant cities and towns of a judicial district jurisdiction, they receive but one fee for this additional work. When using their cars they are not even allowed an amount of money for mileage commensurate with the expenditure involved. As a consequence, it is frequently necessary for them to abandon their automobiles and use streetcars. This costs the Government a great deal more in the long run, because a deputy cannot cover enough territory or get service in as many instances as he would if he used his automobile. In other words, where they could make six or seven or more calls by the use of an auto they can only make a half of that number, using streetcars. This is false economy, and the Department of Justice knows this condition exists and is anxious to correct it.

Mr. Chairman, I should now like to refer to my colleague from Michigan [Mr. MAIN]. I have heard him spout on this floor about as much as I care to without some reasonable reply. The only thing I now remember of his partisan abusive speeches is the word "wolf", which he used three or four times in every breath. Where and for what purpose that word came into his speech, I do not know, but I remember it very distinctly. He is still shouting "Wolf" or, rather, perhaps, talking about dog houses down in Kentucky.

Fortunately the gentleman has seen the light. He comes before the committee now and makes a public and abject apology to Mr. Ickes and admits having made a serious mistake in connection with his unfair attack upon the Secretary of the Interior. One thing the gentleman will learn, if he is here long enough, is if he wants to be right, he should pay some attention to what he is talking about. He had not been here long enough to get his feet wet when he started to attack the present administration.

Now, this gentleman came to the House elected as an advocate of the Townsend plan. Two hundred dollars per month and no less. Here he talks for the McGroarty bill, but he fails to make clear to his people the distinct difference between the Townsend plan and the McGroarty bill. He should have done so when my friend, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], stated here that the McGroarty bill is different from that which our people believe is the Townsend plan.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. DINGELL. I advocated and worked for adequate old-age pensions long before I ever came to Congress. I have worked with the fraternal order of Eagles and with their national chaplain for adequate pensions. So there is not any question about where I stand regarding pensions. Let me point out the simple difference between the McGroarty bill and the Townsend plan. In dollars and cents it amounts to $137 per month less per individual pensioner than he expects, or has been led to expect, under the Townsend plan.

It is doubtful if the McGroarty bill could possibly pay over $33 per month per pensioner.

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I cannot yield at the moment, but I will be pleased to yield in a few minutes.

We, the Members from Michigan, regardless of political affiliation, have something to work for. I was led to believe that the Michigan old-age-pension law allowed a maximum for pensioners of $30 per month. I figured that by adding the Federal allowance of $15 per month, an aged pensioner could receive a sum of $45, or $90 for an aged couple. Now I find that the Michigan law will pay the maximum of $30, including the Federal allowance. Michigan's law should be amended to pay by itself not less than $30, to which should be added the allowance from the social security funds.

I will discard all politics and work with any and all Michigan Congressmen for these and other liberalizations in accordance with a plan which I will discuss upon this floor at the first opportunity.

I invite your nonpartisan cooperation. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. AMLIE].

Mr. AMLIE. Mr. Chairman, according to recent figures put out by the American Federation of Labor, we have had something over 12,000,000 unemployed during the past 5 years and something over 11,000,000 unemployed during the past 6 years. Throughout the country the feeling is growing with the people that the situation we face is a chronic one; that we may expect to see a continuation of this degree of unemployment for an indeterminable period into the future. Here in the House the feeling still persists as it did 4 years ago that this is a temporary depression and that before long prosperity will return, everyone will be given employment, and the necessity for relief will end.

I do not believe there is any justification for this hope, and I believe we should begin to take general notice of the fact that what we are facing today is what we are going to face next year and the year after that.

Since the depression began we have had an increase in output per man-hour in manufacturing, generally conceded to be in excess of 30 percent. This means we could return to the industrial activity of 1929 and still have eight or ten million people unemployed. As a matter of fact, we could return to that degree of industrial activity and instead of employing the seventeen and a half million workers that were employed at that time, we could turn out the same quantity of manufactured goods with 12,300,000 workers.

If we assume that the technological advance will go on during the next 6 years as it has during the past 6 years, we could then achieve the industrial output of 1929 with only 8,610,000 workers.

This situation, it seems to me, presents a problem that is going to remain with us a long time. These 11,000,000 or 12,000,000 people are unemployed today, and they are going to be unemployed indefinitely into the future, even though we have a return to the industrial activity of 1929. As a matter of fact, last December, January, and February we had achieved substantially the normal industrial activity that prevailed during the years 1923, 1924, 1925, and 1926.

So, in a sense, prosperity has returned, but we still continue to have 11,000,000 or 12,000,000 people unemployed.

Prosperity has returned from another standpoint. Not long ago, a financial writer, John T. Flynn, gave the figures of profits covering some 388 corporations.

During the first 6 months of 1933 these corporations earned $77,000,000.

During the first 6 months of 1934 they earned $380,000,000.

During the first 6 months of 1935 they earned $435,000,000.

I have a brother-in-law who returned recently after spending a year in England, and he tells me that the economists he met there were all talking about one thing, and that was the great American boom.

These economists are perfectly right. We are in this country having a boom through increased industrial activity and increased profits; and, as a result, the securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange have increased from $32,000,000,000 to $51,000,000,000 in the course of a year and a half.

But we still have 12,000,000 people unemployed at the present time, and barring another world war, these people are going to remain unemployed. It seems to me high time that the Congress of the United States, both parties represented here—the two major parties—ought to recognize that this unemployment will remain with us indefinitely into the future.

I recall the first session of the Seventy-second Congress. We had up to that time proceeded on the theory that if we let nature take its course, eventually we would snap out of the depression.

The philosophy was abandoned when we enacted the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law. Those of you who were here at that time remember the tremendous amount of pressure that was brought to bear by the business interests, who were unwilling, apparently, to take the same medicine which they had insisted upon for the unemployed, when they realized that the deflationary process was injuring them also. Under President Hoover the Reconstruction Finance Corporation loaned almost $3,000,000,000 to bail out "busted" bankers and businessmen.

The election of 1932 gave the answer of the American people to the effect that they did not intend to work out of the depression by following the policy of deflation to its logical conclusion.

Under Mr. Roosevelt we have abandoned the idea that we can work out of the depression by following a deflationary course. Outside of a few responsible men like Senator CARTER GLASS and H. Parker Willis, I really cannot think of anyone who at that time believed that we could go on with a program of deflation.

Since the decision was made, made with the agreement of a great majority of the American people, to embark on a program of spending, it seems to me the thing to consider is how can we spend money. The Government could, for instance, have gone ahead and built permanent buildings of one kind and another, such as is proposed by the Public Works Administration, but this kind of program of course encountered objection by business for the reason that every expenditure for permanent buildings today adds to the tax load in the future in the form of maintenance expense for those buildings. Probably 10 or 20 percent of the money expended now would be reflected in permanent carrying charges each year in the future. For that reason we find business quite generally opposed to permanent expenditures of this kind.

There is another thing which I have advocated and which I believe should be done. In February a year and a half ago, I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the figures from the F. E. R. A., showing the cost of giving relief on various bases. In December 1934, it cost $165,000,000 a month to take care of the unemployed, with 42 percent of the people at made work. That was the figure of the F. E. R. A., that if we would but do away with made work and put people on the straight dole, which has now become the Republican program, the same kind of relief could be given for $130,000,000 a month; or if we were to do away with retail purchasing and buy everything on a wholesale basis and distribute it to the unemployed through a commissary system, it could be done for $92,000,000 a month, but if the unemployed were to be given the opportunity to go to work supplying their own needs, the figures of the F. E. R. A. indicated that they could then be given the same standard of living for $60,000,000 a month, that now costs $165,000,000 a month. This report went on to say that if that amount were increased from $60,000,000 a month to $78,000,000 a month, it would be possible to increase the living standard of the people on relief by 35 to 40 percent, bringing people on relief a higher standard of living than that normally enjoyed by people employed in industry.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AMLIE. Yes.

Mr. THURSTON. The gentleman made some reference to the Republican policy, which of course is not admitted or supported by the Republican organization, but I ask the gentleman if he believes that the policies and remedies of the Democratic Party of free trade, low tariff, or reciprocal tariffs will serve to employ these ten or twelve million people who are unemployed.

Mr. AMLIE. I do not believe it is possible to reduce tariffs during a period of economic retraction, regardless of what my viewpoint might be in time of prosperity. I think we are all agreed that it is impossible in times like these to do any such thing.

Mr. THURSTON. Then the gentleman is in favor of tariffs in distressed times, but not in fair weather?

Mr. AMLIE. I would want to take more time than we have now to answer such a question, but it is impossible to reduce tariffs in times like these, regardless of what my philosophy might have been 20 years ago under different circumstances.

The figures I have given were also put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Senator Bronson Cutting shortly before he died; in the form of a letter written by Jacob Baker, Assistant Relief Administrator.

But when the proposal is made to put the unemployed to work, business immediately objects upon the ground that it is interfering with business. The point I make is that if we can give people on relief the same standard of living for $60,000,000 that is costing $165,000,000 a month, then let us be frank and recognize that at least $105,000,000 a month is a dole to business and not to the unemployed. I am willing to defend the proposition that of the money that has been spent up to this time either as charity expenditures or in the form of loans of one kind and another, aggregating almost $20,000,000,000—some has been repaid—the great bulk of that has gone as a dole to business and not to the unemployed. Business has gotten more out of this administration than the unemployed; and if people here are really sincere in saying that boondoggling demoralizes the unemployed—and I am inclined to agree with them—none of us would get any satisfaction in going out and doing with a pick and shovel what we know could be done for one-tenth of the cost with a steam shovel; still, if we really believe these people are willing to work, why not give them this opportunity to contribute their own labor toward their own support? I am sure the unemployed would get great satisfaction out of that, and we could reduce the amount of relief expenditures by more than half. In the meantime I think we should also recognize that most of this money is going as a dole to business and is not going as a dole to the unemployed.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AMLIE. Yes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Beside the benefit that business is getting as a dole, would the gentleman make some observation as to the standards of living on which the unemployed are maintained today?

Mr. AMLIE. I can give a statement by Dr. Walter R. Campbell, of the department of medicine of the University of Toronto, at the American Medical Association convention at Atlantic City last year, in which he said:

> Twenty-five million of the unemployed in Canada and the United States are in danger of becoming unemployable by eating a relief diet too high in carbohydrates and too low in proteins for reasons of economy. Much emphasis has been placed on the economy of starch calories as opposed to fat calories, which are relatively expensive. Unemployment diets are tending to run high in carbohydrates. * * * The apparently inevitable degradation from unemployment to unemployable should not be accelerated by a falsely economical provision of foodstuffs.

I notice in the gentleman's own city last fall there was a report by Dr. Smith, assistant director of health education, stating that lack of sufficient food had wasted bodies and sapped the mental vigor of more than a hundred thousand school children until they can no longer keep up with their better-fed classmates in school work. In the elementary schools on Manhattan Island there are 125,000 seriously undernourished youngsters.

Incidentally I might say that the percentage of sickness among people on relief ranges anywhere from 25 to 60 percent higher than among people who are not on relief. So it is only too apparent that people are not getting enough to maintain their health.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. AMLIE] has again expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. AMLIE. Because business objects to the spending of money for permanent public works, and objects to spending money for permitting the unemployed to contribute their own labor toward their own support, there remain only two possible alternatives, and they are the dole on the one hand and boondoggling on the other. I think it is a disgrace in the year 1936 if the American people are going to be given the opportunity merely to choose between those two alternatives represented by the Republican Party and the dole on the one hand and the Democratic Party and boondoggling on the other. As a choice between those two evils, and that is apparently the choice, I want to say that under the old deal the average relief was only $8 a month per family. By October 1933 it had gone up to $17.22. In January 1935 it had reached a high of $30.30. Then it began to slip. In September 1935 it was back to $25.90. Under the W. P. A. approximately three and one-half million people last year, during the current year, were working at $50 a month. A million and a half more could have qualified, but the appropriation was not sufficient to take care of them.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I take this time to make a suggestion to the Committee on Appropriations. This bill was reported today. I hold in my hand the hearings covering 2,000 pages and more. The bill itself contains over 100 pages. There is much information in these hearings. We are sitting as a jury, presumed to decide a case, and the evidence is found in 2,000 printed pages which was not available—not obtainable by a single member of the jury—until we commenced consideration.

We talk about debate, and much is said about debate not being confined to the bill. Who is going to be able to talk about what is in these 2,000 printed pages when he has had no opportunity to know what the evidence is? It seems to me that the Committee on Appropriations, which follows this custom continuously, should change the custom. In other words, a bill is brought in appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars, yet the facts which are known only to that committee, cannot be obtained by a Member of the House who must pass upon the bill before we vote.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. It does seem to me that common sense would dictate that if Congress is to render anything approaching deliberate judgment, it should at least be given the evidence in printed form, possibly 24 hours, in any event, before they begin consideration. It may be said, of course, that we will have time to read the hearings before we vote, but it is a physical impossibility to read the hearings and remain on the floor. In other words, if a Member of the House took the hearings which were delivered to us at the very hour when this bill was called up for consideration, and retired to his room and read all day and all night continuously, he might have digested, in a general way, this information.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not understand just what the gentleman's complaint is. What are we doing that the gentleman thinks we should not do?

Mr. MICHENER. I do not think you should bring a bill of this importance before the Congress without any information available to the Congress. The rules of the House and the custom of the House contemplate that the committee in charge shall hold hearings. Those hearings are printed for a purpose, and the purpose is that the House may read them and know what they are going to be asked to vote upon. The hearings are printed to be used by the House in reaching a conclusion and not to be filed away on a shelf.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman knows the bill is here by the unanimous consent of the House?

Mr. MICHENER. That is another thing. The bill is here by unanimous consent of the House. We did an unusual thing today. The chairman of the committee did a very unusual thing. He asked that all points of order be waived. When I had the temerity to suggest it was unusual, I was advised that the majority had the power, that you had the Rules Committee upstairs, and that if we did not consent to the unanimous-consent request, you would use the Rules Committee, you would use the power, and you would do it anyway. Therefore, any consideration asked for would only mean delay. Of course, not wanting to delay, I withdrew my objection, and we are here by unanimous consent.

We have a bill here that has many things in it which violate the rules of the House and we are estopped from raising points of order because we consented not to raise them under a threat of the use of power if we did not consent.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is no different from what the custom has always been. The gentleman knows the bill is here in the regular course that every appropriation bill has been introduced here for years.

Mr. MICHENER. No.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman should recall this fact——

Mr. MICHENER. I cannot yield to the gentleman, for I have such limited time.

Mr. WOODRUM. I will yield the gentleman some time if he wants more. The gentleman has colleagues on the Appropriations Committee—and we all rely on our colleagues—who are distinguished, able, vigorous, and active gentlemen. They are entirely satisfied with what is being done. It seems to me the gentleman's complaint is rather farfetched.

Mr. MICHENER. I do not agree that the distinguished, able—I forget the other adjectives the gentleman applied to the minority members of the committee—are entirely satisfied. If they are entirely satisfied, then I think it is time the House assert itself.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. Does the gentleman know how many millions of dollars are involved in this bill?

Mr. MICHENER. No; I cannot say; and I would like to ask the chairman of this committee why it is no bills are available. Since 12:30 this afternoon, 1 hour after the House convened its session, I tried to get a copy of the bill, the bill I am to be asked to vote on and that all Members are to be asked to vote on. It is not obtainable now and has not been since 12:30 this afternoon. I do not know whether a lesser number than usual was printed—I do not know what became of the bills, but I do know that I have no bill and that other Members have been unable to get copies of the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WOODRUM. Is there any doubt in the gentleman's mind that he is going to vote for the bill?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. There is doubt in the gentleman's mind?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; I happen to be one of those Members who, as a rule, wants to know what is in a bill before he votes for it. I have just told the gentleman I have not seen the bill. I do not know what is in it. I cannot get a copy of the bill, yet the gentleman asks if there is any doubt that I am going to vote for it.

Mr. WOODRUM. I hand the gentleman a copy of the bill right now.

Mr. MICHENER. I thank the gentleman; but I do want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that a custom has apparently grown up in the House, at least on the majority side, that majority Members are expected to follow these vigilant leaders to whom the gentleman referred; and the gentleman is surprised that I have the boldness to say I have not made up my mind whether I am going to vote for a bill which I do not know anything about. The custom of which I speak has become entirely too common. Too many Members are voting for bills they never read, bills they have no opportunity to read. They follow their distinguished leader, my good friend; and he is a very splendid gentleman, an affable gentleman, a good leader, but I sometimes pity him in the position he is in. At times he blushes, but he goes along; but the time is not far distant when the back of the gentleman will be calloused by the party Whip to such an extent that the sting will not be felt longer and he will again exert himself in the splendid manhood which he heretofore has displayed.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman like a little more time?

Mr. TABER. I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. I did not get a definite answer to the last inquiry I made of the gentleman from Michigan, namely, whether he knew how many millions were involved in this bill; and if he does not know, can he tell us how we may find out?

Mr. MICHENER. Answering the gentleman from Massachusetts, I would say that I have finally succeeded, through the generosity of the chairman of this committee, in getting a copy of the bill which I hold in my hand.

Mr. TREADWAY. Does it say in it how many millions of dollars are involved?

Mr. MICHENER. I do not know. I am going to retire to the cloakroom and look at the bill and find out how much is in it; and I suggest to some of the other gentlemen who have not been able to get a copy of the bill, but who want to know what is in it, if they will come to me I will lend them this bill so they can find out what they are going to be asked to vote for in a little while.

Mr. TREADWAY. What I want to know from the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Chairman, if he does not know how many millions are involved, whether it is not a fact that more millions are involved than there are Members on the floor at this moment.

Mr. MICHENER. There are about 50 Members here at the moment.

Mr. TREADWAY. No; about 25.

Mr. MICHENER. I do not know. Let us say 25 to 50.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question ?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield. I would like to look at the gentleman's bill. I have been trying since 12 o'clock to get a copy of it, but have not got one yet.

In conclusion let me remind you of the importance of this measure. It furnishes the money to carry on the social-security program. It provides relief for the destitute and the unemployed for the coming year in addition to the usual deficiency appropriation bill items. Yet as the Members of the House, we are now debating the merits or demerits of this proposed legislation; and yet as Members of the House, we are unable to secure copies of the bill. Of course, intelligent debate cannot be indulged in by any excepting the few members on the Appropriations Committee who are familiar with the facts. This whole practice is wrong, and I for one shall continue to protest against such procedure. There is no legitimate reason why hearings containing the facts, which are the basis for the appropriation, should be withheld from the membership until this late hour. Possibly knowledge of the contents of the hearing will provoke debate. Surely the Members will have more knowledge about the provisions of the bill. The responsibility for this legislation rests on the individual membership, and that membership should not be denied access to all of the facts, even though those facts are available to the committee members.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS].

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, in common with the gentleman from Massachusetts, of course, we all realize that in times like this, some provision must be made to care for those within our Nation who are unfortunate enough to be unemployed. We realize that we cannot cut off appropriations to care for those people, and I am sure that very few, if any, of us have any desire to do so. But when I look over this bill, which is called a deficiency appropriation bill, to my mind it is badly deficient with respect to that part of the appropriation which is made in order to provide work for the unemployed. It is sadly deficient in the fundamental principle which should be back of legislation of this kind.

Mr. Chairman, we all realize that under present conditions we must provide a public-works program for the relief of our unemployed. During the past 3 years we have been reemploying men at a rapid rate, but labor-saving machinery has been almost as effective in displacing labor as we are at reemploying it. We all agree that we cannot allow our unemployed to go hungry or be in want for clothing or shelter. The dole is unthinkable. We must provide work until industry can absorb our unemployed.

Mistakes are, of course, inevitable. The disgrace in a mistake is making the same one twice. We must not repeat our mistake in W. P. A. We must not make the mistake of allowing this appropriation to go as we did the last one—unearmarked into the hands of a professional spender of other people's money.

Unemployment may be a national problem, but reemployment is a local problem. To solve it requires something more than bureaucratic theory. It requires a practical consideration of the conditions in each locality. Conditions vary so greatly in different localities that no blanket set of administrative rulings can apply effectively. Spring, summer, and fall in a rural community, when farm labor is in demand, offers much more chance of seasonal employment than does the same season in a city. In order to function effectively and economically a reemployment program must be flexible, otherwise a great deal of money will be spent for useless projects. In my district under the W. P. A. a great deal of money has been unwisely spent which should have been wisely spent. Too much of it has gone to useless projects and the taxpayers are grumbling. They have a right to grumble. Let no one believe that they do not pay their share of taxes, whether they pay them directly or not. Even the W. P. A. worker pays these taxes, and the smaller the income the greater proportion of it goes for taxes.

Gangs of W. P. A. workers were used to scrape down the slopes of the banks along the roads. In many places the sod was taken off the banks above back as far as the fence posts. The hard winter and the rainy spring brought these slopes down onto the berme. The money had been so foolishly spent as to make necessary the spending of more to repair the damage caused. If the program had been elastic enough, this money could have been applied to building roads of native stone, which would have gone a long way toward taking the farmers out of the mud. I venture to say that the money wasted upon useless projects and that which has been paid out in doles in my district would have done away with every dirt road in my district. Then it would not have been wasted and would still have furnished employment.

In another section of my district the Monongahela River is carrying away much valuable land at certain spots. Not far away are cliffs overhanging the road from which rocks fall and menace all traffic. If the W. P. A. program was as flexible, as it should be, these cliffs could be sloped back and the stone taken from them could be used to revet the river banks at those places where the serious erosion is taking place.

The ideal way to provide for relief and reemployment is to do so locally.

Mr. AMLIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. AMLIE. In 13 States which cannot raise money this would amount to a death sentence so far as the unemployed are concerned?

Mr. FADDIS. I cannot see why one State cannot raise money the same as other States. The unemployment load is practically the same within States. It is a fact that the constitutions of the States prohibit them from raising money. These States where the constitution does not prohibit them from raising money do raise their share of it. Until we put relief back into the hands of local authorities the problem will never be solved. [Applause.]

If the taxes were imposed locally, the taxpayers would be more conscious that they come from their pockets and would therefore be more vigilant in watching for racketeering and unwise spending. Every taxpayer would then be an inspector. That system under present conditions would be impossible, as there are many communities which could not raise the taxes. The next best system would be to establish a closer contact between the Federal and local administrators. The best method of doing this is to follow the system of P. W. A. Under P. W. A. we are leaving something behind in the way of permanent improvements which improvements will lessen the local tax burden of the future. The P. W. A. has been the most valuable agency of the Government when it comes to aiding real recovery. It has helped to bring back the so-called heavy industries and has assisted in putting men to work in the natural fields of employment. We are trying to get this Nation back to normal times and as soon as possible discard emergency measures. Let us, therefore, do everything possible to get the unemployed back on industrial pay rolls, where they belong and where they wish to be.

I am quite certain that there is no taxpayer in my district who objects to providing for the unemployed. They do, however, object to spending money upon useless projects, where useful ones can be provided. They, as taxpayers, have the right to object to such practices, and I, as their Representative in Congress, have the right to voice their objections. In fact, it is my duty to do so and to fight for correction of abuses. If I did not do so, I would be false to their trust in me.

This is a nation of representative government, but for years it has been drifting toward a government by bureaucracy. Representatives of the people come to this body and vote taxes to finance the appropriations which they make. The administration of the agencies which handle these appropriations is placed in the hands of bureaucracies over which neither we nor the people have any control. These bureaucracies are not the result of emergency legislation but have been steadily gaining in power for many years. We are held responsible by our constituents for the manner in which this money is spent. It is our responsibility to see that proper restrictions are imposed to insure the wise spending of this money, and if we refuse to shoulder this responsibility, our constituents should defeat us and replace us with those who will do so. [Applause.]

Mistakes will be made, of course, but let them be made by the representatives of the people. The people can talk to their Representatives and through the ballot have a check on them every 2 years. Not even a Representative or a Senator can talk to these arrogant, theoretical, bureaucratic, professional, spenders of other people's money. Drunk with power, they delight in being contemptuous and even insulting toward the duly elected representatives of the people. They are able to prostitute acts of the Congress to their bureaucratic desires and are leading us hell-bent into a bureaucratic dictatorship. If we have no voice in their appointment we have no check upon their actions. We are not legislators but mere writers of checks, with no voice as to the amount.

It is not only our right but our duty to see that, while furnishing employment for the needy, the money shall be expended in a wise manner. It is our duty to throw restrictions around these theoretical bureaucrats. There must be closer contact between Washington and the community in which the money is spent. More responsibility must be placed upon the local administrators.

The administration of the money wrung from the taxpayers must be placed in the hands of men whose training consists of something more than the administration of the affairs of relief agencies for the last 24 years. A man to be qualified to administer relief should have had experience in life which has trained him in the application of practical solutions of the problems of the Nation. To that kind of man, and to that kind only, can we look to to solve our difficulties. These theoretical professional bureaucrats are only interested in bureaucratic expansion and usurpation of more bureaucratic power. They have no notion of solving the problems of the day, because when these problems are solved their bureaucratic power and grandeur is gone.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD].

Mr. LORD. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS], who has just spoken, and it takes my mind back to the early days of relief in New York State before the Federal Government attacked the problem. We made appropriations for relief, and we carried on relief by nonpartisan boards. It was not made a political proposition at that time, and we received from the Red Cross flour, clothing, cotton goods, and almost all kinds of food, and with a small amount of money we were able to take care of our people very well.

When the Democrats came into power they plowed under the wheat, plowed under the cotton, and the people go hungry, or we have to borrow from the Government to take care of them.

To my mind it would have been much better if we had continued to raise wheat and cotton and had taken care of our poor people and not left them starving and cold. I believe now the Government should turn over to the States grants or allotments and let the States administer relief on a nonpartisan basis and carry on the work as we did before the Government took hold of it.

After the Government came in to take care of relief the expense was greater. In some instances as much as 50 percent went for administration. Up in my district they distributed seed potatoes in a country where every farmer had more potatoes than he needed. They brought into one village 400 cases of condensed milk where there were two condenseries right in sight of the place where they unloaded the milk. We also had a Democratic candidate for sheriff, who lost out in election, and they made him the head of the distribution of these foods. They are now paying around $2,500 a year to distribute these commodities that come from the Government, which we had distributed for nothing. I hope we may get away from this political angle and take care of these projects by local nonpartisan committees and that we may have flour distributed by the Red Cross for our people to use and that we may have clothing distributed by the Red Cross. It was always done efficiently then and without expense to the people. The partisan distribution has not been efficient or satisfactory.

Mr. GOODWIN. How about pork?

Mr. LORD. The pigs and sows were destroyed, so we cannot distribute pork any more.

A few days ago I was up in my district and I visited one of our silk mills. The man who is running that mill I have known for some time and he told me he was going out of business in about 4 days. I asked him what the trouble was and he said:

> I am the last of a number of silk mills in the city of Binghamton to go out of business, and the N. R. A. is what put me out of business. We were doing a good business up until the time when the N. R. A. came into vogue and then we raised our prices according to the N. R. A. schedule. Our customers took the orders we had on hand, but when it came to renewing them or reordering from us, we could not get such orders, because they said, "Your price is too high", and they looked elsewhere for the products.

So all of the mills in this one city have gone out of business and many more have gone out of business at other points throughout my district. The President demands that industry put more to work and then hampers and drives business to the wall with legislation like the tax bill that was just passed.

While over in Japan this past fall I visited the textile mills there and I think I found out somewhat the reason for our textile factories going out of business. Over there they work eight and a half hours a day with two shifts a day in these mills. Where they work only one shift, they work ten and a half hours. They work every day in the week, not stopping for Sunday. The wages of the girls who work in these factories amount to about 15 cents a day in our money, or about 50 cents in their money. If our girls were paid 50 cents a day for 8½ hours, it would about compare with their wages. The highest-priced man in these factories receive a yen and a half a day, which would amount to about 45 cents in our money, or $1.50 in our mills. So when they bring this product to this country, as they are doing, we have to compete with these prices, which we are not able to do. They are just flooding the country with their goods and as time goes on we will keep selling less of our goods.

I know there is great agitation in this country for a shorter work week of 30 hours. To my mind if we should establish a 30-hour week, we would be just that much worse off and our customers would buy more and more from Japan. Their business will go along better and we will have less people at work than we have at the present time, the higher prices are, the less people will buy.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LORD. In a moment.

Every time we increase the cost of an article, that article does not meet with as great a demand and there is not as much of it sold. This is the case with silks and with other textiles that come from that country.

I met a buyer for one of the large dry goods stores and he told me that they keep buyers in Japan all the time purchasing for their stores in this country, and that they could buy over there and pay the tariff and get the articles for very much less than they can buy similar goods in this country.

I am for relieving the workingmen in our Nation, but we cannot do it by shortening the hours of labor, so long as Japan and other countries paying much less wages and working nearly twice as many hours have almost free access to our markets.

In Japan everybody works, everybody is doing something. The wages are very small and we do not want our workers to come down to their level of wages; but unless we give business more than a breathing spell, textile industries will continue to go out of business and we will have more and more unemployed.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LORD. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Would the gentleman advocate some degree of greater protection against these imports? I think we should protect American industry, the American workmen against the bringing in of such a flood of imports.

Mr. LORD. The only way that I can see that we can protect American industry is by some tariff law high enough to make up the difference in wages between the countries. We have got to give our workers more protection, not shorter hours. Shorter hours increase prices. If we increase the cost of an article, we lose that much business for the trade goes to where the prices are most favorable. For the good of our workers, we should protect our own markets.

Japan is supplying us at the present time. It is only 3 or 4 years that we have been getting so large a production from that country, and it is, to a great extent, on account of the difference in exchange and living conditions.

The reciprocal agreement with Canada is affecting the farmers of this country adversely and especially the dairy farmer.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I want to say to the gentleman that I opposed the reciprocal tariff.

Mr. LORD. I realize that the gentleman opposed it. I think all of my party are opposed to it, and all those who have the welfare of the dairy farmer at heart. Reciprocal agreements that President Roosevelt has made with Canada, on dairy products, applies alike to all countries and is ruining our farmers. If we could have protection from a country like Japan, especially the manufacturers, we could protect our industry and until such time as we give protection to the farmers and manufacturers we are going to continue to lose business and will have more unemployed on the relief rolls. [Applause.]

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, three incidents closely allied in a program whose purpose is practically identical, and of menacing importance to the people, occured in Washington today.

FIRST EPISODE

Early this morning people who were awake found the red Soviet communistic flag of Russia floating over their Supreme Court Building just across the grounds from the Nation's Capitol. Of that the Washington Evening Star says:

> The red flag of Communist Russia threw its lurid reflection over America's Capital this morning as the rosy-fingered dawn tinted the eastern skies, but a swift marshaling of all the orderly processes of American Government repulsed the threatened upheavel.
> The unfurling, in explanation, occurred on the 80-foot mast of the new Supreme Court Building sometime between 4 and 4:30 a. m. Discovery of this subversive attempt to undermine our great Democracy came as an inquisitive sun peeped over the horizon and inquisitive newsmen responded to a mysterious telephone query as to why the emblem of the hammer and sickle should be casting its benediction over the sacred home of the Nation's highest tribunal.
> Decisive action followed and, after some tall climbing by a fireman armed with a blow torch, the flag went up in smoke and the Republic was returned to a sound basis.
> Capitol Police examined a copy of the Harvard Lampoon discovered at the base of the flagpole. In the magazine, in addition to a few jibes at Yale and Princeton, was an article entitled "Down With Capitalism."
> Discovery of the emblem raised a real problem as building guards found the halyards so skillfully and completely knotted that they resisted all attempts at disentanglement. As in most emergencies of an unusual nature, reliance was placed in the fire department—and not in vain.

A careful investigation is under way, the captain said, in hopes of apprehending ringleaders of the "revolution."

That was one occurrence. That was the way Communists had of showing their contempt for law and orderly government.

SECOND EPISODE

Then the House met at noon, and shortly thereafter there was introduced a report of what is called the Sisson bill, which now is much better known as the "sissy" bill to repeal the law that prevents communism from being indoctrinated in our public schools, which Communists call the "red rider." I want you to read that report. There are more misstatements in it than otherwise. One gross misstatement in it is the assertion that the House and Senate conferees put the "red rider" in the bill in conference. Everyone who knows about legislation or about parliamentary rules and procedure know that that is untrue. That so-called "red rider" never went into the bill until the House itself on this floor by a unanimous vote voted it into the bill, after it had been offered from the floor by Chairman CANNON, and read by the clerk, and until the Senate by a unanimous vote voted it in the bill, after it had been offered from the Senate floor by Senator THOMAS, and read by the Senate clerk, and then voted into the bill by the unanimous vote of the Senate. The conferees had no right to put it in, because it was legislation, and did not put it into the bill. It had to be put in from the floor of the House and the floor of the Senate by the House and the Senate, which was done both by the House and the Senate.

That is the second occurrence. How did the Communists know that the "sissy" bill would be reported today? I did not know it. The Speaker did not know it. It could have been reported any day during the past 20 days.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a minute, if I have time. I want to show you that Communists in New York knew that the "sissy" bill would be reported today, so that you may realize just how closely allied these matters are that are happening here today.

THIRD EPISODE

Here is a mimeographed document that just reached Washington, just came here a few minutes ago, from New York City, and it is not for release until tomorrow in the press. It is "for release Friday, May 8, 1936." It is issued by "The American Civil Liberties Union, of 31 Union Square West, New York City, Roger N. Baldwin, director", at the top, and it is for the press to put in their papers tomorrow.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate is to be confined to the bill and the gentleman is not confining himself to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the gentleman from New York ought not to be so critical. I have allowed the gentleman on several occasions to speak out of order whenever he desired.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I believe in free speech, I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I knew the gentleman would, because free speech is one of the main things for which he stands. I will quote from this "red" document, mimeographed in New York by Roger N. Baldwin's "red" organization, and sent here to go in the newspapers tomorrow. Listen to this:

SUPPORT FOR REPEAL OF THE "RED RIDER" URGED

All organizations and individuals interested in education were urged last week by the academic freedom committee of the American Civil Liberties Union through its secretary, Ellen Donohue, to write at once to the Speaker of the House, JOSEPH W. BYRNS, urging him to permit a vote on the Sisson bill to repeal the so-called "red rider" attached last year to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and forbidding "all teaching of communism" in the Washington schools.

In other words, this was timed to reach Washington on the day that that report was put into the basket, to be printed in the press on the same day—tomorrow—that the report then comes from the Government Printing Office as a printed document available to Members. I ask again, how did these "reds" in New York know this "sissy" bill would be reported today? Who is keeping them posted? Why did all three of these episodes happen today? Communists hoisted their flag over the Supreme Court to flaunt what they call their contempt for this Government, to show their contempt for law and for orderly government, and they had the audacity in the nighttime to put up over the Supreme Court Building of this Nation their infamous red flag of communistic Russia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 minutes more.

Mr. BLANTON. These three episodes today were so closely allied that none of you can laugh them off. This is a vital question that menacingly concerns the home and loved ones of every citizen of the United States. Just this week the great Government of France was taken over by Communists, and people in France who have worked a lifetime acquiring property are turning their property into gold and money and sending it from France across the ocean as fast as they can get it out of France. Do not you think it cannot happen here.

Roger Baldwin, this man at the head of this American Civil Liberties Union, that sends out this infamous document at this time, has served his sentence in the Federal penitentiary during the war, and he is the man who appeared before your Fish committee and testified, without a blush of shame, that he is in favor of taking this Government over by force and violence. He testified that he was willing to commit wholesale murder if it was necessary to do it.

Do not slumber peacefully on in imagined security, gentlemen, until this Government is taken over sometime overnight. Do not wait until your Army and Navy can be communized, before taking action, which would cause the sacrificing of the lives of 100,000 of the flower of American manhood to take this Government back. America must awake. Let us awake, America! [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEITER].

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speakers who have preceded me, and I notice that a great many of the remarks have been of a political nature. Probably for that reason many Members of the House have left the floor. I regret this, not because they will probably miss a mighty good speech, but because of the facts I am about to present to them relative to the Public Works Administration and their program.

Mr. Chairman, when we voted for the first $3,300,000,000 public-works appropriation in June of 1933 we did so under the impression that most of it would be used to finance local public works in our home towns, counties, cities, and States. I know there was nothing in the law providing that the money should be used for that purpose but that is what we believed.

When we voted for the second appropriation in June of 1934 we were under the same impression.

And when we voted for the $4,880,000,000 appropriation in the spring of 1935 we still believed that a large share of it would go to make loans and grants on local public projects through the Public Works Administration; but it has not turned out that way at all.

I have been so much interested in this matter that I have given considerable time to studying the records of the Public Works Administration to determine just what use has been made of the money we appropriated in the belief that a large proportion of it would be used to aid our home communities in building the local improvements that they so badly needed.

I found that only $421,728,000, or between 12 and 13 percent, of the first $3,300,000,000 appropriation for Public Works construction was used for loans and grants on 3,925 public improvements built by cities, towns, counties, and States.

The remaining $2,878,272,000 was used for other purposes.

One-half of it, or $1,442,348,000 to be exact, was allocated to the departments of the Federal Government and used for purposes for which Congress always had in the past appropriated money in the regular appropriation bills.

Another $1,187,630,000 was divided among C. W. A., C. C. C., the Farm Credit Administration, the A. A. A., N. R. A., and many other alphabetical agencies. The Emergency Relief Administration got $114,000,000 in the spring of 1935 to augment funds appropriated to it for direct relief.

Most of the remaining $248,294,000 was used for loans to railroads.

Now, I realize that this $2,878,272,000 out of the original $3,300,000,000 public-works appropriation that was allocated to the Federal departments and for the other purposes I have named all went to create employment and increase purchasing power. I do not complain against it on the ground that it did not accomplish those purposes.

But I am complaining that only $421,728,000 of it was used for loans and grants to enable the local communities in our districts to build the things they so badly need.

I know that warships, for which $238,000,000 was allotted to the Navy Department by the President from the first public-works appropriation, are essential for our national defense. But I also know that school houses are just as essential for promoting the general welfare of my constituents as warships are necessary to provide for their national defense.

And I have found in my study of the statistics of the Public Works Administration that only $88,504,000 was loaned and granted to local communities from the first public-works appropriation to build 830 secondary-school projects.

Considering the danger of war that everybody recognizes today, I do not think the $238,000,000 allocation for warships was excessive, but I do think the amount of money loaned and granted for school construction was too small. We ought to remedy that now by making further appropriations to continue the making of loans and grants.

Lighthouses and channel markers are essential for the safety of travelers at sea and on our lakes and rivers. More than five and a half millions of dollars was allotted to the Bureau of Lighthouses of the Department of Commerce from the first public-works appropriation. But garbage and rubbish disposal plants help to promote the general welfare of our constituents. And I find that only $4,762,000 was allotted for that purpose by the Public Works Administration from the first appropriation.

In the beginning, Secretary Ickes himself anticipated that a much greater amount of the first appropriation would be used for loans and grants to our local communities to help them build the things they need and want. In a speech made shortly after he was named Public Works Administrator, he said that he expected approximately $1,750,000,000 would be used for that purpose.

But the whittling down process of allocating the money to the regular departments and alphabetical agencies of the Government went on and on. The stick got shorter and shorter. And now we find that Mr. Ickes' estimate of $1,750,000,000 for loans and grants for public-works projects for our constituents has dwindled down to $421,728,000.

When we passed the $4,880,000,000 appropriation last spring we thought that at least $900,000,000 of it would be used for loans and grants made through the Public Works Administration to the local communities in our districts. And what happened? The records of the Public Works Administration show that only $328,345,465 was used for grants on 4,110 projects in our home communities. This was about 6 percent of the total appropriation.

P. W. A. received applications for thousands of loans and grants that it could not make. Only the other day Secretary Ickes sent up to the Senate, in response to a resolution requesting the information, a list of 6,801 applications for loans and grants totaling $2,659,000,000 for which no funds are now available.

Some communities in my district are on that list. I know the need of the citizens of those communities for the projects for which they have applied for loans and grants. They made their application in good faith, believing that they had a chance to get the money. They went to considerable trouble to make up their applications, and undoubtedly have been put to considerable expense in getting up plans and making other preliminary preparations.

Other communities in my district have received loans and grants, and it looks unfair to me to say to those whose applications have not yet been acted on that we will now stop appropriating money to aid in the construction of local public works. That looks like discrimination to me.

It not only looks like discrimination to me but it is discrimination.

The first to last, out of the money made available to it by congressional appropriation and the operation of its revolving fund, the Public Works Administration has made loans and grants totaling $1,250,092,000 on 8,035 local projects in our home communities. I do not know how many communities have projects, but it is less than 8,000 because there are many projects in each of a considerable number of towns and cities. Perhaps if a count of communities instead of projects was made, there would be between six and seven thousand of our towns, cities, and counties where projects are being built.

The P. W. A. has been of tremendous assistance to industry. The construction dollar has a gigantic effect. It reaches practically every niche and corner of our country. It multiplies the business created two and a half to three times that of the original transaction and furnishes a tremendous amount of indirect as well as direct labor. The abrupt discontinuance of this program would be like kicking the props out from under a bridge before the foundation had properly set.

States, cities, counties, villages in your districts and mine demand the approval of their projects.

Besides furnishing employment for men in occupations for which they have been trained, construction work offers a great source of income to Government. You are all familiar with the revenues received from the many industries furnishing material for construction, but I wonder if you realize the large amount of taxes paid by the contractor. I know I did not until recently. For instance, I have the figures of a highway contract let by the State of Ohio on August 13, 1935, for the sum of approximately $74,000. These show that the contractor paid $4,075.86 in compensation and taxes of one form or another for that job alone. This amounts to 5½ percent of the contract. Furthermore, it does not include the levy for old-age pension and unemployment insurance, which amounts to approximately 2½ percent for the coming fiscal year and subsequently rises to 9 percent.

This represents an important income to Government from contractors which few people realize, and which would be lost if the Federal Government prosecuted the work by force account rather than the P. W. A. system on a contract basis. Assuming the same percentage applies to other States, a $700,000,000 P. W. A. program, resulting in $1,550,000,000 in construction, would result in approximately $73,000,000 income to Government agencies of one form or another from contractors alone.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEITER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I notice the gentleman mentioned a figure of $70,000,000. Is that the figure that he has in mind for the P. W. A.?

Mr. BEITER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman propose that Congress at this time appropriate $700,000,000 additional funds for P. W. A.?

Mr. BEITER. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Or would he earmark the relief bill that is to come before the House this week?

Mr. BEITER. I propose to earmark the bill that is before the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I had understood that a movement was started in that respect, but that the gentleman had changed his mind and would offer an amendment to provide for additional funds instead of earmarking the relief funds.

Mr. BEITER. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am very much interested in the gentleman's statement. There are several P. W. A. projects in my own district that have been tentatively approved. P. W. A. projects with which I am familiar are splendid projects.

Mr. BEITER. And probably that same community has gone to considerable expense to prepare plans and specifications, hire architects, and possibly pay attorneys to present the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is true, and such communities are left in a very embarrassing position, because my people were led to believe they would get the P. W. A. funds and at least in one or two instances went to the expense and trouble of voting bonds.

Mr. BEITER. And probably in an adjoining community or town a Public Works project has been in operation and that community has already had allocation made to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Well, there are several such places, I would say.

Mr. BEITER. In addition to this, social security taxation for the fiscal year on direct and indirect labor amounts to approximately $32,000,000. This brings a total income from contractors and social security taxation of at least $100,000,000. This is one-seventh of the amount requested for P. W. A. and is returned indirectly to the Government. If the work were conducted other than by contract, however, most of the fund would be lost, as the Government does not tax itself.

Right along this same thought comes that of compensation. When the Government prosecutes relief work directly through force-account methods, it is responsible for personal liability and property damage. It is estimated by the United States Employees' Compensation Commission that compensation for workers alone, excluding the vast amount of claims for property damage, amounts to $1 per $100 of the estimated pay roll, or $18,000,000 for the present program. At the same rate this would equal another $15,000,000 for the proposed relief program. In contract work, however, compensation and property-damage insurance is carried by the contractor, relieving the Federal Government of all liability and incidentally creating an additional market in insurance values.

It is no wonder that our constituents and our vast industries request P. W. A. support. Particularly so because, in spite of this, the contractor, by reason of his experience, organization, and efficiency, can do a piece of work cheaper than can be done by inexperienced Government agencies. Furthermore, the savings in contract work is not lost to labor—it is passed on—making possible the construction of other jobs which in turn employ workers directly and indirectly. Instead of having one piece of work completed inefficiently and in an unworkmanlike manner, more work is done in an efficient manner. Men are placed to work in their proper trades, and projects are completed which are of great benefit to the sponsor and a credit to the Federal Government.

As a further proof of the indirect beneficial effect of public works, I have secured a break-down of the construction cost of a group of buildings for the Department of Labor, Interstate Commerce Commission, and Post Office Department, Washington, D. C. I have purposely taken these buildings as they are constructed in a community of few industries and have given rise to the question, by some who have not studied the problem, as to what material benefits the construction of these works has been to labor.

The buildings cost $21,000,000. The surprising part of this is that only $3,000,000 was actually spent in the District of Columbia; the remaining $18,000,000 went to 28 different States and placed men to work furnishing the material and equipment for these buildings, as, for example:

Indiana received	$2,500,000
Michigan received	1,100,000
New York received	1,125,000
Virginia received	1,000,000
Pennsylvania received	2,500,000

With your permission I shall include in the Appendix a complete break-down by States, showing the far-reaching facts of this local expenditure.

In addition, since these sums only represent direct orders for finished products, there were still further transactions necessary for the securing and transportation of raw materials. These transactions spread throughout the United States like the branches of a mighty river and extend back through many smaller rivers, streams, and brooks to a multitude of individual sources. And, as the water passing through these various channels does work on the way to the resultant river, so the various feeders of industry supply work in converting and transferring the raw materials to the finished product.

It is such a natural course of events that I fail to see how anyone can be unappreciative of the value of indirect employment in stimulating recovery and relieving the unemployment situation.

In regard to the employment directly on the site, I would like to leave this important thought with you. Given a definite job to do, a contractor or a Government agency can only efficiently employ a certain number of men, and in either case this number is approximately the same. The truth in this statement lies in the word "efficiency." It may be justifiable in some cases to sacrifice some efficiency on the site in order to create additional employment, but there is, or at least there should be, a definite limit to this sacrifice. Otherwise our citizens become disgusted with the manner in which the work is prosecuted and the morale of the men on work relief becomes completely broken, not only while they are on that particular work but for the future as well. They see in a force account job their fellow workers doing one-half to one-quarter of what should be done in a day. Then immediately say to themselves: "Why should I work, either? No one else is taking interest in this work. This project when completed is certainly going to be of no credit to me. They have been trifling with that rock excavation for weeks, just throwing money away, when a shot of dynamite and a power shovel for a day or two would complete the excavation and make way for us to get down to doing the real job at hand." This soon makes a shirker and a slacker out of a man; in addition, through lack of proper practice in his trade his skill is lost and a lackadaisical attitude implanted in him soon becomes a habit. The ultimate effect of this demoralization of our former industrious workers is at the present time unknown. Only the future will divulge the effects.

It is things like this which are easily eliminated in contract work. No one wants them to occur. You and I do not, and neither does the W. P. A. Nevertheless, it does happen in thousands and thousands of cases which are not under contract.

The difference of 36 percent between the sponsors' contribution of 55 percent for P. W. A. projects and 19 percent for force account work is more than adequate to care for any justifiable inefficiency in construction procedure. Certainly the evidence has been submitted to you regarding the definite benefit to indirect labor and industry warrants the purchase of additional material for durable public works.

The permanency of the projects and their future benefits to society should be an important consideration when computing the man-year cost. It is perfectly obvious that a slightly higher man-year cost for a project which is going to benefit society for 30 years is warranted over other projects, the life of which is 5 years. For example: The average life of P. W. A. projects is from 30 to 70 years. This would make the yearly amortization cost per man-year for the principal investment equal to one-thirtieth of the original man-year cost, or $615 for direct and indirect labor divided by 30, or only $20.50 per year. In order to get a comparison with this for less permanent work let us take the example of a low-class roadway. The road may be rough, graded by hand, and the roadbed built of local run-of-bank gravel obtained from a public-owned pit. The construction of this road would require practically no other material and consequently furnish no indirect labor. Eliminating foremen, the road could be built with all common labor. Now, for a simple example, assume that labor receives $50 per month, which equals an annual cost to Federal Government of $600.

The life of this project would hardly exceed 1 year. The first winter and spring thaws would probably render the surface impassable. But, for the sake of argument, say the life is 5 years. Now, by dividing 600 by 5 years, the cost per man-year is computed as equally as $120 compared with $20.50 for the average P. W. A. project. In other words, this poor-class road having a 5-year life, requiring all common labor at $600 per year, cost on the yearly basis nearly six times as much as the average P. W. A. type of construction.

That certainly is proof enough that P. W. A. projects which cost practically the same as other types of projects when direct and indirect labor is considered are ultimately vastly more reasonable. [Applause.]

The estimated cost of $21,000,000 for the architectural service, and construction of the group of buildings for the Department of Labor, Interstate Commerce Commission, and Post Office Department Building in Washington, D C. The employment population benefited covers many classes, not only those occupied in various building trades and in manufacture of building materials, but also many of the "white collar" type, such as clerks, salesmen, draftsmen, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEITER] has expired.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COLE].

RESETTLEMENT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Chairman, on May 1 there was laid on our desks the first report of one of the New Deal agencies which has quietly been going about its business of making over America by bringing to us the Utopia that is the promised goal of those who are most outspoken in their attacks upon the American system. Although the agency has been in existence for a full year, the report is termed an "interim report" and not a full report as many of us would like to have had and feel entitled to have received. The explanation given by the Administrator for not giving a complete report to Congress is that "we should prefer not to stop in such a busy time for reporting; we should prefer to wait until the program is more complete."

I speak of the Resettlement Administration, headed by that most energetic and well-known but impractical and visionary thinker of the New Deal, Rexford G. Tugwell. He it was, you will recall, who once wrote, "I shall roll up my sleeves and make over America" and, as recently as the fall of 1935, said, "We must make irrevocable political commitment to disciplined democracy, to calculated change of institutions." Perhaps in his latter statement he took his cue from Mussolini, who told the world 13 years ago that the first thing he would do as head of the government would be "to enforce discipline, discipline, discipline."

"Disciplined democracy"—what could Mr. Tugwell have meant when he used that expression? Being the highly educated person that he is we must believe that he uses words which will express his thoughts as accurately as our language will permit. An examination of the word discipline reveals that it is to instruct, to educate, to inform, to train the mind by instruction, and also means to regulate, to govern, and to keep in subjection. Surely if Mr. Tugwell had intended to say that our objective in government was an "instructed" or an "educated" or an "informed" democracy, he would have said so and no one would have taken exception to it. In fact, an enlightened democracy has been the goal of our people since the beginning of our Government and its achievement is one of the most wholesome characteristics of a sound and secure Government of and by the people. We have not quickly forgotten the memorable words of George Washington who said, "In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened." But Dr. Tugwell did not mean that the desired accomplishment was an informed democracy or an educated society; it was to be a disciplined democracy.

Most of us have a pretty fair idea of the meaning of democracy, although the word in recent years has been greatly abused. We understand that democracy is a system of government under which all of us have the same rights and privileges and opportunities, and we know that it is a government of persons selected by ourselves who are committed to work for us and protect our rights and interests. With this understanding of democracy, it is rather difficult to absorb in our minds the full meaning of a disciplined democracy, a regulated democracy, a subjected democracy. How, we ask, can we continue to be democratic but at the same time be regulated and regimented and controlled as Mr. Tugwell seems to say we must be? The term is self-contradictory; democracy and the kind of discipline Mr. Tugwell has in mind cannot travel along the same course, and, unless I am greatly mistaken, the American people prefer their freedom of government and in government than to live under the restrictive rules and regulations of a paternalistic government.

Let us take a look at this agency through which Dr. Tugwell is going to remake America. Certainly Congress had nothing to do with the creation of the Resettlement Administration, has no control over it, and the Administration is not accountable to Congress for any of its activities. Small wonder that the "interim report" to Congress is so full of generalities and reports so little. Even though the representatives of the people had no voice in its creation, yet we find that it directs the lives of hundreds of thousands of our people whose income and outgo and whose activities of everyday life are planned for them by the managerial staff of the Resettlement Administration.

It will be recalled that the President was given $4,000,000,000 with which to relieve unemployment by the exercise of almost unlimited powers. He in turn, by Executive order, gave to Dr. Tugwell broad and unlimited powers and a considerable portion of the fund with which to carry out Dr. Tugwell's ideas. The first Executive order, dated April 30, 1935, gave the Resettlement Administration these powers:

(a) To administer approved projects involving resettlement of destitute or low-income families from rural and urban areas, including the establishment, maintenance, and operation, in such connection, of communities in rural and suburban areas.

(b) To initiate and administer a program of approved projects with respect to soil erosion, stream pollution, seacoast erosion, reforestation, forestation, and flood control.

(c) To make loans as authorized under the said Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 to finance, in whole or in part, the purchase of farm lands and necessary equipment by farmers, farm tenants, croppers, or farm laborers.

In September of that year a further Executive order was issued repeating the paragraphs just given but adding to the second paragraph these four seemingly harmless but highly significant words, "and other useful projects." Thus Tugwell was empowered to initiate and administer almost any kind of program under the sun, and, what is more, he was given the wherewithal to do it.

According to the "interim report" the functions of the administration are segregated into six divisions. The first of these is that of land utilization designed to acquire large areas of unproductive or submarginal land which are to be devoted to recreational parks, game preserves, forests, and grazing. On April 1, 1936, there were 206 such land acquisition projects to include a total of nearly 10,000,000 acres of land, of which 2,000,000 have been bought and the Government committed to the purchase of the remaining 8,000,000 acres.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of New York. I prefer to finish my statement, and then I will be glad to yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he was opposed to this resettlement?

Mr. COLE of New York. The gentleman will see my position before I have concluded.

For the use of this division there was made available over $48,000,000 for land acquisition and $18,000,000 for development and conservation. The amount needed for complete development is over $40,000,000, instead of the $18,000,000, making a total cost of this one experiment approximately $90,000,000, or, roughly, $10 per acre for every acre of land thus taken out of production, a rather dear price to pay for land that admittedly is worthless and unproductive.

The second division is that of rural rehabilitation, for the purpose of lending money to distressed farmers to permit them to carry on their work. Under the established rules, any farmer is ineligible for a loan if he could obtain it from any of the commercial banks, the Federal land bank, Production Credit Corporation, or any other private or governmental agency. In other words, a farmer's credit must be absolutely exhausted before he can get relief. The total amount of public money loaned or granted and committed to be loaned and granted to these persons is $106,000,000 in the first year of activity. Of course, it is expected by those in charge that the bulk of this sum will be repaid by the farmer, including the grants he received. As it is so naively expressed by the "interim report", "it was estimated, when the program was formulated, that 70 percent of the total loans would be repaid." Considering the type of risks involved in these loans, there are few persons whose thoughts are not directed by their wishes who will agree that 70 or even 50 percent of these advances will be repaid. We can easily anticipate the procedure that will come in the future concerning these loans: First, through sympathy for those who are unable to pay, the interest on the loans will be waived by the Government; then, after a bit, the same generous attitude of those controlling the public money will cause them to cancel the farmers' obligations entirely. Indeed, the Government will be extremely fortunate if 30 percent of the principal of these loans is recouped, to say nothing of the carrying charges. Through the farm-debt-adjustment program of this division of the Resettlement Administration, a seemingly worth-while service has been rendered to the overburdened farmer. Acting as the negotiator, the Government has brought the farmer and his creditors together in an effort to not only scale down the principal but also to reduce the interest rates on the debts and to extend the dates of maturity. The adjusments that have been accomplished by his method have been estimated to amount to approximately $30,000,000 by June 30 of this year. The unfortunate part of this debt-adjustment program is that once the Government has succeeded in lightening the debt load the farmer has to carry, the Government has immediately put that same indebted farmer back into debt to the extent of an aggregate of over $53,000,000.

The next function of this "little entente" is the Rural Resettlement Division, which establishes communities of farmers who have been economically unable to make a living or who have been moved from unproductive land bought by the Government.

If all of the 196 projects were to be developed they would provide locations for approximately 25,000 families, require the purchase of approximately 1,400,000 acres of land, and require a Budget of approximately $95,000,000.

So says the report—or a cost of $3,800 per family. We are told that there are more than 500,000 rural rehabilitation families on farms that should be abandoned, who are worthy resettlement clients. At the above rate per family, the total costs of resettling these needy families will be nearly $2,000,000,000 and involve the acquisition of nearly 30,000,000 acres of land. Curiously enough, the report is strangely silent on the amount of money that has been allocated to it or the cost of its activities for rural resettlement to date. Can it be that this studied failure to give even a partial explanation of the per family costs to date is an indication that the ultimate cost of the homes far exceeded their expectations and the ability of the homesteaders to finance? From other sources we learn that the homes of one of the projects, in Georgia, have averaged nearly $6,000 each, while, in the opinion of the management, $4,000 is the largest debt these selected homesteaders might reasonably be expected to pay off in 30 years' time and at the low interest rate provided.

Besides the management and construction divisions, which are of relative unimportance at this time, except that each of them contain hundreds of administrative and clerical positions and have but very little work to do, the final division is that of suburban resettlement, which has undertaken the construction of houses on the outskirts of industrial cities for use by low-income families whose heads work in the cities. To date, four of these projects have been inaugurated in Maryland, Michigan, New Jersey, and Ohio. For this purpose $31,000,000 has been allocated. The communities are to be complete in every respect, with stores, garages, post offices, theaters, and other business establishments. Small garden areas and facilities for rearing cows and poultry are to be included for each home. Because of the feature of being located in the country with lots of green grass growing all around, these resettlements have acquired the title of Greenbelt, Greenhills, Greendale, and Greenbrook.

When one looks at the ultimate costs of the respective projects and realizes the impossibility of the Government ever recovering the investment it has in them, the conclusion is inescapable that the greenness of the name given these settlements comes not from the verdure of the surrounding countryside but the impracticability of the utopian visionaries sponsoring the program.

Greenbelt is to have 1,000 homes at a total cost of $6,950,000; Greenhills to have 1,000 families at a cost of $8,750,000; Greendale will contain 750 homes with an aggregate investment of $7,050,000; and Greenbrook 750 dwellings at a cost of $7,150,000. The average cost of these 3,500 homes and settlements will be approximately $8,500 each.

Imagine a worker of low income being able to buy and pay for a house that costs him around $8,000 and at the same time to pay taxes on it, keep it in repair, carry the necessary insurance, and with it all to feed, clothe, and educate his children! It is unthinkable that this can be done. In the report is this very significant statement:

> The question of ability to pay is a major consideration in arriving at the sales price, and it is felt the maximum amount a person may be able to pay for shelter is 25 percent of his income, and on very small incomes the percentage will, of course, be lower.

Assuming that a person from this class of workers, receiving an annual salary of $2,000, pays at the rate of 25 percent of his income, it will require 30 years in which to pay off the purchase price of the house at the very low rate of 4 percent, and when he finally completes payments on the purchase price he will have nothing but an old, worn-out house. There can be no doubt that the Government does not expect to be repaid its complete investment in these projects. That this is true is inferentially admitted by Dr. Tugwell, for in a speech at Cincinnati on February 3, in discussing suburban housing, he said:

> Let me frankly admit that there may be some element of subsidy if we are to maintain building and maintenance standing and keep rents down.

The most that the average urban worker would be able to pay for his home is from $2,000 to $4,000, and if the Government is to subsidize the worker as Dr. Tugwell says it must, the most it can be expected to recover from the cost of these four projects, alone totaling $31,000,000, is from 25 to 50 percent. Perhaps there might not be much basis for complaint if the program of suburban resettlement were to stop with the projects now undertaken, but this is not the case, for Tugwell has said that—

> If private industry persists in its refusal to exploit the possibilities which are clearly there, the pressure of public opinion may force the Government to enter this field on a very wide scale.

Certainly private industry is not going to enter this field of building houses at a cost of from $8,000 to $9,000 and selling them at a price from $2,000 to $4,000. If the public is fully informed of the nature of these projects and the tremendous loss to the Government which must be borne by the taxpayers, public opinion will demand that these experiments be not carried further.

Of all the homesteads, rural and suburban, which have been created by Tugwell, not a single one has yet been sold. True, many of them are occupied by tenants who are there under a licensing agreement, paying a rental of approximately $10 per room per month. In these licensing agreements the licensee agrees to—

> Cultivate and farm the land included within the homestead to the best of his ability, and to adopt and adhere to any cropping program and tillage practice stipulated by the licensor (the Government).

In this way the Government exacts from the homesteader an obligation to follow any program relating to the use of the homestead which the Government may see fit. Here we have the same regimentation of our people that was the basis of the popular complaint against the codes of the N. R. A. and the cropping rules laid down by the Government under the A. A. A. and the Potato Act. It will be interesting to observe how long the homesteaders of these settlements will submit to governmental dictation in their everyday life.

The costs of these various divisions of the Resettlement Administration as set forth above do not include the expense of administration. In some 19 separate buildings in the city of Washington are offices harboring the administrators of this expensive socialistic program. An employee of the Resettlement Administration says that the Administration pay roll is $2,000,000 per month, and that nearly a third of the employees are receiving salaries in excess of civil-service ratings, with hundreds on the pay roll at salaries from $2,500 to $5,000 per year. A recent series of articles in a local newspaper discloses that Tugwell has employed nearly 17,000 persons to administer his work, at an aggregate expense of over $24,000,000 per year for salaries alone. There has already been allocated to this alphabetical effort to produce "more abundant life" out of funds given the President under blanket authority over $278,000,000, and within the past month we have heard that Tugwell is asking for $200,000,000 more to complete his program, making a total of nearly one-half billion dollars for the purpose of planning and "building 20,000 new homes and work places for the people who are on the land we have purchased", and yet within the past 3 days we hear Tugwell say that—

> This—
> The 20,000 new homes—
> is the merest fraction of the numbers who would like to be relocated, but it is all we could do with our time and money.

There seems to be no bottom to the pit in which Tugwell is pouring the taxpayers' money, all for the purpose of carrying out his one-time threat of rolling up his sleeves and making over America, and this at the expense of the taxpayer who does have a home and has paid for it through his own hard work, thrift, and self-denial, and further at the expense of a broken morale and initiative on the part of those who accept the paternalism of our benevolent Government. If America needs to be "made over", it can only be done by those processes which have been tried and found true, namely, thrift, sobriety, morality, and industry, and an adherence to the true principles of a Republic under our written Constitution. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COLE] has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN].

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I arise to express my regret at the remarks of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER], made in yesterday's RECORD, in which he impugns the honesty, sincerity, and instincts of fair play of our most wholesome neighbor to the north, the Dominion of Canada. He says:

> The recent action of the Canadian Government suggests strongly that from their standpoint the Canadian agreement is to a substantial extent a scrap of paper binding still upon our Government and our people but with myriad loopholes through which they can vary their trade policies as they please.

That statement is as unfair as anything could possibly be, and is only equalled in lack of knowledge by the contents of the rest of the speech.

To understand the utter baselessness of the entire argument of the gentleman from Maine, a few remarks as to the Canadian classification of tariff schedules would be a point. They have four different types of rates. The lowest is the rate prevailing among the members of the British Empire. Next are the intermediate rates prevailing among the most favorable nations outside of the British Empire. Then the so-called countervailing rates, which cannot be lower than the intermediate rates, but equal the rates imposed by the tariff of other countries selling the same commodities to Canada which Canada sells to that country.

In other words, the countervailing rate is designed to impose the same burden on the same commodities which Canada buys and sells. The last and highest Canadian rates are the general tariffs which apply to all other countries.

Following the adoption of the Smoot-Hawley tariff and up until January 1, 1936, our trade with Canada was taxed under the general tariff schedules of that country. With the reciprocity treaty a number of our items of export to Canada received special rates, of mutual advantage to both countries and approximately 600 items not mentioned in the treaty were allowed entrance under the intermediate rates.

There was no agreement of any kind with Canada prohibiting her from changing her intermediate tariff rates at any time she desired. Our State Department made a definite effort to get these commodities bound to the intermediate rate, but without success. Canada clearly reserved her right to change these rates at will.

The State Department, in its press release dated November 23, 1935, expressly says of these items on the intermediate list:

> Although the duty reduction on these items, unlike the items in schedule I, are not bound as to duration, they become effective immediately when the agreement enters into force.

Nevertheless, the gentleman from Maine states:

> It remained for our Canadian neighbors, however, very promptly to educate our State Department and our people to some of the possibilities inherent in this agreement.

If there is anyone needing education concerning the Canadian reciprocal treaty, it is the gentleman from Maine. As another evidence of his abyssmal want of information on this subject, he says:

> Canada was left free to make any tariff concessions that might at any time seem advisable to any of the British commonwealth of nations, and the United States was left helpless.

The United States reserved to itself the right to make any change in its tariff schedules on all items not listed in the treaty just the same as the Canadian Government. It is just as helpless as the Canadian Government, no more or no less.

The increase in rates which the Canadian Government has made on potatoes, eggs, flour, cut flowers, and raisins simply raises the duty on those commodities to equal the duty which the United States places on the same commodities coming from Canada.

If the gentleman from Maine desires these duties lowered going into Canada, he ought, in all fairness then, to advocate that we reduce our duties on the same commodities. If we do, Canada will at once respond.

The Canadian Minister of Finance, in referring to these countervailing rates, states:

> This means that other countries who both buy from and sell to us these commodities have it in their own power, by reciprocal action on their part, to enable us to reduce to the level of the rates stated in our tariff * * *. May I make it clear that our attitude continues to be * * * we do not desire nor intend to raise tariffs; we do by the countervailing duties invite other countries to bring their tariffs down to the level of ours.

The apparent obsession of the gentleman from Maine that we should maintain a duty of 75 cents a hundred pounds on potatoes coming from Canada to us and then have the privilege of selling potatoes to Canada free of duty is just about as juvenile and impossible as is the theme of his whole speech to the effect that the people in Maine can prosper by high tariff duties while the rest of the country is suffering from it.

The gentleman professes interest in potatoes and uses that as a basis for his high-tariff arguments. On May 1, 1935, No. 1 grade potatoes were selling at 39½ cents a hundred. May 1, 1936, the same potatoes were selling at $2 a hundred. In 1935, on an ad-valorem basis, potatoes carried a tariff rate of almost 200 percent. In 1936 the tariff on an ad-valorem basis was 37½ percent.

The prosperity of the country will raise the prices of Maine potatoes, as well as the prices of Wisconsin dairy products, many times more effectively than any tariff duties.

Our records for 1934 and 1935 show that foreign trade increased with countries having reciprocal treaties in a ratio six times as great as with nonreciprocal countries. What an utterly asinine suggestion it is for local representatives to come before this body and attack reciprocity treaties because they imagine some of their local interests may be injuriously affected.

The gentleman seems to complain of the tariff reduction that Canada has extended to us since the treaty even as loudly as he does of tariff increases. He says:

> Canada lowered the duties on things they desired to buy from us for the benefit of their customers.

The inference is that, according to his idea, Canada ought to have lowered her duties for the benefit of our exporters. Such a contention would not be any more childish than his idea that Canada ought to submit to our potato tariff of 75 cents and let us sell in Canada duty free. Certainly Canada is interested in her own people who are buying these commodities. She realizes that it is just as desirable to make a profit in a purchase as it is in a sale. To that extent she is just a little better informed on the question of political economy than our high-tariff advocates.

Canada, in her last budget, granted us lower duties on a great many more commodities than she raised and has informed us that she will lower the duties on those raised commodities if we will do the same thing in our tariff.

Could anything be more fair and decent? And yet the gentleman from Maine accuses the Canadian Government of bad faith.

Another statement of the high-tariff gentleman from Maine reads as follows:

> We are trading a market of 100,000,000 consumers in this country for a market of 10,000,000 consumers in our neighbor to the north.

Did it ever occur to the gentleman that Canadians at the same time are submitting their market to the pressure of 100,000,000 producers, while we are only subject to that of 10,000,000 producers? As long as the people in a foreign nation pay their bills they are good customers, regardless of the population involved. They can only consume in proportion to what they produce, and if they are few in number with low production they will sell just that much less to us.

The Canadian people have been excellent customers of ours under reciprocity. In the first 3 months of this year we sold them $14,299,000 in commodities more than we purchased from them. Their increased purchases per capita from us during reciprocity has amounted to 72 cents, while our increased purchases per capita from them has amounted to but 14 cents.

If anybody has any basis to complain, it rests with the people of Canada—not with us.

The struggle of a high-tariff group of antiadministration forces is so utterly impotent that it has taken on a somewhat humorous stage. The great majority of the Republican press has deserted them; the leadership of the United States Chamber of Commerce has seen the light; and even their "brain trust", which they have recently been forced to employ, has backed up on them in their efforts to strangle foreign trade. At least three members of that learned organization—the Republican "brain trust"—Prof. Niles Carpenter, of Buffalo; Prof. Frederick Bradford, of Lehigh; Prof. Rufus S. Tucker, of Harvard; were all signers of the original protest against the Smoot-Hawley tariff.

Colonel Knox, one of their Presidential aspirants, has openly approved reciprocity. Even the irreconcilable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] has recently become mysteriously silent.

Another outstanding member of their advisory board is Prof. Asher Hobson, of Wisconsin. He is generally credited with having been responsible for a large part of the Canadian reciprocal treaty. Yet as a "brain truster" he is now trying to inject enough intelligence into the antiadministration groups to keep them from being ridiculous in the coming campaign.

The unfortunate part about this whole business is that foreign nations cannot get the humor generated by the feeble remarks of the high-tariff bloc, and when a Member of this body spreads on the record ill-advised, baseless, and unfair charges against one of our friendly neighbors there is a danger of these remarks being taken as having some weight, and therefore they ought not to go unanswered. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN].

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, we seem to be without a plan. We came into this panic without intelligent planning. We, in Minnesota, in the midst of prosperity and during the years when things were riding high, told the folks that a panic and a depression was impending. Now, in this bill we are appropriating millions of dollars and we seem to have no real plans. Are we ever going to do intelligent national planning in this country? This experience we are now having ought to teach us that.

I think it is all right to have this rural resettlement. Why not build these homes for the people? Let us have resettlement in the rural areas. They are tearing down a slum area in my home city, in my district, and building houses there. I cannot see anything wrong with that. Why should not homes be built there? Why should not folks be given an opportunity to live in better homes and pleasant places? Why not?

I believe in these T. V. A.'s. I voted for Muscle Shoals during the War, and I see some distinguished gentlemen before me who were here at that time and who voted for that project. Now, why not continue that? I cannot see why we should just put out money for relief. Why not furnish self-respecting work of some kind. Why not put it into public works of some kind, so that a man is not just given a certain sum of money to enable him to eat today when he will be just as hungry tomorrow. Why not have some work done at union wages, giving an American standard of living—something constructive that adds to the capital of the country. That is what we believe in; that is what we want; that is intelligent national planning.

A lot of folks find fault with the administration. I am not an administration spokesman. I am probably critical of both major parties, but it seems to me some errors are bound to be made no matter who handles the work. I believe we should have an American standard of living at all times, and where the American standard of living has not been adhered to I do find fault; but where they are seeking to build in this crisis, and construct, and resettle, certainly there the administration ought to be encouraged.

I want to see more construction. I want to see the streams harnessed in order that we may afford light, current, and power to the whole country of the United States. I want to see a blaze of electric light and power throughout these United States of ours so that electric current becomes available at cost to every American home. I want to see woman emancipated from the slavery of the kitchen. I want the farmer lifted from his back-breaking toil. We have the resources, we have the men, we have the money to do this; and if we would only forget this saving of the world and this nonsense about going to war to end war and stop spending money in absurd foreign adventures, and build our own resources for our own people in this America of ours, we would get along better. We should spend our money here on something for our own people. That is constructive statesmanship, proposed by our Farmer-Labor Party; that is good Minnesota doctrine, and I ask your attention now before it is too late.

I have not written my speech; I am just talking straight from the shoulder and right out of my heart, just the way I feel about these things. So far as the administration is moving along these lines I say it deserves credit. Where the administration makes mistakes it should be corrected. I have no sympathy with those who just criticize and criticize and want to save some money for millionaires and billionaires. There are plenty of men who have huge incomes in this country. Let them be patriotic and pay this bill without whining. Let this money be expended for the people. And now there is talk about investigating the Townsend plan—a few thousand dollars spent for salaries and expenses in the interest of old-age pensions. Why do they not investigate J. P. Morgan and Eugene Grace, or some of these men who have billions of dollars and millions of income every year. Investigate them. That would be more to the point. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCCORMACK, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12624) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1936, and June 30, 1937, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow; and in explanation, Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, I will say it is the hope of those in charge of the bill, as well as of the minority members of the committee, that if we finish debate tomorrow, we may proceed with the consideration of the bill under the 5-minute rule, and take it up to the point of the motion to recommit, in which event it will be the purpose to adjourn over until Monday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE CENTURY OF PROGRESS CELEBRATION OF THE ANCIENT ORDER OF HIBERNIANS IN AMERICA

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of The Century of Progress Celebration of the Ancient Order of Hibernians in America.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following:

THE CENTURY OF PROGRESS CELEBRATION OF THE ANCIENT ORDER OF HIBERNIANS IN AMERICA

The founding of the first American chapter of the Ancient Order of Hibernians and the memory of its members who defended old St. Patrick's Cathedral, Prince and Mulberry Streets, in New York City against the Know-Nothings mob in 1844 were commemorated in that city on Saturday and Sunday, the 2d and 3d of May 1936.

"Be ever patriotic and live by the Constitution," Cardinal Hayes declared in an address to more than 2,500 persons of Irish birth or ancestry gathered at St. Patrick's Cathedral on May 2, 1936, for a pontifical Mass in celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of Ancient Order of Hibernians in America.

"The flag of our country stands very much in need of loyalty today," the cardinal said, "and I feel that the men of this order will lay down their lives for this country."

The cardinal addressed the gathering after a sermon in which the Most Reverend James A. Griffin, bishop of Springfield, Ill., praised the religious courage of the Irish spirit. Referring to the bishop's sermon, Cardinal Hayes said the Irish spirit in this country and in this city was "the very spirit for which the cathedral stands. The Irishman has a reputation for being a good soldier. It springs from his faith—fighting for God first, last, and always."

The one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the order in the United States was observed with a 2-day celebration. More than 1,600 persons attended a dinner at the Hotel Astor Saturday night, at which Gov. James M. Curley, of Massachusetts, was the principal speaker.

Every State in the Union was represented in the gathering of the order for the ceremonies in the cathedral. The delegates marched to and from the cathedral escorted by a uniformed contingent of the One Hundred and Sixty-fifth Infantry—old Sixty-ninth—and a band that played Irish airs. A color guard carried the emblem of the order, gold over green, with the Irish and American flags crossing and two hands, representing the two countries, clasped firmly in a gesture of friendship.

Irish music filled the cathedral. Cardinal Hayes presided on his throne. The opening march, played by Pietro Yon, organist, was O'Donnell Aboo.

A bronze tablet commemorating the founding—near the site of St. James' Church in May 1836—of the New York chapter of the A. O. H. was installed at St. James' and another tablet at St. Patrick's. The dedication ceremonies closed the order's centennial celebration, which started Saturday.

One thousand members marched from St. James' Church and then to old St. Patrick's. More than 10,000 other persons lined the route of march. An escort of six mounted policemen was followed by the green and tan costumed County Tyrone Pipers' Band.

Speaking of old St. Patrick's, Monsignor McIntyre recalled how a band of Know-Nothings had came to New York in April 1844 to burn that edifice. Members of the New York chapter of the A. O. H. assembled there, however, and repelled the invaders.

Monsignor McIntyre also spoke of the gifts of religion and patriotism that Irishmen have brought to other lands, notably to the United States.

John J. Sheahan, chairman of the St. Patrick's Day committee, said that religion and patriotism had been inextricably joined through Ireland's history, and that these qualities had been handed down to Irish-Americans.

In his sermon, Bishop Griffin recalled the spirit displayed by the early members of the Hibernians and pointed to their courage and that of the Irish race as an example of endurance that might be emulated now in countries where religious freedom is threatened.

President Roosevelt sent a letter to Edward J. McCullen, secretary of the centenary committee, in which he praised the contribution made to New York and the United States by persons of Irish blood.

"In peace and war they have been in the forefront of all activity", the President wrote. "New York has not forgotten, nor can ever forget, the old Sixty-ninth Regiment of Infantry—the 'fighting Irish' of song and story. With deep appreciation do we recall the services of the successor of the old Sixty-ninth, the One Hundred and Sixty-fifth Infantry Regiment in the Rainbow Division. And that brings to mind a gallant figure whose name is forever associated with the One Hundred and Sixty-fifth Regiment. I counted him among my dearest friends. He was in our midst but a few short years ago; his passing brought sorrow to all hearts; his memory is in benediction.

"Father Duffy was characteristically Irish in the apostolic zeal of his ministry, in the fervor of his patriotism, and in his love and good will toward all men. I know he will have a place in the hearts of all who take part in this celebration. I like to think of Father Duffy as typical of the great race which has given so much to America."

The Ancient Order of Hibernians claims descent from the Ancient Irish Orders of Knighthood, from the Knights of the Golden Chain and the Bardic Order, the Feni Erin of Leinster, the Knights of the Red Branch of Ulster, the Clan Deagha of Munster, and the Clanna Morna in Connaught.

The modern organization traces its beginning to Rory O'Moore, who revived the ancient orders in the Catholic Confederation of Kilkenny in 1642.

In penal times as defenders of the priests, in the celebration of the holy sacrifice of the Mass in secret hiding places in the mountains and in the bogs of Ireland, the members of the order preserved the faith of their fathers for their posterity.

The priest and the schoolmaster alike were proscribed and a price was set upon their heads, and the Hibernians of that day provided shelter and protection and transport from village to village so that the national ideal and the national religion would not perish. For almost 200 years these bands of men were necessary for the protection of priest and people against religious persecution.

The lodge system which had existed in a loose form for generations was perfected in the latter years of the eighteenth century, and the method of collecting funds for the burial of the dead was in use.

In May 1836 a charter was sent from Ireland to New York City authorizing the organization of the order in America. One of the members, who was employed on a sailing vessel engaged in trade between America and British ports, was delegated to bring the charter to America. The charter they received was from the chief officers in those counties which had been hallowed by generations of conflict for faith and fatherland. This beginning of the order in America cannot be better described than by using the words of the late Bishop Shahan, rector of the Catholic University, who so eloquently said, "The first page of the order in America is beautiful for its simplicity and straightforwardness, touching for its candid Catholicism. It is as good a patent of nobility as was ever conferred by king or kaiser, for there is wanting in it no element of our liberal modern humanity. I can almost see these honest and sturdy representatives of the Irish race in Ireland, England, and Scotland handing over to ship-worn and tearful exiles of Erin the sacred sparks of liberty and faith, of chivalry and tolerance, of kindly humanity and large brotherly charity that, thank God, have ever since been cherished by the members of this organization."

The charter sent from Ireland reads as follows:

"From the Brethren in Ireland and Great Britain to the Brethren in New York, Brothers, Greeting:

"Be it known to you and to all it may concern, that we send to our few brothers in New York full instructions with our authority to establish branches of our society in America. The qualifications for membership must be as follows:

"First. All members must be Roman Catholics, and Irish or Irish descent, and of good moral character, and none of your members shall join in any secret societies contrary to the laws of the Catholic Church, and at all times and at all places your motto shall be 'Friendship, unity, and true Christian charity.'

"You must love without dissimulation, hating evil, cleaving to good. Love one another with brotherly love, without preventing one another; let the love of brotherhood abide in you, and forget not hospitality to your emigrant brother that may land on your shores, and we advise you, above all things, have natural charity among yourselves.

"Also be it known unto you that our wish and prayer is that when you form your society, in many cities and towns, you will do all that is in your power to aid and protect your Irish sisters from all harm and temptation. As the Irish woman is known for her chastity all over the world—some of them may differ from you in religion—but, brothers, bear in mind that our good Lord died for us all. Therefore be it known unto you that our wish is that you do all that you can for the Irish emigrant girls, no matter who they may be, and God will reward you in your new country, and in doing this you will keep up the high standing and honor of the Irish in America.

"We send these instructions to you, hoping that you will carry them out to the best of your ability. Be it known unto you that you are at liberty to make such laws as will guide your workings and for the welfare of our old society, but such laws must be at all times according to the teachings of the holy Catholic Church, and the obligation that we send you and all your workings must be submitted to any Catholic priest when called for.

"We send you these instructions, as we promised to do, with a young man who works on the ship and who called on you before. Send a copy to our late friend whom you spoke of and who is now working in Pennsylvania. Hoping that the bearer and this copy will land safe, and that you will treat him right, we remain your brothers in the true bonds of friendship, this 4th day of May, A. D. 1836.

"Patrick McGuire, County Fermanagh; Patrick McKenna, County Monaghan; Patrick Reilly, County Meath; John Farrell, County Meath; James McManus, County Antrim; Patrick Dunn, County Tyrone; Daniel Gallagher, Glasgow; John Reilly, County Cavan; Patrick Boyle, County Sligo; John Derkin, County Mayo; Thomas O'Rorke, County Leitrim; John McMahon, County Longford; Patrick Hamill, Westmeath; John Murphy, Liverpool."

Division no. 1, of New York County, met in the basement of old St. James' Church, at New Bowery and James Street. Every parish had at least one division, and their chief beneficence was in aiding the newly arrived immigrants to find work, in comforting the bereaved, and in extending every kind of helpfulness to the sick and destitute. The emigration contributed greatly to the membership of the order, for in 1838 the Irish Catholic population of New York City was about 70,000, while in 1840 it was 90,000.

From New York City the order spread to Philadelphia, Newark, the coal-mining regions of Pennsylvania, and westward with the tide of Irish emigration.

In New York the order was encouraged by the great John Hughes, first archbishop of New York, who saw in the sturdy catholicism of its members a source of strength to the church and a wall of defense against its enemies.

The early years were stormy. These were the days of anti-Catholic, and particularly anti-Irish bigotry. There were small riots throughout the city, windows of Catholic churches were broken, and ignorant and intolerant anti-Catholic mobs had attacked Catholics in the streets of the city.

In 1844, when the Know-Nothing fanatics held a meeting in city hall park, after the election of their candidate for mayor of the city, to welcome the church-burning Know-Nothing Party from Philadelphia, the members of the Ancient Order of Hibernians were summoned to the defense of the churches of the city by Archbishop Hughes, and, armed, they garrisoned the churches of the city, ready to defend them with their lives.

Again, in 1855, it was necessary for a brief time for the members of the order to guard the churches of the city, and at that time the members of division 1, of Brooklyn, who were guarding St. Paul's Church, at Court and Congress Streets, were threatened by a Know-Nothing mob, but the defeat of the Know-Nothings in a fight at the Catherine Street Ferry ended forever the threat of mob rule and the destruction of church property in New York.

It might be well to mention that the first St. Patrick's Day parade in the city was held under the auspices of the Ancient Order of Hibernians in 1838, and in 1853 there were 12,000 men in line and Mayor Westervelt and the common council reviewed the parade from the steps of the city hall.

A military company was organized chiefly from among the members of the Hibernians which later became the Ninth Regiment of the State militia. A second regiment, the Sixty-ninth, was organized soon after, and its first colonel was Charles S. Roe and its lieutenant colonel Michael Doheny.

In 1861, with the outbreak of the Civil War, whole divisions of the Ancient Order of Hibernians joined the Army in defense of the Union.

The Hibernians of New York, after the Battle of Chancellorsville, equipped a hospital tent and ambulance and offered it to General Meagher, and they were delivered to the Irish Brigade at Warrenton, Va., by Dr. E. D. Connery, the coroner of New York County, who was one of the most prominent Hibernians in the city.

At the close of the war the members of the order lay on every battlefield, and the Civil War, with its sacrifice of Catholic Irish blood, showed the Know-Nothing fanatics that the members of the order, which had defended the churches from the attacks of mobs, were just as willing to defend the flag of their country.

In the 1890's when the American Protective Association, commonly known as the "A. P. A." raised its head, the Ancient Order of Hibernians again led in stamping out this revival of the bigotry of the Know-Nothing.

It should be remembered that through the observance of St. Patrick's Day by the Ancient Order of Hibernians, through the veneration offered the patron saint of Ireland through the ritual and other customs of the order over a long period of years, that this national Irish feast has become a day of universal celebration in all parts of the United States. These celebrations have made popular the Irish customs and the Irish themselves among the varied races which have flocked to America.

Since my father was a member of the Ancient Order of Hibernians and since I had the honor of taking part in this wonderful celebration, with pride I call the attention of the House of Representatives to the Century of Progress Celebration of the Ancient Order of Hibernians in America.

LETTER FROM A FORMER MEMBER OF CONGRESS

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter which I received from a former Member of Congress, a Republican.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from Hon. Montague Lessler, a former Member of Congress from the State of New York:

NEW YORK, February 13, 1936.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN DELANEY: The death of Charlie Curtis brought to mind that on the 2d of January 1902 (34 years ago) I was elected to the House from the then Seventh New York District. The election was the result of a special election held to fill the vacancy upon the resignation of Nicholas Muller, who had been a Member of Congress from the downtown and Staten Island district for a number of years. It was an interesting, lively campaign, conducted without the aid of the usual party management, and was, if I may use the term, a "solo" affair.

The district ran on the west side of the city from about Fourth Street, embraced the Battery, and curved around to go up the east side to somewhere in the neighborhod of Canal Street. It also included Staten Island.

Of course, in the Wall Street section there were not many voters. However, the election took place, and in a section that had never been represented before by a Republican, gave me 7,677 votes to 7,283 votes for my opponent. Some other time the story of that canvass may be of interest. At present I just want to tell you of some of the men I met in my brief term and some of the matters of interest viewed in the light of 34 years after the events.

The final canvass by the State board was not completed, but, nevertheless, on the motion of "Bill" Sulzer that was waived by the Democratic minority, and accompanied by him on the one side and Lucius Littauer on the other, I took the historic oath from Speaker Henderson in the Well of the House. I had been accompanied to Washington in a special car by a collection of politicians, saloonkeepers, ward helpers, ladies, and gentlemen as could be gathered; men and women who had helped me and who had been good to me, and so I felt that it was a kind of noble gesture to wind up the campaign by bringing them with me to Washington, where they were a noisy aggregation in the gallery and had a grand time at the old Arlington Hotel. I may add in passing that it is a sort of grateful recollection to me that my mother and father were both there to witness the swearing in. Of course, there was a great mass of flowers to mark the occasion. What to do with them was a problem, until it was finally suggested that they be sent to the hospitals, which was done. As a further mark of distinction, the House adjourned at once, and so I had a job, drawing a salary and nothing to do.

It is of interest to remember the men who were in the House and in the Senate when I came there. I do not think there is any man remaining today who was in either body in 1902.

I was promptly assigned to seat 399 in the back row. Each man then had a desk. I sat next to Beidler, of Cleveland, Ohio, and on the other side my nearest neighbor was Sutherland, of Utah, now Supreme Court Justice. There was a very interesting set of men at the House at this time. The New York delegation was headed by Senators Platt and Depew. Among the Republicans in the House were Tompkins, who has lately retired as justice of the supreme court; Littauer, who was later to make such a place for himself as chairman of Appropriations; Sherman, of Utica, who became the Vice President with Taft; George Ray, of Norwich, N. Y., who became United States district judge; Payne, of Auburn, N. Y., head of the Ways and Means Committee; General Wadsworth, of Geneseo, N. Y., a delightful gentleman of real influence in the House and father of the present Congressman; James Breck Perkins, of Rochester, N. Y., a scholar, litterateur, and historian whose books on the Louis XV period of French history are still read and remain standard; Colonel Alexander, Buffalo, N. Y., whose work on the political history of New York State is as fine as anything that has been written on the subject. He was also the author of a work on parliamentary law. On the Democratic side were a number of men it was a delight to know and remember—Fitzgerald, of Brooklyn, now judge and then, while in the minority, usually recognized as one of the best parliamentarians in the House; Goldfogle, of New York City, a delightful little man who died in harness as one of the tax commissioners of the city; Amos J. Cummings, of newspaper fame, recognized as outstanding among journalists and a real figure in the history of journalism in New York; William Sulzer—what can one say about him except that he became Governor of New York State and thereafter faded away; George McClellan, of New York City, later professor of Princeton, who was twice mayor of New York City; dear Jake Ruppert, a kindly, sweet, helpful man, who has continued his public career as head of the Yankee baseball team.

I wish I had time to tell you more about the New York men—Storm, Bristow, Hanbury, George Lindsay—but you must remember that New York had 37 men, and I want to speak of other men.

The general focal point of all the young men in the House at that time was Jim Sherman, called usually "Sunny Jim." There was a kindness to the man, a helpfulness that can be remembered better than described. He had been in the House so long and was so acquainted with everything connected with it that it seemed the natural thing to turn to him and ask for his help in any predicament. He was head of the Indian Affairs Committee. The committee room was the meeting place of a number of men, and all their work was done there under the efficient supervision of the secretary of the Indian Affairs Committee, dear Harry Devendorf. Sherman, Knapp, Littauer, Emerson, Stewart, New York Congressmen, made their headquarters there, and by some sort of arrangement had their work done there also. It was in that room among those men that I first met Charlie Curtis, who was then the Member from the First District of Kansas and serving his fifth term in the House. I remember him very well. Of course, I got to know him and kept my acquaintance up after I left the House and went down to Washington to dinners and other celebrations. He was courteous, kind, helpful, and interested. Everybody, as I look back at it now, and especially on the Republican side, was keenly interested in my progress with the thought that possibly there might be a chance of a return from that district and a fooling of the constituents once more.

There were a number of other interesting men in the House on both sides of the Chamber. To me, the veteran Uncle Joe Cannon seemed a survival right out of the Lincoln antebellum days. There was a quaintness about him that certainly appealed. He had a power of expression in public, on the floor and in private, that made a lasting impression on those who came in contact with him. You must remember that at that time Mr. Cannon was 66 years of age, and had been in the House since the Forty-ninth Congress. He had been head of the Appropriations Committee for many years and had gradually become the leader of the majority. His main opponent was John Sharp Williams, later Senator from Mississippi, a man of extraordinary educational achievement, a fine scholar and a splendid linguist. It was indeed a treat to hear Uncle Joe and "Sharp" as Joe called him, in the center aisle fiercely encountering each other and then when it was all ended, to see them go out arm in arm. They not alone had a respect but an affection one for the other, and they were two outstanding men it was a joy to know. There were so many men in the House of real worth that it is difficult to try and remember all of them in the confines of this rambling letter and do credit to their many excellencies. It was a time of real debators. Hepburn, of Iowa; Tawney, of Minnesota; De Armond, of Missouri; Champ Clark, of Missouri; Grosvenor, of Ohio; and Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, were men who took the greater burden of the political debate. In fact, it was currently believed that Clark and Grosvenor used to stage a debate preliminary to their excursion on the Chautauqua circuit. There were several others who were really powerful speakers. A new man, Littlefield, of Maine, always got the ear of the House by his earnestness and beauty of delivery and speech. It was said of him at the time that his name never disgraced a majority report and that he was always in the opposition.

We had a couple of humorists, too. There was a man, Cushman, of Washington, whose speeches brought together a full House, and who had the power of saying witty things without hurting. This was also the case with Bob Nevins, of Dayton, Ohio, a magnificent talker and really a sound lawyer.

There were two men in the House and it was a real rough-and-tumble to debate. One was De Armond, of Missouri, and Hepburn, of Iowa. They were afraid of nothing and had a blistering invective that took the hair and hide off the fellow who opposed them. There were some really charming gentlemen in the House. I recollect with real pleasure Adams, of Philadelphia, and Morrell, of Torresdale, Philadelphia, and, above all, Gillett, subsequently Speaker of the House and Senator from Massachusetts.

The man who was most attractive to me and whose knowledge of his work on the committee was monumental was Burton, of Ohio, who later became Senator. Congressman Burton was head of the Rivers and Harbors Committee. Everyone left the work to him. He gave to this work all his attention so that it was impossible to tell him anything about any mud creek in the United States, to say nothing of the great rivers and harbors, and, with it all, he was kindly and helpful with the thought in mind that he wanted to do the right thing to every man who had a creek for which he hoped to receive an appropriation.

Of course, the same kind of human beings were in the House then that are there now. We divided very sharply on politics. We had our man who did nothing but talk and who could not be shut up. We had the great objector and we had a man who knew everything and we had others who looked upon a seat in the House as a pleasant extension of their home success, possibly along business or banking lines. A great deal of hard work was done, and some play went on too. I think I should like to tell you about that sometime. But, all in all, it was without any doubt the finest aggregation of men that could be brought together. It represented every shade of variance in our great country. All races, conditions, and beliefs were there, and while intensively they were Democrats and Republicans, with very rare exceptions, I should say they were gentlemen. I have not been able to discover why a man cannot be a gentleman as well as a politician or statesman.

I wish I could tell you more of other men I got to know and how interesting Southern Democrats were. I think the man who charmed me most, outside of Williams, was Oscar Underwood. There was something so charming about this man; there was such a bonhomie about him; he looked so much the gentleman that it was a pleasure to know him and a real treat to listen to him.

While I seemingly have omitted a great number of men, not with any idea that they were not fully worth remembering, because I hold every one of them very dear insofar as I got to know them. Some of these men made a great impression on me. Their weaknesses—and we knew that they were there and what they were—endeared them to us to an extent, and yet there was always a courtesy and a pleasant relation established. Rarely, if ever, did the men become vehement to each other. I only remember one such episode.

It was a great training to have had contacts of this kind as a very young man. While living in the past brings very little, yet I think to hold recollections of the men I met in the Fifty-seventh Congress is something to retain. I have no doubt that it was a training and experience that was the equal of any college course that a young man might have. Not the least of those memories were my contacts with Curtis, and as I really started out with that in mind more than anything else, I have always had the feeling that it was his generous pleasantness with a crowd of youngsters who commenced in the House and then in the Senate who brought to him allegiances which in the end made him Vice President of the United States. This was true of Sherman as well, and remains true of any man who pledges himself in the generous desire to lend his experience to others coming into this great arena and to be a delightful personable gentleman in every sense of the word.

With kindest personal regards and apologies for this long letter, I remain,

Very sincerely yours,

MONTAGUE LESSLER.

Hon. JOHN J. DELANEY,
House of Representatives Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MOTHER'S DAY

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker: Amidst the strife and turmoil of national problems and international conflict, we pause to pay our respect and our solemn tribute to God's noblest creation.

The second Sunday in May is at hand, and we forget the differences that divide us in every field of human activity and join in a general, world-wide observance of Mother's Day.

MOTHER'S DAY WAS FOUNDED BY MISS ANNA JARVIS, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mother's Day was founded by Miss Anna Jarvis, a native of my neighboring State of West Virginia and now a resident of my own State of Pennsylvania. She inaugurated this day of thanksgiving, remembrance, and of gratitude. It is one day that has not been commercialized and has continued to be a day wholly devoted to tributes of gratefulness and remembrance—a day of rededication to the spiritual forces that inspired our mothers to teach us to follow the right, to seek the truth, and to act humbly and justly.

It is beautiful to set aside one day to an ideal, one day apart for generous deeds, for good will—for who can think of mother without being kinder and more generous? It is a day in which we are absorbed with the thoughts of mother and unmindful of the shadows, rains, and storms of life; for when we remember mother, we remember the sunshine and happiness of youth; we forget ourselves and think kindly and lovingly of others. We recall our mother's abiding faith in our inherent goodness and her inspiration to us to go forward to better and nobler things. For the opportunity to observe such a glorious day and the fulfillment of such a noble and inspiring ideal, we are thankful to Miss Jarvis.

MOTHER'S DAY RECOGNIZED ALL OVER THE WORLD

Her devotion to an ideal has helped to bring more joy and sunshine to the lives of millions than any other idea born in the mind of any of our noblest citizens. From a modest beginning it is now universally observed; in every climate and in every language the message of Mother's Day is heard around the globe. It is given official recognition by England and her colonies. Mexico, Brazil, and numerous South American countries observe this solemn day. Even Asia and Africa lend their tributes to the mothers of the world.

Since May 1914 Mother's Day is officially recognized and proclaimed by the Government of the United States. For nearly a quarter of a century, through proclamation by the President of the United States, the American flag has been displayed on all Government buildings in tribute to the mothers of America. American consulates throughout the world are ordered to unfurl the Stars and Stripes in honor of American homes and mothers. Official orders of the State and Army and Navy Departments decree that the flag be displayed and proper observance be held of the solemn annual tribute to motherhood.

MOTHER'S DAY IS OBSERVED BY THE MILITARY AND NAVAL FORCES

Commanding officers of the military and naval forces of the United States regard the observance of Mother's Day as a potent force for strengthening the morale of the enlisted personnel. They realize that when soldiers and sailors, many, many miles from their native land, think of home and mother, they cannot help but be overwhelmed by the noble sentiments, and then and there resolve to be a great and glorious force for home and country.

OLD GLORY IS PROUDLY DISPLAYED

It is a rare exception for Old Glory to be displayed on Sundays, but on the second Sunday in May this general rule is disregarded, and the national emblem displayed on the Nation's Capitol and on all other Federal buildings. For, on Mother's Day, Old Glory takes on a new significance as it waves heavenward in its solemn tribute to the American home—the foundation of American society and presided over in queenly fashion by the great American mothers.

Annually, Miss Jarvis cooperates with Cabinet members, the military and naval forces, and other governmental dignitaries in making the Mother's Day celebration esteemed as a day of tribute to our mothers and as a day of rededication to those motherly virtues of righteousness and truth.

THE CELEBRATION OF A DAY DEVOTED TO OUR MOTHERS MAKES US A BETTER NATION

No other country in the world anticipated this country in thus recognizing our homes and mothers as the national standard bearers of patriotism. America not only leads the world in resources and material wealth but in patriotism, sentiment, and those spiritual resources that make of this country the glorious world leader that it is, and has been for a generation.

It is indeed most fitting that this annual Mother's Day which originated in America should be acclaimed by the American Congress as a day of gratitude to the beloved living and as a day of remembrance for the honored dead. Miss Jarvis originated this day in her earnest and sincere desire to serve her home and her community. May God bless her and watch over her for many, many years to come.

WRITE HOME TO MOTHER

"Write home" is the injunction to all sons and daughters who have wandered far from home and whose daily lives are filled with material cares. This is an appeal that is answered by every son and daughter in every walk of life. On Mother's Day they forget all the cares and worries of the daily grind and write a letter home to mother, or send a telegram in which in a few words they convey those endearing sentiments of love and devotion. Some send a gift of flowers; others a gift for the home, or candy, or some other token of love and esteem. But, whatever the form or substance, the hearts of millions of mothers are made glad. They rejoice that their efforts have not been in vain. Every one remembers his mother in a special, particular, and even selfish sense. But here selfishness becomes a virtue, for the nobility of selfishness is in making others happy. Here they repay a debt of gratitude in remembering that their mothers took a selfish pride in making them better and happier.

"ALL IS WELL"

"All is well" is heard from far and wide as the children of mothers of the world send their message of cheer and hope. Mothers everywhere are thrilled and inspired by these messages of hope, for hope still springs eternal in the human heart—in the hearts of mothers as well as children—hope in the future and its blessings. "All is well" is a divinely sweet melody that cheers the hearts and souls of motherhood; it is like a shaft of sunshine that gilds the rugged mountain peaks of life. Happy are those children who can send a cheery message to mother on Mother's Day and most divinely happy are they who can look at their mother's silver hair and say that not one single silver hair had been caused by a misdeed of theirs.

As the years roll by Mother's Day takes on greater importance and added significance to those still fortunate in having the guidance of their "gray-haired" mother. But to those whose mothers have gone to their eternal reward, the day is heightened and their devotion to the ideal of mother is increased.

WE REMEMBER THE MOTHERS OF THE WORLD, LIVING AND DEAD

As on Memorial Day, our hearts blossom in gratitude and we remember the brave men upon whom fate placed the laurel wreath of patriotism and sacrifice, so on Mother's Day we lovingly remember those dear departed mothers who, too, had made the supreme sacrifice so that the family and its noble institutions may be perpetuated and enriched. When we place a wreath on the grave of mother on this solemn day, the rich, fresh flowers and the green grass carry us off in fancy where we know that those mothers are serenely walking in green pastures by the calm blue waters. As we gaze heavenward through sapphire skies we feel certain that mother has seen, that she knows we did not forget. For there is nothing nobler than to remember the mothers of the world—living and dead.

Honor thy father and mother stands written among the laws of the most revered righteous. It is the very essence of life and the keystone of human relations. It is the commandment that is dutifully accepted by every creed. Mother's Day thus makes of the sacred commandment a living, throbbing reality.

THE RESOLVE TO GO THE RIGHT WAY

"For all her sorrows and her tears; for all her pains and fears, there's an overpayment of delight, when mother hears—that sons do right." Mother's Day would not have the universal appeal were it merely observed as a day of tribute and gift giving to mothers. Its real importance and value lie in making mothers happy by our doing right—in realizing that mothers would not want us to do otherwise. Its real achievement lies in dedicating ourselves on Mother's Day to so conduct our daily lives throughout the year that we should not cause mother an anxious moment, an unjust fear, or a needless tear. On Mother's Day we resolve to do everything mother's way, which is always the right way, through honor, justice, and humility.

OUR MOTHERS WANT PEACE ON EARTH

In this world of strife and turmoil, Mother's Day is also a day of dedication to the ways of peace. While mothers are not on the fields of battle nor in the trenches, they suffer more than their sons in the shell holes. War's greatest indictment lies in the suffering, agony, and fears endured by the mothers of the world. She had gone down to the valley of the shadow of death to bring forth the son who is perhaps being ruthlessly slaughtered. She had endured untold agonies in bringing the child safely through the helpless years of childhood into manhood. She had bestowed upon him all of her energies, love, and devotion. It breaks her heart to see him torn from her side and sent forth to be maimed or killed. No gift on Mother's Day, no tribute or manifestation of love and devotion to the mothers of the world, can have a fraction of the significance to mothers as the gift of universal peace—the resolution that every mother's son dedicate his very all to the advancement of peace.

THIS CONGRESS HAS MADE THE LIFE OF OUR MOTHERS EASIER

This Congress has done more than any other legislative body in the world to bring peace, comfort, and contentment to the American home and mother by its passage of the Social Security Act. Mother's Day is real and vibrant to us. We have recognized our obligation to the mothers of America in making available adequate appropriations for maternity care. Mother is the holiest thing alive, and motherhood is the holiest of all divine gifts. We have made motherhood for the poor less agonizing and have made it easier for these noble women to raise their children.

THIS CONGRESS HAS BROUGHT SECURITY AND PEACE TO OUR AGED MOTHERS

"Over the hill to the poorhouse" was the usual epilogue to the drama of motherhood. But this, too, has been changed since we have recognized that our tribute to mothers must also take a more material form, and that our mothers are deserving of a better fate than the county home or some charitable institution. The Social Security Act which this Congress enacted has taken a great step forward in abolishing the despicable poorhouse. Its appropriations for pensions for the aged will make it possible for all mothers in America to spend the evening of their lives in their own homes which they cherish—among the children they love.

Mr. Speaker, this is the tribute to mothers that I wish to leave with you on Mother's Day. It is a recognition of our solemn obligation to our mothers, not only on this day but every day of the year. Not only gifts, flowers, telegrams, and letters on the second Sunday in May, but peace, comfort, contentment, and security for mothers every day.

LET US BE WORTHY OF OUR MOTHERS

It is impossible to measure the boundless love of a mother for her child; it is impossible to repay, in a material way, a son's or daughter's debt to a mother. It is needless to give water to the sea or light to the sun; we can never repay for mother love, for it gilds the cradle and illumes the grave. All we can do is hope constantly and pray fervently that we may be worthy of such boundless love and devotion; that all of mother's energies and cares shall not have been spent on us in vain; that we shall have followed her footsteps and leave this world far better and happier than we found it.

CORRECTION OF RECORD

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to correct the permanent RECORD in accordance with the specific language inserted in my speech delivered on the floor of the House this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I heard the speech the gentleman mentions and, of course, I have no objection to the gentleman's changing his remarks in the manner indicated, but the thought occurs to me that such correction as can be made has already been made. The gentleman in the speech he made today retracted certain remarks he made in another speech. I do not understand that a Member can correct the RECORD by taking out things actually said. The gentleman made the speech that is in the RECORD on the other occasion, and I do not understand that you can correct the RECORD by going back and changing a speech previously made.

Mr. Speaker, the point I make is that the speech which appears in the permanent RECORD was actually made by the gentleman. There is no denial of that fact. Now, he says he made the statement under a misapprehension. It seems to me, under the circumstances, the RECORD is complete.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman has the right to correct the RECORD.

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think so.

Mr. SNELL. Of course, he cannot correct what is already in the RECORD.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is what the gentleman is asking to do.

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Speaker, I am asking to strike out one word and three letters in the speech made on January 14, which appears on page 399 of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the request of the gentleman comes too late for that purpose. The speech referred to is already a part of the permanent RECORD.

COINAGE OF 50-CENT PIECES IN COMMEMORATION OF THE ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FOUNDING OF ELGIN, ILL.

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 8234) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the city of Elgin, Ill., and the erection of a heroic pioneer memorial.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the city of Elgin, Ill., and the erection of the heroic Pioneer Memorial, there shall be coined by the Director of the Mint (not more than) 10,000 silver 50-cent pieces of standard size and weight, and of a special appropriate design containing a replica of the "Pioneers" to be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the models for master dies or other preparations for this coinage.

SEC. 2. The coins herein authorized shall be issued at par and only upon request of the chairman of the coinage committee, Elgin Centennial Monumental Committee.

SEC. 3. Such coins may be disposed of at par or at a premium by said committee, and all proceeds shall be used in furtherance of the erecting of the Pioneer Memorial.

SEC. 4. All laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same; regulating and guarding the process of coinage; providing for the purchase of material, and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of coins; for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting; for the security of the coin; or for any purposes, whether said laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein directed.

SEC. 5. The coins authorized herein shall be issued at such times as they shall be requested by the chairman of the coinage committee, Elgin Centennial Monumental Committee, and upon payment to the United States of the face value of such coins.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 6, strike out "ten" and insert "twenty-five."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech recently made by me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at a luncheon of the United States Chamber of Commerce on April 30, 1936:

At the outset it must be borne in mind that communism is not merely a school of political or economic science. In its fuller aspect it is a philosophy of man. It is materialistic in its concept and impracticable in its operation. The purpose of communism is the establishment of a dictatorship of the so-called proletariat—through the medium of class appeal and class groupings. It seeks control of government and then, through the medium of a dictator, to put into operation the principles and policies of communism.

It is unnecessary to discuss in detail the manner in which they are attempting to accomplish their objective. They openly admit the use of any and all means, legal or illegal, or a combination of both, to bring about the objective that they seek. Their efforts in this country are not confined to mere expression or academic discussion. Practical efforts are being made in every conceivable way to create dissatisfaction and discontent and to capitalize on it wherever it exists in order to produce emotional results that will aid them in furthering their cause. They employ the "boring in" policy in labor, educational, religious, fraternal, and other organizations in order to obtain a position of advantage therein so as to influence the policies of such organizations. They employ the "united front" policy, where they join with other organizations in the agitation or furtherance of some program. They are not interested in any such program except as a means of using such organizations in the furtherance of their cause. They join with others, not because they believe in what others fight for, but to use the strength of their organizations for their own advantage. To them, anything in which they engage is simply a means to the end that they seek—the overthrow of government, not through the Constitution, but by force and violence.

At the present time they have a school in New York City with over 2,000 students in attendance each night, receiving instructions in the philosophy of Marx and Engels, and particularly being trained for the practice of sabotage and the exploitation of emotional situations. They are also taught methods which will prolong strikes that might properly be started in an effort to obtain higher wages or better working conditions or shorter hours of labor. In such cases they step in, not to assist in a fair settlement, but to prolong them as long as possible and then abandon the cause, leaving behind them misery and suffering. They are not interested in settlement; they are interested only in prolongation of a strike, exploiting existing conditions as a part of the means to an end. Their training is to enable them to induce others with whom they have nothing in common, to unctiously play their game. They are enemies of all existing governments, except sovietism. They do not owe allegiance to any flag but the red flag of revolution. They are unscrupulous in their demands and in their consideration of the rights of others. They have been making a determined effort for years to bore in on the American Federation of Labor. In one or two cases they have been successful in obtaining control of a union. I have in mind a union in New York City. The leadership of the American Federation of Labor, under President Green, are militantly fighting such efforts. President Green realizes the danger. In the past, little outside attention has been given to the great fight that he and his colleagues have been waging against communism. His great work should receive the attention and praise to which it is entitled. Businessmen should cooperate with President Green. It is to the advantage of business, when dickering with unions, to deal with men of the type of Green—men who stand for his kind of leadership in meeting this problem.

I have referred to a Communist union, originally a part of the A. F. of L., located in New York City. The special committee of which I was chairman investigated this union and found that it forced certain businessmen of New York City to pay tribute to them in order to continue in business. The union imposed a so-called unemployment tax of 3 percent of the total pay rolls of over 200 businessmen in the furrier business, also exacting a similar amount from the employees after forcing them to join the union. This money was used for communistic purposes. This evidence was the sworn testimony of businessmen who had paid the toll. We also received evidence that employees were forced to join this union, and when they resisted force was employed. American businessmen were then forced to pay tribute to this un-American union, and such money was and is being used in an effort to destroy the American Government, including the very business of these men. Some who had resisted testified that their goods were destroyed, their employees attacked and assaulted, finally compelling them to capitulate to the terms imposed. The evidence also shows that no employee had ever received a penny from this fund. The head of the Communist squad of the New York Police Department testified that this union maintained out of the funds received a gangster squad to intimidate employer and employees. Whenever any one of them was arrested, the same attorney always represented them. The lieutenant testified about many attacks on employer and employees, and also that there are at least two murders unsolved of employees who refused to join this union, being killed by the gangster squad of this Communist union. The police know who did it, but they cannot obtain the legal evidence.

Persons of this type should be shown no consideration. They know only the policy of force and violence. Their idea is to instill fear in the minds of others. Whenever such efforts, which disregard the rights of others, are employed, action by the police and courts should be rapid. About a year ago, in a city just outside of Boston, similar methods were employed. The police acted quickly, arresting those involved. The district attorney in charge acted quickly, prosecuting the cases and sending the offenders to jail. Raising of various funds for lawbreakers is simply a part of their program.

They are not interested directly in such persons or their cases, but simply in using a particular situation as a medium of exploitation. They are not interested in legislation except as a means to an end, to agitate and induce good Americans to become confused, or to exploit them, and to have them unconsciously play their game in politics. The Communist movement is not a political party. That is where the Columbia Broadcasting Co. made its mistake recently in allowing Earl Browder, head of the Communist Party of the United States, to use their facilities. If a Communist should be elected President of the United States, he could never take office. I have noted their recent statements about a Farmer-Labor Party, urging others to join with them in this movement. There are persons in this country who believe in such a party but who are opponents of communism. To them such a party is intended as a means of obtaining changes in the Government by the enactment of legislation in a constitutional manner. That is not the purpose of the Communists. Their purpose is to use such a political party as a part of their revolutionary program. This fact should be borne in mind by Americans interested in the formation of such a party. They should not permit themselves to be deceived by the Communists. The Communists' purpose, so far as such a party is concerned, is to obtain control of and use it as a means of furthering their objective. It is simply a part of their scheme. While under our law one can become a member of any political party that he desires to join, such action is voluntary. Nevertheless, the organizers and leaders of a Farmer-Labor Party, if one is organized nationally, either now or later, should not permit Communists to obtain control or even obtain a position of influence therein.

The Americans are a patient people. We have been for years the fertile field of foreign propagandists. However, when we awaken, we act, and usually, effectively. I remember several years ago when a European country was spreading propaganda in this country. We tolerated it for some time, and then became disgusted. An aroused public opinion asserted itself, in consequence of which the State Department acted. If it had not, a congressional committee would have been appointed to make an investigation. That kind of propaganda stopped.

Only a few years ago the committee of which I was chairman was appointed to investigate the Nazi, communism, and other un-American activities in this country. We obtained and gave to the American people such evidence that an aroused public opinion demanded that the efforts emanating from abroad cease. They have ceased.

For years we have listened to the prattle of these avowed haters of our country and their ideals, blasting the peace and quiet of our land with their advocacy of communism, by force and violence, as a panacea for all economic and social ills. We are getting tired of it. It is about time that we passed legislation that will make the members of this antisocial movement respect the rights of American citizens. It is about time that we passed legislation making it a crime to knowingly and willfully advocate the overthrow of government by force and violence. Such a bill is pending in the House of Representatives, having been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. It is now before the Rules Committee. The Rules Committee should report a rule in order that this bill might be considered by the House. I have tried to obtain such a rule, but have not been successful to date. That bill will pass overwhelmingly if brought out on the floor.

The people of the United States should demand that the Rules Committee bring this bill before the House. I urge all who are listening to demand the members of the Rules Committee to bring out this bill. Legislation should also be passed this session providing for the deportation of alien Communists. Over 50 percent of the members of the Communist Party are aliens. They advocate the destruction of our Government, and at the same time claim its protection. They earn their living under the protection of the Government that they hate and seek to destroy. They are not entitled to any sympathy or consideration. Drastic legislation along such lines should be passed at once. While this malignant theory of communism can never find any substantial support among the liberty-loving people of our Nation, nevertheless we must work to eliminate the evil results which proceed from their doctrine of force and violence. I do not recognize the advocacy of force and violence as constituting freedom of speech. It is license. One might just as well argue that the offering of human sacrifice as a part of a religious belief constitutes freedom of religious conscience.

I recently read a book written by Earl Browder, secretary of the Communist Party of the United States, who is the leader of the movement in this country, wherein he admitted that such conditions as would constitute a revolutionary situation do not exist in this country. Despite that fact, he urges his followers to direct their efforts toward effecting such a situation. That shows completely their insincerity, their duplicity, their hypocrisy; that demonstrates that their philosophy cannot stand up under the light of reason. That is why they appeal to the unfortunate who is distressed; to those who are discontented; to those who are emotionally moved. They are trying to use those who can be swayed through emotion to obtain their objective. It is a sinister plot. They dare not resort to the constitutional method for bringing about changes. They have the opportunity under the Constitution to try to obtain their end, if they desire. They can advocate communism within the law by appealing to the people to vote for candidates pledged to the changes they advocate. If they are successful in influencing the people and electing enough legislators, they can change the Constitution. That is the constitutional way. But they dare not employ the method created by the framers of the Constitution. To do so they must appeal to reason. Lacking logical principles for an appeal to reason, they resort to the use of force and violence.

To again show their hypocrisy and the insincerity of their position, the same author, in an attempt to defend the use of force and violence, very blissfully states that the Communist Party advocates such drastic action only when the existing Government refuses peaceably to transfer to them control of its functions. He emphasizes the fact that force and violence are unavoidable in the United States because the people of this Nation do not desire communism. Therefore, they must be forced to accept it. They admit that the Government cannot be made into a soviet nation under the present constitutional processes which require the sanction of the people. Hence the great majority of our people who are peace-loving citizens must endure the wild and irrational acts of a small anti-American, antisocial group.

Earl Browder, in his recent book, What is Communism?, presents one of the best arguments against communism that I have ever read. In his attempt to further communism he exposes its hypocrisy—its weakness—he presents its true picture.

Of course, everyone knows that communism is opposed to every ideal that we stand for. It is opposed to the family life as it exists among religious people. It is opposed to religion in any form. It openly advocates the destruction of religion. It is opposed to religious freedom; to the freedom of speech and of the press; to the right of trial by jury. It stands for the confiscation of property. It is opposed to personal liberty in every form.

Yet Browder, in his book, What Is Communism, urges Communists to associate with religious groups and to organize them under the guise of the "united front." He states in no uncertain language that prospective Communists need not sever their religious affiliations before joining the movement, but after they join they will be subjected to a very rigorous educational process, in which the author expects the novice to see, as all Communists should, that religion must be destroyed. He talks about liquidation if the objective should be obtained. By liquidation he means what happened in Russia—the murder or imprisonment of all who oppose. In his book he also boasts of certain ministers who are cooperating with Communists under the "united front" policy. He ridicules and scorns them. I wonder how those he mentions feel after reading his book in the realization that he boasts of their use and then condemns them for believing in God and a hereafter. If such men have any judgment at all they will at once withdraw from any "united front" alliances that they now have with the Communists. Their efforts are to obtain the changes they advocate and which they believe are for the best interests of the people and to continue as ministers their work of God as their religion dictates. That is not so with the Communists. To them their "united front" efforts with others are simply a means to an end, using others in any way that they can, but intending to suppress them as well as all others if communism should be successful. How can they work with such men as Browder? Although I do not hold the same religious beliefs as these minorities, yet my respect for the freedom of religious worship urges me to warn them of the pitfalls to which their association with the Communists will inevitably lead. They are jeopardizing their own freedom of religious worship along with the freedom enjoyed by all others by permitting these scoffers and enemies of all religions to masquerade under their banner. What I have said also applies to a small group of professors.

In his book, Browder admits that Communists owe no allegiance to the United States. He states that Communists will not serve in any conflict in which our country might be engaged. He attempts to justify such action by declaring that communism is opposed to all wars. However, he boasts of the allegiance of Communists to the Soviet Union, urging all to join with Russia in defense of the Soviet Union. In other words, Communists will not fight for the United States but will fight for Soviet Russia. His hypocrisy is exposed. This is a valuable lesson to real Americans who believe in peace and who are doing all that they can to bring about permanent peace, but who will fight in the defense of our country. I warn you not to become allied with Communists under another phrase of the united-front policy. I particularly refer to the League Against War and Fascism, a communistic organization, and to certain college-student organizations.

The Constitution of the United States provides for any kind of a change the people desire. But communism is not content to proceed in the way provided for by the Constitution.

Under communism, personal liberty, which can exist only in a democracy, would be destroyed. It is suppressed under all forms of dictatorship. It is not necessary to mention history to support this statement. I call your attention to the countries of the present day wherein dictatorships exist. Personal liberty has been destroyed; persecution, fear, and force exist. The state is supreme. The individual has no rights. This is what communism stands for. It goes even further than most forms of dictatorship in its destructiveness of human rights. It does not even tolerate the existence of religion in any form. In fact, it makes war on religion and religious freedom—one of the great cornerstones of personal liberty.

Let the Communists renounce their advocacy of force and violence in trying to obtain their objective, a dictatorship of the proletariat, with its destruction of every ideal that America stands for. Let the people decide the issue in the manner provided by the Constitution; and while I will disagree with their objective and oppose their efforts, as is my right, I will fight to preserve their constitutional rights. In this way they will be acting within the Constitution and the law. I do not recognize the right of any movement to willfully and deliberately advocate the overthrow of government by force and violence.

We have plenty of problems confronting us. Fortunately, we have the means of peaceably determining our problems. They will not be solved by dictatorship of any kind, particularly of communism, nazi-ism, or fascism. This movement, guided and directed from abroad, international in its character, claiming the protection of our institutions and at the same time hating them, and trying to destroy them, should be exposed for the alien, un-American movement that it is.

Communists are using a new line of defense by branding those who attack their activities or who make speeches along American lines as Fascists.

The passage of legislation making it a crime to willfully and knowingly advocate the overthrow of government by force and violence, and the strengthening of the deportation laws relating to alien Communists will, from a legislative angle, meet their efforts. No American fears such legislation. Such legislation does not affect the right of anyone to advocate any change that they believe in, provided they do so within the law. Society is justified—in fact, it is its duty—to protect itself and its law-abiding people against those who disregard the Constitution and the existing law.

VETO MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—CAPT. PERCY WRIGHT FOOTE (H. DOC. NO. 489)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, H. R. 7092, a bill for the relief of Capt. Percy Wright Foote, United States Navy.

Briefly stated, this bill provides that in recognition of his having been wounded in line of duty and of his exceptionally meritorious service in combat with the enemy during the World War, the line-selection board of the Navy in its consideration of officers eligible for consideration for selection for promotion to the grade of rear admiral may base its recommendation in the case of Capt. Percy Wright Foote upon his comparative fitness for the shore duties of the grade of rear admiral; that he shall remain on the active list of the Navy in his present rank until the report of the next senior selection board of the Navy shall have been approved; that if selected for promotion he shall be retained in his present rank on the active list until promoted to the rank of rear admiral; and that in the event of his selection and subsequent promotion he shall be carried as an additional number in grade.

The records of the Navy Department show that Captain Foote was appointed a naval cadet on May 20, 1897; commissioned ensign from June 6, 1903; promoted to the grades of lieutenant (junior grade) and lieutenant from June 7, 1907; promoted to the grade of lieutenant commander from March 10, 1914; promoted to the temporary grade of commander from August 31, 1917; commissioned regular a commander from July 1, 1919; and promoted to the grade of captain from January 1, 1924, in which grade he is now serving.

In 1916 the system of promotion by selection was initiated in the Navy, with the object of insuring that only those officers deemed best fitted would reach command rank. Captain Foote has failed of selection before three selection boards, namely, those convened in 1933, 1934, and 1935, and under existing law he will be retired, because of service ineligibility for promotion, on June 30, 1936. Because of the provisions of the act of March 4, 1925, as amended by the act of March 3, 1931, the terms of which permit retirement in the next higher grade of those officers specially commended for their performance of duty in actual combat with the enemy during the World War, Captain Foote would, if retired on June 30, 1936, do so in the grade of rear admiral.

On September 27, 1934, a special board of medical examiners pronounced Captain Foote physically qualified to perform all his duties at sea; and on his annual physical examinations on January 15, 1935, and December 19, 1935, he was found physically qualified to perform all his duties at sea or on shore. Because of the terms of the bill specifying that he shall be considered by the line-selection board of the Navy on a basis of comparative fitness for shore duty, approval of this bill would result in his being singled out for special consideration, as the other officers under consideration by the board would be competing on a basis of ability to perform all the duties of the higher grade.

At the present time the Navy is operating under a promotion system considered necessary to its efficiency. Medical records indicate Captain Foote's physical qualifications to perform all the duties of his grade, and he has been afforded ample opportunity for selection. In the absence of special circumstances sufficient to warrant his being placed in a class by himself the Navy Department feels that this legislation tends to break down the laws relating to promotion by selection. In the judgment of three selection boards Captain Foote was not one of those best fitted for promotion to the grade of rear admiral, and the Navy Department has never had reason to question these recommendations.

Justification for the enactment of this bill is based on the recital in the bill that it is "in recognition of his having been wounded in line of duty and of his 'exceptionally meritorious service' in combat with the enemy during the World War." It follows that the bill is calculated to bestow upon Captain Foote a benefit in addition to that to which he is entitled by virtue of the law providing for his retirement in the next higher grade.

The Navy Department is of the opinion that his service was not of such outstanding character as to warrant the unusual preferment this bill would extend to him alone, and to the exclusion of other officers whose records of service are equally meritorious; and that existing law is adequate to fully reward Captain Foote for his service during the World War.

For the above-stated reasons and because of the effect this legislation would have on existing law governing promotion by selection, I do not feel justified in approving this bill. I have come to this conclusion with great personal reluctance because of my knowledge of Captain Foote's war service.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 6, 1936.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread at large upon the Journal.

Mr. DREWRY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill and message be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—RODMAN CHEMICAL CO. (H. DOC. NO. 490)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following further message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, House Joint Resolution No. 223, entitled "Joint resolution conferring upon the Court of Claims jurisdiction of the claim of the Rodman Chemical Co. against the United States."

This resolution is designed to accomplish a fourfold purpose, to wit:

(a) It would confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to entertain a suit against the United States by the Rodman Chemical Co., of Verona, Pa., assignee of Hugh Rodman, for recovery of compensation for the use (prior to the issuance of a patent) of an invention by Hugh Rodman, covering a process for making activated carbon, notwithstanding the Commissioner of Patents had issued no order to keep such invention secret under the provisions of the act of October 6, 1917 (40 Stat. 394; U. S. C. 35–42), entitled "An act to prevent the publication of inventions by the grant of patents that might be detrimental to the public safety or convey useful information to the enemy, to stimulate invention, and provide adequate protection to owners of patents, and for other purposes."

(b) It would entitle the Rodman Chemical Co. to claim reasonable compensation for the alleged use of the Rodman process, made by the United States prior to issuance of the patent thereon, to the same extent as if the Commissioner of Patents had issued an order to keep the invention secret, prior to such use; and further, such compensation would begin from the date of such use by the United States.

(c) The transcript of record of the interference proceedings between John C. Woodruff, appellant, and Hugh Rodman—No. 46630, District of Columbia Court of Appeals, April term 1925, Patent Appeal Docket No. 1815—would be made competent and admissible evidence before the Court of Claims on the issue of use by the United States of the Rodman inventions.

(d) The statute of limitations would be waived, provided the suit in question is brought within 1 year after the date of the passage of this resolution.

Proceedings in such suit are to be similar to claims filed in the Court of Claims under section 145 of the Judicial Code, as amended. The Government may plead any defenses set forth in title 60, Revised Statutes.

The relief that would be afforded by this resolution extends to the Rodman Chemical Co. and not to the inventor of the subject matter of the patent as an individual. The Rodman Chemical Co. has heretofore filed suit in the Court of Claims based on the provisions of the act of October 6, 1917, or, in the alternative, under the act of June 25, 1910, as amended by the act of July 1, 1918. The latter statute gives patent owners the right to sue the United States for infringement of their monopoly. The act of October 6, 1917, relates to the publication of inventions during the war and the granting of compensation under certain conditions for wartime use of inventions tendered to the United States. The court held that the case did not fall within either of the acts relied upon by the claimant, and dismissed the petition on February 20, 1928. The plaintiff's petition for a writ of certiorari was denied by the Supreme Court on May 14, 1928 (277 U. S. 592; U. S. C. Cls. 772).

In view of the foregoing, it is apparent that awarding relief in this case would constitute a discrimination which would be unfair to other potential claimants in a similar situation. It would, in effect, tend to nullify essential provisions of the act of October 6, 1917. It would encourage a multiplicity of similar bills and result in the revival of many old war claims in that class of cases, heretofore dismissed by the Court of Claims because of failure to comply with certain express provisions of the act of October 6, 1917. For the above reasons, I do not feel that I would be justified in giving my approval to this legislation.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 7, 1936.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread at large upon the Journal.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill and message be referred to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

"THE PLOW THAT BROKE THE PLAINS", RESETTLEMENT FILM, LAUDED HIGHLY, SHOWS NEED FOR CONSERVATION

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT LAGS IN MOVIES—RESETTLEMENT ADMINISTRATION MOVIE SETS NEW STANDARD

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I have just had the pleasure of seeing a number of documentary films arranged in a program by the Museum of Modern Art Film Library. On this program was a film The Plow That Broke the Plains, which tells the story of the destruction of natural resources in the grasslands.

The headlines of the Washington Post say this morning, front page, double column, right on top, "Tugwell farmers' lot is sad compared to Soviet film ideal." It is true that a Russian film was shown, but so were films from France, Great Britain, and Germany. The tone and statement of the Post article omitted the fact that other countries were represented. Moreover, the article virtually snubbed the Film Library as well as the Embassies of France, England, and Germany.

GERMAN, ENGLISH, RUSSIAN, AND FRENCH FILMS

The Russian film showed immense cooperatives and hard-working people, smiling faces. The German film showed its work camps for men; solemn faces. Whether Stalin had ordered a smile or Hitler had demanded solemn looks, I do not know. It may all have been propaganda.

England was shown as being once a country of hills and beautiful farmlands; then its process of industrialization and uglification was depicted, with its present policy of slum clearance and cheap public power. The French film showed the beauty of the country, and the progress of its railroads; handsome waiters passed out cool drinks to up-and-coming tourists. Trains slid through the French countryside at 200 kilometers an hour. The American film showed the tremendous waste of natural resources in the United States of America, principally of the Great Plains, which is the Middle West of the United States, starting in Montana and going through the Panhandle of Texas.

The American film showed a most important phase of American life: It showed that in this plains country 40,000,000 acres are now completely destroyed, with topsoil gone; another 200,000,000 acres are badly damaged and likely to be lost, unless something is done at once—and this out of only a total of 400,000,000 acres in the whole area.

The Film Library in arranging this program of documentary films from five nations is doing a real service. I think that as many of the foreign films should be shown as possible. For instance, certainly Swedish, Norwegian, and Danish films should be shown. Especially of Sweden, if Marquis Childs' book is correct—and I am sure it is correct in most of its factual aspects. Sweden has made tremendous advances in planned villages, in its cooperatives, in slum clearance, and in bettering life in general. Hence, a Swedish film would have been instructive.

MEN AGAINST DUST

While criticisms may be made of the Resettlement film because it shows the horrible waste of our natural resources, I think that films of that character must by all means be shown to awaken our citizens to the necessity for immediate steps in conservation. Moreover, the whole field of documentary films, which show the real problems of American life, offers a tremendous opportunity of development on the part of private companies.

Personally, however, I think a picturization of our forests, lands, waters—everything we have which is natural—also showing the hideous waste that we Americans have practiced should by all means be done. I do not object to the private film corporations, and it is entertaining to see Groucho Marx do his stuff; it is sometimes stimulating to see a love affair; while Walt Disney's Silly Symphonies and Mickey Mouse are outright grand. But thus far there has been no private film devoted to a serious treatment of saying we must be thrifty in the preservation of our own natural resources. Why do not the private film companies show unemployment, poorly planned cities, lack of sanitation—something about the plight of the sharecroppers and farm tenants who have no purchasing power?

It takes all kinds of people to make a world—and it takes all kinds of films to show what is really going on. We can sit around and gaze at love films and gasp and groan; we can shed a few tears and bust loose with lots of laughter—but we should also use our brains.

UNITED STATES LAGS IN EDUCATIONAL MOVIES

Mr. Speaker, this country is the furthest advanced of all nations on earth in movie technique, production, and equipment. But that is not true of the Government. In the production of films some progress has been made, but not much in comparison to other nations. In England the General Post Office has completed over 400 documentary films. In France the finest musicians and technical workmen are employed by the Government to dramatize its work. Even in smaller nations, such as Mexico, the motion picture is recognized as an important medium for Government information. We are the most backward government of any civilized, first-class nation in our utilization of the motion picture.

As a government, we are far behind and we might as well face the fact that it is a perfectly proper thing and quite desirable to have the best type of movies to be used for educational and informational purposes by the Government. I favor the full development of the movies by the United States Government for the purposes mentioned.

I wish to make it clear that I do not believe in Government competition with private industry, but the Federal Government should produce its own educational films.

FAMOUS DIRECTORS PRAISE

The Resettlement picture has aroused highly favorable comment not only from public officials but from high figures in the motion-picture industry. I should like at this point to read telegrams from two of the leading directors in Hollywood. One is from King Vidor, who produced Our Daily Bread, awarded an international prize for producing the finest picture of 1934; he also directed The Big Parade, The Crowd, The Champ, and is now doing The Texas Ranger. Mr. Vidor says:

Please accept my congratulations for the splendid picture you have made The Plow That Broke the Plains. Not only does it drive its point forcefully and graphically but it utilizes the motion-picture medium in its purest form; something that pictures made solely for entertainment purposes barely have an opportunity to do. I feel that in spite of its moderate length, no one who sees this picture can help but be impressed by the broad scope it embraces.

Lewis Milestone, who has praised the Resettlement picture, is also one of the top directors in Hollywood. He directed The Front Page, All Quiet on the Western Front, and is now doing The General Died at Dawn, which was written by Clifford Odets. Mr. Milestone says:

I saw The Plow That Broke the Plains, Resettlement Administration production written and directed by Pare Lorentz. I have also seen a great many documentary films of all nations and regard Mr. Lorentz's by far the best. It has more emotion and drama without the use of human characters than most plays can provide with living beings, because it is based on the truth. In my opinion the Government would gain its aims for the people with much more surety by releasing this and other such intelligent documentary films for general public education.

CRITICS PRAISE FILM

The newspaper critics and commentators who have no ax to grind have been unequivocal in their praise.

Bob McCormick, of the Scripps-Howard Washington News, says, among other things, in lauding the film:

The photography is indescribable. It is a series of magnificent scenes, flowing together in continuity sufficient to carry the story. It may have been equaled in other pictures shown in Washington, but it is doubtful if it has been excelled. * * * Movie experts in the Federal service here say the production, a three-reeler, is perhaps the finest ever turned out by a government. This includes the artistic efforts of the Russians and the Germans.

Betty Hynes, dramatic critic for the Washington Herald, says, in commenting on the entire program of documentary films:

Most dramatic of all was the contribution of Mr. Lorentz, who took America's tragic dust storms and graphically told their history. * * * An amazing, stirring picture. * * *

Under the headline "The New Deal's First Major Movie Effort Packs a Terriffic Punch", Mr. Fredrick C. Othman, United Press staff correspondent, says:

Before the final fade-out it had diplomats, Congressmen, and New Dealers holding to the edges of their gilt chairs. It may have been preaching a sermon, but it surpassed many a Hollywood epic for sheer drama and technical excellence.

OFFICIALS LAUD PICTURE

A number of public officials have praised The Plow That Broke the Plains in no uncertain terms. Time will not permit quoting all of them, but I should like to give just a line or two from each one:

Secretary Wallace has said:

* * * It is a moving record of what happened where farmers encouraged by their Government plowed lands which should never have been taken out of grass. * * * The combination (musical score and photography) is a thrilling example of what is almost a new art. The picture is an astonishingly graphic portrayal of land use history of the Great Plains. * * *

Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin, says:

The Plow That Broke the Plains is one of the finest pictures I have ever seen. Simply, yet dramatically, it tells the story of the havoc wrought by the improvident use of our soil resources. I wish every one in this country could see it, because to do so is to be impressed with the urgent need for national action to restore the balance nature demands in the use of her resources.

Senator PAT HARRISON, of Mississippi, says:

This film in my opinion is an agricultural Cavalcade.

Senator ALVA ADAMS, of Colorado, says:

The film is a vivid dramatic presentation of the unplanned cooperation of land-hungry men, war, drought, and wind in the destruction of the grasslands of the West. It is a remarkable film production.

FOREWORD

The Plow That Broke the Plains is a saga of the land of the Great Plains area of the United States. Dramatized in 10 principal sequences, the film traces the story of the plains country during the last 50 years. This panorama of American history surveys the successive movements in the Great Plains area—the passing of the buffalo, the successive invasions of range cattle, the homesteader, and the large-scale wheat farmer. Dramatized, too, are the disastrous dust storms which whip across once fertile acres, carrying away rich topsoil and bringing tragedy to the Great Plains. The production also shows in pictorial and graphic detail the work which the Resettlement Administration is doing in the Great Plains area.

THE SCENARIO BY SEQUENCES

Sequence 1. Grass: "First there was grass * * * a treeless wind-swept continent of grass * * * a country of high winds and sun * * * without rivers, without streams, and with little rain."

Sequence 2. Cattle: "Then came the cattle. Up from the Rio Grande * * * in from the rolling prairies. * * * Down clear from the eastern highways the cattle rolled into the old buffalo range. * * *

"An empty, inexhaustible pasture—an unfenced, uncharted range, a thousand miles long. * * * With the southern plains for winter grazing and the mountain sweeps for summer grazing it was a cattleman's paradise. * * *

"Fortunes in beef! Railroads brought the markets to the edge of the plains * * * land syndicates poured cattle into the grasslands from the world over. * * * Cattle syndicates and land speculators followed the steers into the grasslands * * * by 1886 not an acre was unclaimed. * * *

"More cattle * * * the railroad brought the market closer and it brought the sheepman and dirt farmer * * *."

Sequence 3. The Homesteader: "* * * the plowman followed the herder * * * and the pioneer found the plains.

"Land in the West! * * * land in the last frontier * * * new land for new populations.

"* * * 160 acres of Government land * * * free homesteads for farmers—by steamship, rail, and wagon trains they poured in * * *.

"The first fence—and the last of the free range."

And came the reaper as the plowman harvested. "Free land in the West * * * 320 acres of Government land * * * 100,000 new farmers in a year—a half million settlers in a decade. * * * Progress came to the plains." And with rains the harvests were bountiful.

Sequence 4. Warning: "Many were disappointed * * * as the rains failed and the sun baked the light soil * * *.

"They fought the loneliness and the hard years—but the rain failed them and they moved on.

"There was fresh land in the West * * * there was more grass farther on—new homesteads—new land for the taking * * * and there was a new day coming * * * a golden day for the plains—a day of new causes—new profits and new hopes."

Sequence 5. War: "Wheat will win the war! Plant wheat! Plant the cattle ranges * * * plant your vacant lots * * * plant wheat! Wheat for the boys over there! Wheat for the Allies! Wheat for the British! Wheat for the French! Wheat for the Belgians! Wheat will win the war!"

Sequence 6. Speculation: "Then we reaped the golden harvest * * * then we really plowed the plains. We had turned under millions of new acres for war wheat. We had the manpower. We invented new machinery. The world was our market! And the rains held on. By 1923 the old grasslands had become the new wheatlands * * *."

But speculation led to a crash, while * * *.

Sequence 7. Drought: "* * * once again the rains held off and the sun baked the earth. But this time no grass held moisture against the winds and the sun * * *. This time millions of acres of plowed lands lay open to the sun.

"1930—the worst drought in the history of the plains!

"1931—the rains held off—and the machinery rusted * * *.

"1932—no seed to plant—no land to put it in * * *.

"1933—and still the rains held off * * * and then the high winds and the sun took toll from the plowed acres turned to the sun * * * and then the high winds came."

Sequence 8. Dust storms: "High winds whipped across once fertile acres, bringing death and disaster * * * bringing havoc to farms, tragedy to human beings."

Sequence 9. Devastation: "Baked out—blown out—and broke! For 6 years the cattleman, the sheepman, and the dirt farmer fought the worst drought in the history of the country * * * their cattle starved on the barren land—or died in sandstorms. Their homes turned to a nightmare of swirling dust day and night—their farms were buried under tidal drifts and their lands turned to desert wastes.

"Many left, but many stayed until stock, machinery, homes, credit, food, and, finally, even hope were gone.

"For 6 years they fought sun and wind and watched their homes blow away until finally they left the plains by thousands. * * *

"Once again they headed west—in 1935 over 30,000 refugees hit the road out of the drought country every summer month and headed for the last border—the Pacific. * * *

"Nothing to stay for—nothing to eat—nothing to hope for. Homeless—penniless and bewildered—looking for a stopping place * * * they joined the great army of the highway.

"No place to go—and no place to stop—no more frontiers—no more land—their homes on four wheels * * * their work in the fields—in the towns—along the highways.

"No more frontiers—except the great new frontier of reconstruction. Frontier of rehabilitation for damaged lands and for damaged lives.

"* * * 400,000,000 acres—the Great Plains seemed inexhaustible, but in 50 years we turned the grass lands into the dust bowl * * *."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. WALSH presented the memorial of Acushnet Grange, No. 285, of Acushnet, Mass., remonstrating against the enactment of the so-called Pettengill bill, being the bill (H. He also presented resolutions adopted by the Worcester County Christian Endeavor Union and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Holliston, both in the State of Massachusetts, favoring the enactment of legislation to include not only the elimination of unfair trade practices in the motion-picture industry but also higher moral standards of production, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented petitions and letters in the nature of petitions from Boston Terminal Lodge, No. 1089, B. R. C., of Boston; Bunker Hill Lodge, No. 1099, Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express and Station Employees, of Somerville; Railroad Lodge, No. 487, International Association of Machinists, of Springfield; Division No. 571, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of West Springfield; E. A. Smith Division, No. 146, Order of Railway Conductors, of Fitchburg, and sundry citizens, being railroad workers, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the enactment of the bill (S. 4174) to foster and protect interstate commerce by authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to approve or disapprove of the consolidation or abandonment of carrier facilities of public service, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PROTECTION OF DOMESTIC SUGARBEET AND SUGARCANE PRODUCERS

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a letter from Mr. Chester H. Gray, Washington representative of the American Farm Bureau Federation, and a telegram signed by Hon. Richard W. Leche, Governor-elect of Louisiana, and Hon. Allen J. Ellender, Senator-elect from Louisiana. The communications have to do with proposed legislation designed for the protection of domestic producers of sugarbeets and sugarcane, which is of vital importance to such producers.

There being no objection, the letter and telegram were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., May 8, 1936.

Senator JOHN H. OVERTON,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR OVERTON: I have examined your measure, S. 4560, a measure to protect domestic producers of sugarbeets and sugarcane, and find it very much in accord with Farm Bureau policies.

This is a very satisfactory measure, as are the two measures of Congressman KNIFFIN, of Ohio, recently introduced. We seem now to be approaching a time, after considerable experimentation on the sugar question, in which we are getting back to the sound principle of having no quotas on domestic sugar. Whatever quotas may be necessary should be applied exclusively to off-shore products, and such quotas should be variable from year to year so as to admit into continental United States only those amounts of cane and beet sugar which domestic producers do not supply.

It may be reasonably stated that the policy of the last 2 years in regard to sugar has been one which adequately has protected American investments in Puerto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippines. It cannot be denied, also, that cane and beet producers in continental United States during the last 2 years have made more money, owing to the benefit payments, but they have made that money on the unsound basis of surrendering three-fourths of the great American sugar-consuming market to the foreigners. Such a solution of the domestic farm problem cannot be tolerated as a permanent proposition. The bills now under consideration by yourself and Congressman KNIFFIN should receive the support of all who believe in expanding production of a crop like sugar, which is capable of great expansion, and when expanded, will serve, among other purposes, the useful function of reducing production in other staple crops.

It is hoped that your measure and its companion bill before the House can be immediately considered before proper committees of the House and Senate.

Please feel free to command me in any way in which the Farm Bureau Federation can help in presenting the merits of the measure.

Very respectfully,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
CHESTER H. GRAY,
Washington Representative.

BATON ROUGE, LA., May 7, 1936.

United States Senator JOHN H. OVERTON,
Washington, D. C.:

Representatives of the American Sugar Cane League, which comprises 9,000 cane growers of Louisiana, have had a conference with us today, and we are convinced that their plight under the 220,000 quota for Louisiana sugar production prescribed in S. 4413, now being discussed in Congress, is extremely serious. The quota offered Louisiana is not only 100,000 tons less than actually produced last year, but it is less by considerably more than 100,000 tons than the average production of the State in the 1909–14 period, which was 350,000 tons, and that is the period the Government uses as its yardstick of parity in fixing the farmers' purchasing power. In the division of quotas among all the sugar areas based upon 1909–14 parity years the quota given Louisiana flagrantly discriminates against our State, and we must seriously protest such unfair treatment accorded our people. The avowed purpose of the administration has been repeatedly declared by its spokesmen in authority to be to restore the farmers' purchasing power by bringing about a parity between the price he received for his produce and the price he has to pay for the things he has to buy. The principle of parity income is obviously defeated if he is not allowed to raise the complete crop produced during the 1909–14 parity period. We trust that you and all the other members of the Louisiana delegation in the Senate and House will vote against the Harrison-Costigan sugar bill, now known as S. 4413, unless the quota provision is so amended as to give Louisiana a quota of 450,000 tons, which is the minimum necessary for the survival of one of Louisiana's most important industries. Please introduce and fight for amendment to this effect. If unsuccessful on amendment, please use every effort to kill this discriminatory legislation. Please convey to the President and the Secretary of Agriculture our serious protest against such unfair legislation as is proposed.

RICHARD W. LECHE, Governor-elect of Louisiana.
ALLEN J. ELLENDER, United States Senator-elect.

CONSERVATIVE AMERICA

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and to lie on the table an editorial from the Great Falls (Mont.) Tribune of April 27, 1936, the leading newspaper of the State of Montana, entitled "Conservative America."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Great Falls (Mont.) Tribune of Apr. 27, 1936]

CONSERVATIVE AMERICA

Alarmists wailing over radical innovations in the United States, whenever any change is proposed in the customary methods of government, only bear out the truth of a statement made by Senator WHEELER in an interview in St. Paul recently. The Senator declared the United States has the most conservative government on earth today, by which he meant "one which has upset accustomed procedure and policy to a lesser extent than any other in the world."

It is a peculiar trait in Americans that they are radical in some matters and concern is expressed by very few national leaders over that form of radical innovation, but if the slightest change is proposed in political set-up or policy, there is an immediate outpouring of vehement protests from high quarters.

In business and industrial affairs we have been going through a period of the most fundamental changes, and the man who expresses fear at that process is scoffed at as ignorant of sound economics. Great industrial organizations closely linked to or controlled by tremendous financial institutions, rapid development of the chain system of business, growth of the holding company system, development of a management interest in great corporations disassociated from ownership of the property by powerless scattered stockholders, are all radical changes in our American life whose ultimate effects we cannot foresee clearly and which certainly raise serious questions. Regimentation of the individual by the State, which is pictured as a serious menace by conservative leaders, is relatively insignificant beside the economic regimentation to which the common individual is subjected by great business organizations, and yet that is passed over as a natural condition.

In our adoption of mechanical devices and industrial processes we have been bold and unhesitating, scrapping whole industries, tremendously changing the lives of great groups of people, and remodeling the environment in which we all live without any attempt to measure the ultimate effects of radical changes of this nature on society.

But if the slightest change is proposed in a rule of government, the least restriction on a court power, or the most obvious alteration in customary political procedure, eminent gentlemen, who are enjoying great advantages, cry darkly about "Moscow" and radicalism. And many humble people, who do not have a very clear idea of what the issue is, take up the cry because of their habitual conservatism in matters political.

Policies that other countries will adopt as a matter of course to meet some immediate need send us into spasms of discussion and the old ghost of radicalism is trotted out to scare the voters away from the innovation.

Our cosmopolitan population, with diverse racial strains and origins; our many sections, with conflicting economic interests; and our Federal system, with its division of responsibility, which is difficult to adapt to new industrial and scientific developments, are some of the reasons for that political conservatism which marks us as a nation. Our political system has remained without fundamental alteration for a longer period now than that of almost any great power.

To recognize this trait is not necessarily to criticize it, but that recognition does point out the proper direction for our concern. It is not innovation in government that is our most constant danger, but the undirected and rapid changes in industrial and business methods.

(Mr. BENSON also introduced Senate Joint Resolution 263, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and appears under a separate heading.)

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 8234) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the city of Elgin, Ill., and the erection of a heroic Pioneer Memorial was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I move a reconsideration of the action of the Senate in discharging the Committee on Banking and Currency from the further consideration of Senate bill 4511 to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the incorporation of credit unions within the District of Columbia", approved June 23, 1932, and the bill (S. 4512) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a code of laws for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901, and referring them to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Those bills were introduced by the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, and properly referred to the Banking and Currency Committee, because they relate to banking matters.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was advised by the clerk and others that the bills properly belonged in the District Committee. I made no investigation and assumed that they were properly referred to that committee.

Mr. GLASS. They were properly referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, the chairman of which committee is now ill at his home, and it is at his request, and in conformity with my own judgment, that I ask that the action be reconsidered and that the bills be returned to the Committee on Banking and Currency where we are now conducting hearings on them.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to that action being taken.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the motion of the Senator from Virginia that the Committee on the District of Columbia be discharged from the further consideration of the bills referred to by him and that they be rereferred to the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I now understand the parliamentary situation. I could not hear the request of the Senator from Virginia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There were two bills introduced and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, as the Chair understands. Subsequently the Committee on Banking and Currency was discharged from their further consideration, and they were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. The Senator from Virginia now asks that the Committee on the District of Columbia be discharged from their further consideration and that they be referred again to the Committee on Banking and Currency. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bills are referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

INTERNAL-REVENUE TAXATION—AMENDMENTS

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted several amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12395) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF ELECTIONS IN PUERTO RICO—AMENDMENTS

Mr. TYDINGS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4528) to regulate the conduct of elections in Puerto Rico, which were referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. OVERTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 12624, the first deficiency bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

At the proper place in the bill to insert:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Payments for agricultural adjustment: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet all obligations and commitments under the Louisiana sugarcane administrative ruling no. 6, exclusive of subparagraph (d) thereof, pursuant to the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, $1,231,000.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS PURSUANT TO ACT OF JULY 1, 1932 (S. DOC. NO. 207)

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, under the act of July 1, 1932, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make report to Congress relative to the adjustment or elimination of reimbursable charges of the Government existing as debts against individual Indians or tribes of Indians, cancelations, and so forth, mostly on irrigation districts in the southwestern portion of the United States. I ask unanimous consent that the report submitted on December 1, 1934, be printed as a Senate document, as has been customary heretofore.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be printed as a Senate document.

INTER-AMERICAN CONFERENCE

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 248) to provide for participation by the United States in an inter-American conference to be held at Buenos Aires, Argentina, or at the capital of another American republic, in 1936, which was, on page 1, line 6, after the word "conference", to insert "in pursuance of and for the purposes set forth in a letter from the President of the United States dated January 30, 1936."

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL RECLAMATION—ADDRESS BY SENATOR HATCH

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an able and interesting address delivered by the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] before the Rivers and Harbors Congress at its recent meeting in the city of Washington.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Much has been said and much will be said during the progress of your meeting, I am sure, about the problems of conservation, the evils which have resulted from the exploitations of our lands and natural resources. Events of the past 3 years, droughts, dust storms in the West, tornadoes in the South, and floods and disaster in the East, have brought these subjects to our attention in a most striking manner. The people of the Nation are awake today to these problems as they have never been before. You gentlemen of the Rivers and Harbors Congress have long been aware of the various aspects of the entire situation.

I do not come from a country which is supposed to have floods, nor do the rivers of my State present any great problems of navigation. Seagoing vessels, merchant ships, or armored fleets rarely visit the ports of Albuquerque or Santa Fe. But yet, even in our semi-arid regions, floods are not unknown, and entirely too frequently waste and destruction of crops and lands result from disastrous floods. Lives have been lost in the flood waters of New Mexico, and the waters from my own State do contribute, as many of you know, to the serious problems of streams and rivers of other States. But it is not of floods nor of primary problems of rivers and harbors I shall speak today, although floods, excess waters and regulation thereof are a part of the general problem of reclamation and irrigation.

It happens, all my life has been spent in regions which have been affected by a lack of water, by droughts and windstorms. As a small boy, I recall the hot winds which destroyed corn and wheat and products of the farm within a few short days. In later years, in another State where I grew to maturity, I have seen vast fields of cotton wilt, wither, and die because the rains came not and the hot winds blew. I have seen men and women struggle year after year against the adversity of climatic conditions, of insufficient rainfall in sections of the country where the annual precipitation was sufficient to have raised ample crops, but the rains did not come at the right time and seasons of the year.

In my own State of New Mexico, where I have resided many years, I have seen the sand and dust and the dry winds do all the things which bring disaster and ruin to an earnest, industrious, and intelligent people trying to make their own way, trying to be independent and seeking to live by their own efforts, as American citizens should live. In addition to all this, I have seen land itself practically destroyed. I know of farms in various parts of the country, which 20 or 25 years ago were rich, fertile farms, but which today do not produce enough to pay the taxes.

Therefore, when I speak of reclamation, I speak not from an academic standpoint of one who has read and considered the ill effects of dry winds and lack of moisture, but I speak of these things with the voice of one who knows whereof he speaks from personal observation and actual experience. When I say to you that the waters of my State, in certain sections, go uncontrolled, down mountain side, over valley lands into streams and rivers, impoverishing the soil over which they flow, and destroying other lands below, when at the same time that water, by proper control, conservation, and impounding, could be applied to the growing of useful crops, to the prevention of the hardship of insufficient rainfall, and to the building of independent, self-supporting, honest citizenry, I speak exactly what is true, and I speak with vigor and earnestness about it, because to my mind, there has long been a misconception and a misunderstanding of reclamation, its purposes, its ends, and its accomplishments.

In the past, many people unfamiliar with actual conditions have viewed reclamation from a standpoint which is entirely incorrect. They have thought of it as a local issue, beneficial only to the community where the project is located. Some have been so blind or so unkind as to think of it in terms of pork-barrel politics. Some have even thought of reclamation projects as a form of waste and extravagant use of Federal funds in aid and assistance to communities whose citizens would better return to labor in shop and factory. With those who so believe, I am, of course, in sharp disagreement. The waste and extravagance have not been in the storage and impounding of our excess waters, and the application of such waters to practical and beneficial use, but the waste has been these many years in permitting those excess waters to escape and run wild and rampant throughout the country, laying low, wasting and destroying valuable crops, food supplies, property, and even human beings. Here lies extravagance.

I believe in reclamation as a national policy; it is not only of local interest. The preservation of lands, the conservation of our water, the control and regulation of our rivers, are things which constitute the life and blood of America. In that program, reclamation plays a most important part; it walks hand in hand with all efforts for soil conservation and for the regulation and control of the stream system of the country.

When you have builded dams and reservoirs, such for instance as are located at Elephant Butte or Carlsbad, N. Mex., and have made thousands of acres of dry land fertile, crop-producing lands, you have not only conserved excess waters, but you have made it possible to establish a community of thousands of American citizens, prosperous, happy, and contented; you have removed the fear of drought, flood, and disaster; you have builded, in every way, not only for today but for the years to come. Further, the activities under the Federal reclamation policy create an endless chain of benefits to the Nation as a whole. Direct benefits occur in the arid and semiarid region which covers one-third of the United States. Indirect benefits, in the form of taxes and the creation of purchasing power, affect every State in the Union. It might be surprising to you to know it is estimated that about one-half of all funds for construction of irrigation structures goes to industry for the purchase of material and supplies, and that for every man engaged on the job, 1.8 persons are given indirect employment. Funds spent on Federal reclamation have, therefore, been a major factor in relieving unemployment, both at the site of construction and in the industrial centers of the East.

BUREAU OF RECLAMATION MAJOR CONSERVATION UNIT

Federal reclamation as a national policy is now 34 years old. It is an important factor in the Federal Government's conservation program, accomplishing as it does the control of floods, improvement of navigation to meet the needs of irrigated agriculture, domestic requirements of cities and towns, and the generation of hydroelectric power as an adjunct of irrigation development. The Federal reclamation policy was adopted by Congress in 1902 only after it was demonstrated that larger and costlier works for conservation of the unregulated flow of western rivers for irrigation purposes could not be constructed from private funds.

NEED SPURS ACTIVITY

Great impetus has been given to the construction program of the Bureau of Reclamation by the generous allotment of emergency funds and the money so allotted during the past 2 years nearly equals the amount set aside by Congress in 30 years. Twenty-one dams have been completed or started with such funds since 1933, in comparison to 125 dams constructed during the 30-year period. It may thus be seen that the interests of the West are being given sympathetic aid by the Federal Government to carry out a program of conservation most vital to the West.

IRRIGATED AGRICULTURE CREATES OPPORTUNITIES FOR HOMES

Every farmer settled with his family on a Federal reclamation project is tendered the means under provisions of good soil and a regulated flow of water to go about the business of irrigated agriculture as a livelihood for his family. As I have before pointed out, this means economic independence—that security of which so much is said today. I am one of those who believe that many of our economic problems today arise from an unwise congestion of human beings in cities and towns of the land.

A large part of our population is altogether dependent upon the fruits of daily wages from industry and business, and susceptible to all the ills and evils which arise from wide fluctuation of business and industrial activity. The problem of unemployment constantly menaces not only the happiness and well-being of the individuals so living and so dependent, but it constitutes a menace to the welfare of the country itself. Men were never designed to live in crowded, congested, unhealthy, unsightly, and disagreeable tenement and slum districts like ants in a heap or bees in a hive. Man is essentially a creature dependent upon the land; from it he came, to it he returns. Between the Alpha and Omega of his existence, all his life, his wealth, prosperity, and happiness depend upon the earth.

If we can so extend our agricultural program so that thousands and millions of our citizens can return to the soil and farm under a regulated program of the West, a large portion and part of our present perplexing, yes, some say terrifying, problem of unemployment will be solved in a way that will bring not only independence and happiness to the individual, but will add material wealth to America.

RECLAMATION, A GOOD FEDERAL INVESTMENT

No other policy of the Government has added more to national prosperity than the Federal Reclamation projects. The benefits are endless. During construction, they put people to work at the site. The purchasing of materials and supplies helps to keep the factories of the East going, thereby supporting the families depending on work in these fields. The settlement that follows irrigation development takes care of families on the land, creates purchasing power, and brings into the treasury of county and State governments such needed revenue in the form of taxes. The National Government also is a beneficiary by income tax, inheritance tax, and Federal taxation on purchases. Everyone receiving a part of the appropriation made for construction, whether it be in the form of wages or payment for materials and supplies, keeps the money moving to the best possible advantage, and best of all, dwindles the line of the unemployed and helps business to help itself.

RECLAMATION FUNDS REIMBURSABLE

Money spent on Federal reclamation projects is covered by contract with the water users benefited for repayment of the cost over a period of years. The maximum permissible under the law is 40 years, but in some cases repayment of cost is aided by application of power revenues created by Federal development. The repayment record is an enviable one. Of the amounts that have become due the Government, 98.9 percent have been repaid.

WHAT ABOUT FEDERAL RECLAMATION ADDING TO THE SURPLUS?

There is a widespread misconception that Federal reclamation contributes to the agricultural surplus and should be curtailed until such time as the demand increases. Informed people know that this is a mistake. The greater part of the crops grown on these lands are noncompetitive. Long-staple cotton, the products of the orchards, sugar beets, and our winter gardens of the Southwest are all outstanding examples of the noncompetitive character of irrigated lands. Do you realize that because of favorable climatic conditions, soil, and water, the delicacies enjoyed in New York, for instance, during the winter months, come from these favorite spots? They are noncompetitive because they cannot be grown elsewhere except at prohibitive cost. The steadily growing population of western cities is absorbing the increasing products of the irrigated territory.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR IRRIGATED AGRICULTURE ARE LIMITED

Let me make this surprising statement—that there are few opportunities left for good storage sites on western rivers to serve good, fertile soil under them. Probably the largest remaining compact body of land which can be economically irrigated with a plentiful water supply is the Columbia Basin project in the State of Washington, where 1,200,000 acres of fertile soil are awaiting water for irrigation from the storage created by Grand Coulee Dam.

I have but hurriedly mentioned some of the outstanding features concerning Federal reclamation, but I must say this program of reclamation and of irrigation, of soil conservation, of wise and expedient protecting and safeguarding of the natural resources, of which mother nature has so richly and bountifully endowed us, is to my mind, one of the most, if not the most important contribution we of this generation are making to the welfare of America as a whole, and I must reiterate and declare that it is a program which must be carried on and must be further developed and expanded. We of today have no right to waste, neglect, and destroy the land and thereby impoverish and pauperize the generations which are to follow us. The richness of our lands, the fertility of our soil, the protection and regulation of our streams mean the protection, the development, and enrichment of America and American citizens for all time to come. Reclamation has its share, its contribution, and its part in this great national program.

Again, and in conclusion, may I stress that while reclamation has been considered almost altogether in connection with the West, this idea is entirely erroneous. Reclamation and its program dovetail exactly into the general plan of conservation of both land and water. Problems of river and stream regulation and control, from the Mississippi and all its vast region to its smallest tributary, including the prevention of devastating floods east and west of that mighty stream, and the building and developing of great reclamation and irrigation projects from the far reaches of the Pacific and the great Northwest, and all the arid and semi-arid districts, constitute, in reality, but one program, all linked together and all a part of the general plan for the conservation of land, water, property, and even human lives. I repeat, it is not local; it is national in scope, character, and effect.

INCREASING EMPLOYMENT AND PRODUCTION—ADDRESS BY SECRETARY ROPER

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Secretary Roper, of the Department of Commerce, before the twenty-fourth annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, on April 28, 1936, on the subject "Increasing Employment and Production."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President and members of the United States Chamber of Commerce, it is a pleasure for me to meet with the members of the United States Chamber of Commerce at your twenty-fourth annual meeting. In the 3 years which have passed since I last addressed you the people of the United States have passed through one of the most challenging periods in our economic and social history.

When I met with you on May 5, 1933, the country was beginning the long and gradual climb from the depths of the depression which had begun with the financial collapse in 1929.

The status of conditions at that time was well and forcefully expressed by Mr. Henry I. Harriman, then president of your organization, in his testimony before a congressional committee in May 1933. He said:

"We have seen the national income fall from $84,000,000,000 in 1929 to approximately $40,000,000,000 last year (1932), and if the decline were to continue uninterrupted at the same rate during the present year (1933), the national income would not be over $30,000,000,000. That is a most appalling situation and it indicates that remedies which in normal conditions we would look at with great hesitation we can well consider in times like these.

"I believe that the exigency which faces the country is far greater than the emergency of the war, and that the damage resulting from 4 years of depression to our people is much greater than the damage that came in the years that we were in the World War."

For more than 3 years the people had been waiting for the depression forces to run their course. Yet, the situation grew cumulatively worse. More and more people were being forced out of work; bank suspensions had been increasing at an alarming rate; farm and home mortgage foreclosures were rising; business activity continued to decline; profits were replaced by deficits; and the hope and confidence of the people were undermined. As long as these conditions continued there could have been no solid basis for recovery.

By March 1933 so many employees had been eliminated from the pay rolls of private industry that private charities, municipalities, and States were confronted with a relief burden which, in many instances, they were absolutely unable to meet. A recently published survey by a nationally known non-Government organization shows that the percentage of tax delinquencies in 190 cities of over 50,000 population was two and one-half times greater in 1933 than in 1930. From these concrete figures it is easy to understand why the larger cities where the unemployment problem was most acute were forced to turn to the National Government for aid. Tax delinquencies in the smaller cities were often far more drastic than in the larger cities. Also in many States there were legal restrictions to prevent increased bond issues for necessary unemployment expenditures.

As the depression deepened private business could not draw further on reserves to maintain employment in the face of decreasing markets and purchasing power. It was necessary for the Federal Government to assume the responsibility of halting the economic and social-erosion processes and of building a foundation upon which gradual and sound recovery could be based.

ALTERNATIVES FOR ACTION

The Nation in March 1933 had two alternatives. The deflation forces could have been permitted to run their full course until costs and prices had been brought into balance at some low level or sound, constructive action could be taken to halt the downward spiral and restore the proper balance during the progress of recovery. To have allowed the process of complete liquidation to run its course, after which the country once more might have begun an upward trend toward another high peak of prosperity would have meant an unbearable burden of want and suffering. We were dealing with the human factor as well as the economic. There were millions of unemployed and an increasing social unrest. Our country could not have withstood the shock of any further liquidation or deflation at that time. The destruction of the people's confidence in their economic system, and in their Government was in itself a far more serious challenge than financial deflation.

Today, in retrospect we may easily say what should have been done that was not done; what should have been done differently; and what should not have been done, but we cannot deny the fact that the action taken was necessary to halt the depression and to provide a basis and impetus for sustained economic progress. Furthermore, your Government has taken corrective steps to eliminate or minimize those elements in our system which tend to aggravate and deepen such cycles of depression.

RECOVERY RESULTS

Today, in place of the thousands of business failures, the millions of dollars of financial losses in form of profits, and the vast amount of local and State tax delinquencies in 1932 and 1933, business profits have returned in substantial volume, tax collections have improved, production and distribution of goods have increased with a consequent employment gain. The credit of the Government was used to bolster private, local, and State financial structures. Through loans to business and industry, benefit payments to farmers, and the placing of millions of dollars in circulation through work-relief payments production activities were continued, buying power was expanded, and business profits were made possible for private enterprise.

The striking economic improvements that have taken place since I last addressed you in the spring of 1933 are reflected in the following figures: Industrial production has increased 42 percent; factory employment has gained 41 percent; factory pay rolls have risen 95 percent; cash income from farm marketings, exclusive of benefit payments, has increased 45 percent; department-store sales have risen 38 percent; freight-car loadings have increased 25 percent; stock prices (421 companies) have risen 129 percent; the total value of foreign trade has increased 104 percent; construction contracts awarded have advanced 236 percent. One of the most indicative measurements of the improved economic conditions of the Nation is the increase in the national income. It is estimated that the national income produced increased by approximately $15,000,000,000, or more than one-third from 1932 to 1935.

In 1932 business enterprises of the Nation paid out $9,000,000,000 more than they produced. Obviously, this condition represented a barrier to expansion in an economy where the profit motive is such an important basic factor. Today, for the first time in 6 years, business enterprise as a whole is maintaining current operations and paying dividends without drawing upon capital or other resources to make up for deficits. The rising trend of our national income, therefore, not only reflects the marked improvements which have taken place but also reveals that there is a sounder basis for further economic gains. During this period there has been a real gain in reemployment. It has been estimated that the average number employed during the first 3 months of 1936 was 4½ millions more than the average for the first quarter of 1933. Notwithstanding this improvement, unemployment and relief constitute the major economic and social problem confronting business and Government.

THE REEMPLOYMENT RESPONSIBILITY OF BUSINESS

It is fitting, therefore, that you have chosen for discussion at this meeting the question of how business can increase employment and production. A fundamental consideration of this discussion must be how private enterprise can put more people to work. There can be no escape from this, for if it is not the responsibility of private enterprise to employ the millions of people now out of work, then it becomes the responsibility of private charity, and of local, State, and the National Government to care for them until gainful work is secured. Many industries are to be complimented upon the gains which have been registered, and the advantage which has been taken of the improved economic and social conditions to carry forward constructive programs. Today in some industries there are more people employed than before the depression and further gains are constantly being made. But our efforts must be increased upon all fronts through cooperative study and action. Even though one industry may show highly encouraging gains the sound position of that industry is not assured until national unemployment has been greatly reduced.

There is no greater assurance for successful and profitable operations in the future, and, thus, for decreased governmental expenditures, than the employment of labor. Therefore, it is the responsibility of all business and industrial enterprise, and not of one particular segment or of the Government, to increase its efforts for greater employment. If a substantial measure of increased reemployment does not take place the taxation for relief purposes will come largely from business earnings. Thus, facing the problem frankly, there must be reemployment or a longer period of increased taxation.

RESEARCH REQUIREMENTS

We cannot develop a long-term approach to the entire problem of unemployment properly and realistically in the light of present-day conditions and trends without more specific and dependable knowledge about the nature, scope, and intricacies of unemployment. But I believe that a mere "head count" of the totals represents only a small part of the problem. We must know more about the specific causes behind the situation; in what segments of our economic activity the major part of the unemployment problem falls; what percentage of the total are unemployable because of disability, physical, mental, or moral; what is the distribution of those who are properly employable but now unemployed among the different occupations; the nature and scope of the problem created by new employables who have never been gainfully employed; in what fields are there prospective skilled and unskilled labor shortages; and what the ultimate relationship between all segments of our economic life properly should be when the satisfactory solution is found.

The Department of Commerce is now securing a great deal of valuable data concerning employment as well as some aspects of unemployment through the Census of Business and Census of Manufactures, which are now being taken concurrently. As soon as these censuses are completed we shall then know how much and what type of supplementary and additional data are required to give an adequate and intelligible picture of employment and unemployment. As soon as this information is available steps should be taken immediately to secure this additional needed data and to that end I propose at that time an occupational and unemployment census.

I believe that it is the responsibility of business to take stock of its employment assets as well as its unemployment liabilities. Constructive and aggressive reemployment must not and should not have to await the taking of a full, technical census. Business should survey its own needs and its own conditions from the viewpoint of employing as many persons as current improvements and future programs demand. In this manner a concrete picture of employment potentialities will be secured, immediate employment for those not now on pay rolls will be found and a proper and necessary basis for future employment and production adjustments will be provided.

THE PROBLEM OF TECHNOLOGICAL UNEMPLOYMENT

During the past 25 years we have increased our productive efficiency to such an extent that the number of workers employed in the physical production of goods increased only approximately 6 percent while the number engaged in producing services increased approximately 66 percent. As we have become more efficient in our production facilities, more of our energies have been utilized in satisfying other needs. One of the fundamental reasons for the great progress which we have made in raising our standards of living has been our ability to develop more efficient methods of production. This has been made possible through technological development based upon years of research and study.

Our problem today is not to restrain nor destroy the ability to increase productive efficiency or to produce upon a large-scale basis, but rather it is a question of how we can properly utilize these national attributes for providing further opportunities for gainful employment and lower costs to the consumer, without recourse to wage reductions or lengthened hours of employment. I believe that business should give further study to this question of technological development to determine what the labor displacement is, and how the workers can be more quickly transferred to other productive channels.

It is a responsibility of business to speed up this transition period so that men thrown out of work by technological innovations may more rapidly than at present be transferred into new fields. To this end, I suggest that each major industry, through proper mechanisms and as a part of the survey I have suggested, set up what may for descriptive purposes be called "technological unemployment committees." Such committees would study and review reports from all members of the industry, setting forth on a confidential basis, if necessary, the probable replacement of employees through new machinery installations. With such information available, considerably in advance of resultant employee reductions, early efforts could be made to translate these employees into other work.

OPPORTUNITIES IN THE DURABLE GOODS FIELD

We know that during the past 5 or 6 years industry has withdrawn from production much of its old equipment, with the result that further increased production on an efficient basis will require new capital replacements. Today inventories are low, outworn and outmoded machinery needs to be replaced, buildings as well as equipment need repairing and new construction can well be undertaken. Thus, there has accumulated a need for new agricultural and industrial machinery, for railroad and electrical equipment and for new construction in excess of normal replacement requirements.

Upon the basis of the concrete and realistic recovery which has taken place there is a sound foundation for increasing capital expenditures and replacing obsolete equipment. If production efficiency is to be maintained and increased, these deferred demands must be fulfilled. A further permeation of recovery into the durable goods field is essential for a more complete consolidation of economic gains and consequent large-scale employment.

I believe that one of the outstanding opportunities which private enterprise, with Government cooperation, can meet today is that of a well-founded and wisely guided home-building program, based not only upon the immediate demands but also upon a long-term need. A program of this nature will not only furnish significant impetus for further recovery through increased economic activity but will establish a basis upon which enlarged economic and social security and independence will be brought to millions of our people. The type of program which must be initiated is reflected in the market which must be provided for the millions of people in the lower-income groups. This illustrates the vast potential economic and social possibilities existing in this field in the United States of which immediate advantage can be taken. We need to utilize our vast resources, our research facilities, and our productive equipment to enter the field of mass production of homes in order that this lower-income group may be properly and adequately housed.

As this program is initiated especial emphasis should be placed on utilizing local facilities for local building programs. For example, local financing, at proper interest rates, should be used whenever possible. Furthermore, it is the responsibility of business to see that this program is soundly developed and wisely guided so that there is not a sudden speculative boom period, followed by an early return to depressed and deflated building and real-estate conditions.

REEMPLOYMENT THROUGH FOREIGN TRADE

Another aspect of our national economy which should receive more careful attention by business with reference to reemployment is that of foreign trade. We know that millions of our people are either directly or indirectly dependent upon foreign trade for their livelihood.

It is significant to note that from 1929 to 1933, the period of decline in domestic business activity, foreign trade of the United States decreased from nine and one-half billion dollars in 1929 to less than $3,000,000,000 in 1932. Since 1933, when sustained economic recovery began, foreign commerce as a correlative and contributing factor has been increasing. In 1935 our total foreign trade, on a value basis, totaled more than $4,000,000,000. To sustain a well-balanced recovery, an increased volume of trade with other countries is essential.

Through its reciprocal trade agreement program, the present administration has taken direct and constructive action to readjust the destructive foreign-trade barriers which contributed to the decline of domestic business activity. With the trade channels with other nations now being opened upon a reciprocal basis, business and industry have new opportunities for markets in foreign countries. It is the responsibility of business and industry to take advantage of these opportunities for increased production and increased employment.

BUSINESS PLANNING FOR PUBLIC WORKS

I believe that business, in cooperation with communities, States, and the National Government, should give careful study to the development of a broad useful public-works program which would serve as a reservoir for employment in periods of depression. If such a well-developed program had been available at the beginning of the last depression period, a channel would have existed into which those workers who were thrown out of employment could have been placed without delay. Much constructive work could be accomplished in conserving and rebuilding our natural resources, in developing parks, water fronts, and making other public improvements which add materially to our national wealth and progress. The success of such a program would depend primarily upon planning ahead of time so that when conditions demanded it the program would be put into immediate operation by localities and States whenever any large measure of unemployment threatens business stability. Even under the hurriedly constructed program of the past 3 years, we have found that public works do provide a reservoir of employment and serve to stimulate private enterprise toward sound recovery. I believe that any such public-works program, to succeed, must have the cooperation of business and industry. Therefore, business should, through its properly constituted organizations, begin immediate research studies concerning long-term and long-range public works.

One of the dominant elements of success in American business and industry has been the trend toward higher wages and lower costs. It is obvious that hours and wages should differ according to industries. Business has never analyzed fully what the economically proper and sound working hours and wages should be. We know that in certain industries, for example, costs of production have decreased while wages paid have increased and hours of labor declined. But business has not approached this question from a standpoint of national economic conditions to determine the exact relationship between production, wages, and hours. Each industry should give careful study to the question of how improvements in productive operations will result in lower prices, increased consumption, and hence additional employment. It is the responsibility of business to formulate definite and concrete programs that will assure the most effective results in the maintenance of proper wages and hours.

Prompt and vigorous action in this connection will serve to decrease bureaucracy in the National Government that comes from carrying responsibility which should be reassumed now by business, other private organizations, States, and localities. The best way to take bureaucracy out of government is to place more responsibility on nongovernmental agencies.

THE CHALLENGE OF "DEFEATISM"

While it is true that during the emergency period the Federal Government assumed many of the responsibilities of individuals, industries, and municipal and State governments, it does not mean that these responsibilities properly belong to the Federal Government. The release of these obligations during the depression has led to an attitude on the part of these units that they can or should no longer have to bear these proper responsibilities. This attitude of "defeatism" must be replaced with the attitude that it is the duty of individuals, industries, and local and state governments to resume these obligations as rapidly as possible. If this approach is accepted in spirit and translated into action, Government expenditures will decline and bureaucracy will decrease.

Recently a businessman was heard to say: "I'm too busy, working every day of the week, including Sunday, keeping my own fences in order, to give any time to these national problems." Another businessman spoke up and said: If all of us businessmen feel and act that way, we soon may not have any fences to keep in order." That illustrates an attitude that I find too prevalent among businessmen. They have come to the conviction that as long as they take care of their own affairs then by some mysterious process their interrelationships will be taken care of automatically. Yes; we need straight thinking, as a distinguished member of this organization has said, but we must think comprehensively and sympathetically in order to think straight. Today, with large amounts of fixed capital in use, with centralized organizations controlling a large portion of business enterprise, and with a complicated interdependence throughout industry, more coordinated planning by business is essential.

IMPROVING GOVERNMENT AND BUSINESS RELATIONSHIPS

There has never been a greater need for a mutual understanding between Government and business than there is today. The attainment of this objective should be a distinctly crystallized endeavor on the part of both. Early in 1933 I felt the need of a constructive approach of this nature and recommended the formation of the Business Advisory Council for the Department of Commerce. In the formation and in the functioning of this council the method is just as important as the results. In the interrelationships between Government and business, attitudes are just as important as actions. If such a council had been formed 15 years ago and had functioned continuously up to the present time, I am certain that many of the misinterpretations that have grown out of the depression and emergency period would never have existed. The council, through its many reports and studies and its continuity of contacts with the Department of Commerce and other Government agencies, has had a splendid opportunity to register the business viewpoint while becoming familiar with the problems and processes of the Federal Government. I urge that business take advantage of every opportunity to bring about a further extension of this thoroughly democratic principle.

A letter received recently from a leading manufacturer contained this significant statement: "Differences of opinion may easily exist as to the best ways to reach our goals, but as to essential goals themselves, few will disagree. These serious questions of our time must be faced with the utmost possible mutual understanding and good will—without political motives, for the problems transcend all political interests or lines—without rancor, for the ills to be healed are of no individual's making—and without bias, for none of us is great or wise enough to have a ready answer to these problems that still challenge the utmost spiritual energy of our Nation." I believe that this statement expresses the proper attitude. When business and Government fail to create and maintain those educational attitudes and endeavors which clarify national problems and establish a mutual working basis for the solution of such problems, the confidence of the general public is weakened and the vital factor of a favorable public opinion is lost. Let us in all cases have constructive and definitive criticism, but let us insist that this criticism be practicable and realistic in the light of changed conditions and the enlarged responsibilities of business.

Certainly, it should be clear to everyone that it is not the desire or purpose of your Government to destroy those fundamental concepts and principles of American business and industry which have made possible our national wealth and progress. These basic principles and objectives have proven sound and constructive down through the years of our national growth and progress. They must and will remain as the ideals by which American business and industry should be guided. But, business must inspire public confidence and justify its belief in these ideals by its actions. The fulfillment of the responsibilities involved in these fundamental objectives rests with business itself. They can only be fulfilled by the concerted action of business with the support and cooperation of the Government. This assistance and cooperation is promised by your Government. As an educational responsibility, business must translate its ideals into action as a concrete proof that it is vitally concerned with the welfare and security of the people of the Nation.

A 10-POINT PROGRAM FOR BUSINESS

I have endeavored to emphasize the fact that since business enterprise must pay the bills it should submit the plans to cope with the unemployment situation. With this in view I have indicated some of the fields for study as I see them. Let us now summarize these.

1. Business should survey its own needs and its own conditions from the viewpoint of employing as many persons as current improvements and future programs demand.

2. As improvements in productive efficiency are secured, business should pass on to the consumer the benefits of the lower costs of production which result.

3. Business should form and launch industrial committees to study in a comprehensive way technological unemployment and methods for speeding up the transfer into other fields of earning capacity of workers replaced by machines.

4. Business should stimulate the durable-goods industries by early action that will provide for capital goods and machinery replacements due to obsolescence, depreciation, and other causes.

5. Business should develop effective and wisely engineered home-building programs, privately financed and managed and adapted to local needs, to foster better American home standards.

6. Business should launch more aggressive endeavors to expand our foreign trade all along the line and especially in cooperation with the administration's reciprocal trade agreement program.

7. Business should have a research program, conducted by industry and business, for the purpose of informing business on a long-term useful Public Works plan looking to the coordination of proper National, State, local, and private endeavors.

8. Business should make intensive research study of the relationships that should be maintained with respect to production, wages, and hours of labor and the necessary methods and mechanics to be utilized in maintaining this balanced relationship.

9. Business must recognize and apply its best endeavors to a fundamental educational program involving methods and efforts to get the States and subdivisions to reassume their social responsibilities as soon as possible, to study economies in Government, and the prompting of self-respect and mutual responsibility in the individuals and in the groups and organizations of our citizens.

10. Business should utilize every possible channel of approach that will result in the most effective cooperation between business and Government.

It is my firm conviction that as business fulfills these responsibilities employment will increase, relief demands decrease, national income will further expand, and safe and secure recovery will be attained.

THE MARCUS WHITMAN CENTENNIAL

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, during the month of August of this year, the people of the State of Washington will celebrate the centennial anniversary of the coming to our State of Marcus Whitman. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Walla Walla Daily Bulletin on May 1, 1936, discussing the centennial, and its national nature and scope.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From The Walla Walla (Wash.) Daily Bulletin of May 1, 1936]

CENTENNIAL SCOPE

Dr. S. B. L. Penrose rendered the Whitman Centennial an outstanding service in his address before the Walla Walla Rotary Club Thursday when, in clear, concrete fashion, he sold the idea of this being an event with Nation-wide significance on many counts.

There are many in this community, without doubt, who have failed to view this coming 4-day celebration as something different. There have been anniversaries observed by many communities, and they have consisted of various forms of entertainment, largely with a commercial background.

The Whitman Centennial commemorates several outstanding events, however, and Dr. Penrose made clear that it has significance to the medical profession of the Nation, to the missionary life of America and to the women of our land.

Marcus Whitman, who was a doctor, was the first white man in the United States to come into the Pacific Northwest and practice his profession, being a medical missionary among the Indians of this region. The American Medical Association has so recognized this and is participating in one day's program of the centennial.

Mrs. Whitman, young bride from New York State, was one of two women who were the first American women to journey overland into this region and establish homes. She was the first mother of a white child born in this new homeland.

Dr. and Mrs. Whitman were the first missionaries sent by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions into the region to establish an American home and set up a civilization that has grown into a high type in the century since their coming. As Dr. Penrose said, they were not the first missionaries into the Northwest, but their predecessors were unmarried men, and "civilization comes when woman comes to a region."

If any Walla Wallans view the forthcoming celebration, August 13 to 16, as a purely local matter, they may well cast aside such views. The Old Oregon Trail Association of New York City is recognizing the event, the D. A. R., the General Federation of Women's Clubs, the A. A. U. W., and the National Federation of Music Clubs are among other great Nation-wide groups which are making decided contributions to the observance.

The Whitman Centennial is an event of genuine interest in the State that gave us the Whitmans, it is going to be of interest wherever there are people with an appreciation of the pioneer. And that, by the way, will take in a lot of territory, too.

ACTIVITIES AND EXPENDITURES OF RESETTLEMENT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, it will be recalled that on April 27, at the time when the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] was pressing his resolution seeking information in connection with A. A. A. benefit payments, among other Senators, I suggested an amendment to that resolution. That amendment was tabled, as is recorded on page 6194 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date, the vote to table it being 32 to 30.

On the following day I spoke at some length with respect to my undertakings in this connection and my reasons for them. In the meantime I have accumulated a very considerable amount of additional data in respect to the necessity and justification of seeking information from the Resettlement Administration.

I now ask unanimous consent to have immediately considered a resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read. The resolution is a verbatim copy of the instrument which was originally offered as an amendment to the so-called Vandenberg resolution and which was tabled, as I have mentioned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 295), as follows:

Resolved, That the Resettlement Administration is requested to report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, (1) the nature and extent of all expenditures made or proposed to be made by such Administration; (2) the nature and extent of projects undertaken by it, and the advisability of undertaking future projects; (3) the effect of each such project on States and local taxation and on local real-estate values; (4) the extent to which such projects have benefited and will benefit labor; and (5) the circumstances relating to the securing of persons as tenants or purchasers in connection with such projects, and the effect on such persons of becoming such tenants or purchasers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey now presents as a separate resolution the substance of an amendment which he proposed to what we know as the Vandenberg resolution. When that amendment was offered, as is recalled, having had no opportunity to consider it and regarding it as unrelated to the subject matter of the resolution then under consideration, I objected and moved to lay the amendment on the table, which action was taken, and which I think was the course the Senate should have pursued in the matter.

I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution now presented. Upon consultation with the head of the Resettlement Administration, I am informed that much of the information called for is available in reports already made and the remainder of it will be very promptly supplied. I have no objection to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I am very grateful to the Senator from Arkansas for his cooperation in this connection.

I desire to submit for the guidance of the Resettlement Administration a list of questions which I had in mind at one time offering in the form of a resolution. I realize these suggestions or questions are not binding on the administration, for I do not pretend that they come within the scope of the resolution which has just been adopted. However, to save time, I should like to suggest that the Resettlement Administration at least give consideration to this list of subjects, though, as I have pointed out, I do not want any Senator to feel that I am attempting to go beyond the limitations recited in the resolution just adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I had understood that if the resolution was presented in the form in which the Senator offered it this morning and was agreed to it would meet the Senator's requirements for information. In view of that fact, I think the Senator ought not now to attempt to supplement his resolution by submitting additional questions. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing not to pursue the matter at this time, and I am content to await such information as we may get from the Resettlement Administration, and then see if there is anything additional that will be required.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 12527) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 14, line 21, it is proposed to strike out the word "nineteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty", so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available to pay more than 20 officers of the Naval Reserve and 1 officer of the Marine Corps Reserve above the grade of lieutenant or captain, respectively—

And so forth.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the amendment has to do with the personnel of the Naval Reserve. I understand the Navy Department recommended 23 officers and the Budget recommended 20. For some reason with which I am not familiar the number has been reduced to 19. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] whether he would be willing to accept the amendment in order that it may go to conference and we may learn the reason why the number was reduced?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I have no objection to taking the amendment to conference in order to afford opportunity to ascertain the reason why the change was made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further amendments, the question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the appropriation bill for naval purposes provides for more than half a billion dollars of total expenditure. Included in that sum is an amount for beginning the construction of several additional destroyers, submarines, and battleships. On page 50, line 7, is a provision reading:

For the commencement of the following vessels authorized by the act approved March 27, 1934: (a) Twelve destroyers and 6 submarines, and (b) not more than 2 capital ships, as replacements of over-age capital ships, to be undertaken only in the event that the President determines as a fact that capital ship-replacement construction is commenced by any of the other signatory powers to the Treaty for the Limitation and Reduction of Naval Armament signed at London April 22, 1930, $115,300,000.

I am not quite sure what the latter part of that provision means as applied to two battleships. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill just what the language means.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, as the Senator no doubt will remember, we scrapped a number of ships in order to bring our strength of capital ships within the number fixed by the Washington Treaty. At this time, under the treaty, we might provide for the laying down of as many as eight battleships, but the committee believed that no such construction should be undertaken. In the hope that we might induce other governments not to engage in or commence the construction of capital ships, we have provided, even though one of our capital ships is 29 years of age, that the keel of no new battleship shall be laid down unless the signatories to the treaty shall undertake to commence the construction of battleships.

We are putting this Government in the position of saying: "We have sought to limit the construction of battleships. We have recently made another effort. It has not been as successful as we should have liked it to be. We want to make still further efforts. Even though after December 31 of this year there is no limitation at all upon the construction of battleships, we hold out the hope and the request that the signatory powers will not engage in the further construction of battleships."

Congress says, as evidence of that spirit on our part, that no replacement shall be undertaken at all unless the other signatory powers shall begin the construction of battleships. That is what the language means.

Mr. FRAZIER. Then, as I understand, the provision about the two battleships is just a bluff to try to keep other nations from starting to build. It is serving notice on other nations that if they start to build we will do likewise.

Mr. BYRNES. The first statement of the Senator is his own interpretation. I have stated the effect of the language. The language is plain that notwithstanding the fact that three battleships of our treaty Navy are over age—one is 29 years old and the other two are 26 years old, as I recall—and notwithstanding the fact that under the language of the treaty we could build eight, we prefer to build none. We are appropriating for no replacements and will continue with the Navy we have, without such replacements, unless the signatory powers which have heretofore agreed to the limitation of armaments shall undertake the construction of battleships, in which case, if the President finds it to be a fact, he may commence the construction of ships, but in no case may he begin the construction of more than two.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BENSON. I desire to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question.

How many battleships of the type mentioned does the United States Navy now have?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I do not recall the number. I shall be glad to give the Senator a statement, found in the hearings, showing in detail the present number of each type of craft, the number now building, and the number that could be built under the treaty. In view of the Senator's interest in the subject, I imagine he would like to have it; and it would be far more accurate than my recollection would be.

Mr. BENSON. Do the naval experts or the military experts of this country agree that these so-called battleships are the type of ship we should build at this time to defend our country?

Mr. BYRNES. I will say to the Senator that I asked that very question. The General Board of our Navy are of the opinion that the treaty navy which was agreed upon in 1922, at the conference presided over by Chief Justice Hughes, constitutes an adequate Navy for our defense. They are firmly of the opinion that the program which has heretofore been adopted by the Congress in what is known as the Vinson-Trammell bill provides all the program of construction that should ever be undertaken by us.

The question the Senator has in his mind we developed before the committee to find out who constituted the general board, which determines this question for the Navy of the United States. That Board is constituted of officers selected mainly from ships afloat who are called in. The personnel does not always remain the same; it is changed from time to time; but the members of the Board are unanimously of the opinion that the program which has been advocated by them and adopted by the Congress will provide the best and most adequate defense for the United States.

Mr. WALSH. And the members of the Board are selected by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BYRNES. That is a correct statement.

Mr. BENSON. Does the Senator from South Carolina know whether or not any experts in military defense or naval defense other than those actively engaged in the military service at this time were called before the committee to testify in regard to these matters?

Mr. BYRNES. Two separate matters have been discussed. The policy which has heretofore been adopted by the Congress was adopted only after very extensive hearings conducted by the Naval Affairs Committees of both Houses. The Appropriations Committee is, of course, simply supplying the appropriations for ships which have been authorized; but in this case, making an exception to the ordinary rule, it is not supplying appropriations for expenditures which have been heretofore authorized by the Congress. It is the policy of the Congress to do so, as laid down in the Vinson-Trammell bill, which is now the law; but instead of appropriating for these two ships we have put in the condition that the construction of the ships shall not be begun except in a certain contingency in the hope that we may offer an inducement to other signatory powers to continue the limitation we have advocated in previous years, and which we still favor, and which I should say to the Senator the officials in charge of our Navy favor. Their position is that the Navy which was agreed upon in 1922 is amply adequate for our defense, and they do not even ask for the construction of ships that would bring the Navy up to treaty strength.

Mr. BENSON. Was the Senator from South Carolina present yesterday when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] spoke, and made some reference to the statement of Admiral Standley regarding his attitude toward naval armaments and treaties?

Mr. BYRNES. I was. What the Senator from North Dakota said in quoting Admiral Standley was really a newspaper statement as to what Admiral Standley said upon his arrival in this country from the Limitation of Armaments Conference.

My conclusion was that if the admiral was correctly quoted it is unfortunate that the Senator from North Dakota has not the sense of humor that the Chief of Naval Operations has. Sometimes it is a blessing to a man to have a sense of humor; sometimes it is a little unfortunate; but, as I listened to the statement, knowing the Chief of Naval Operations, the conclusion I reached was that the Chief of Naval Operations had reference only to a very celebrated statement of a very celebrated citizen of this country, Will Rogers, whose statement all over this Nation was that "we never lost a war and we never won a conference."

The newspaper quoted Admiral Standley as saying, in response to many questions propounded to him by correspondents, "Well, I do not think we have lost a damned thing." I was satisfied that the admiral, not wishing to discuss what had occurred at the conference, and wondering, as all of us have sometimes wondered, what to tell the newspapermen, decided that he would answer Will Rogers by saying he was returning from the conference, but all he would say was, "I do not think we have lost a damned thing."

Mr. BENSON. I hope the Senator's interpretation is correct.

Mr. BYRNES. I may say to the Senator that if he knew the attitude of the present Chief of Naval Operations he would feel that I am entirely correct in the statement I have made as to what he said.

Mr. BENSON. Let me ask the Senator from South Carolina a further question: If we should find it necessary to build the two battleships which are provided for in this bill, how many additional auxiliary craft would we have to build in order to defend those two battleships, and how much money, if any, would that cost?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, it does not follow that any additional auxiliary craft would be constructed other than the planes which accompany battleships; that is all. The construction of two additional battleships would not call for the construction of any additional auxiliaries.

Mr. BENSON. I mean, would it call for the construction of any additional auxiliary craft if the battleships were to be of any value in our national defense?

Mr. BYRNES. When we come to that, it would not, if we are to rely upon our General Board; and they have no program for the construction of any craft other than those provided for in the bill.

Mr. BENSON. When the Appropriations Committee met and considered the bill, the Senator says they took into consideration some former plan of the Congress.

Mr. BYRNES. No; not a plan, but the existing law.

Mr. BENSON. The existing law?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. BENSON. Is it not quite possible that recent modern inventions have made these battleships unnecessary?

Mr. BYRNES. The law to which I refer is the law passed at the last session of the Congress, if my recollection is correct, providing for the construction not only of these but of many more ships. It is not something in the remote past, but the last word as to the policy of the Government as to construction. Following, though, what I have heretofore said as to the opinion of the General Board as to what should be done, this recommendation comes to us from the General Board; and the Senator and I must rely upon the recommendations of the experts of the Navy as to such matters.

I think it should be said at some time, and I should like to say it now, that the men who constitute our Navy are selected in about the most democratic manner of which I can possibly conceive. They do not come from a militaristic caste. Whatever may be said of other governments, in this country we should remember that the men who constitute the Navy come from the country, from Kansas, California, Minnesota, or Carolina. They are selected by Senators and Representatives.

I think they reflect credit upon the Senators and the Members of the House who selected them; but they come, not from the coast but from every section of the country, and constitute as good a cross section of the American people as we could possibly find, because they cannot enter the academy until they pass the examination; and their character, their loyalty, and their patriotism are passed upon by the Senators and the Members of the House, who have an opportunity to know them intimately and to make inquiries regarding them. If we cannot rely upon the patriotism of those men to make the best possible recommendations that they can make for the best defense of their country, then we are at a loss to know how we could proceed.

Mr. BENSON. I think everything the Senator has said regarding the midshipmen and the cadets is absolutely correct. Nevertheless, I think we should all bear in mind the fact that the midshipmen and the cadets enter Annapolis and West Point at a very young and immature age; and it is quite possible that the philosophy they are taught at these schools has something to do with their present attitude. Probably the fact that some of them, after they leave the academy, have command of great battleships, and are able to demand of the men under them service, and have great authority in the command of these great ships, may have something to do with their attitude toward the naval program.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I think the Senator will agree that when the young man becomes a midshipman, he is taught by men who were appointed to the Navy by some gentlemen who may now be Members of the Senate, who came from the same source from which the midshipman came, from the various States, from the country, and I do not believe that the Members of the Senate or of the House have exercised bad judgment in selecting the men who compose our Navy, and who dominate it.

Of course, we often hear it said that in order to get a promotion a man might be influenced in his judgment. That might be so in the case of some individuals; but as I look around the Senate I see many men who make sacrifices in order to serve the public, and I believe the men they select to go to the Naval Academy have just as much patriotism as those who come here, and while there may be some selfish human beings there, as there may be here, still, on the whole, we have reason to rely on the patriotism of these men, and to have confidence that they would not, for the sake of promotion, make a recommendation that was not for the best interest of their country.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, it has been repeatedly stated that the additional armaments provided in the bill are just for defense. The term "adequate defense" is used frequently, and there seems to be a wide variation of opinion as to what that term means. I have here a clipping from one of the local papers, the Washington Herald of April 21, referring to a message the President sent to the D. A. R. convention being held in this city at that time. The paper quotes the outlines and aims of the President as follows:

One. An adequate defense to protect the Nation against foreign aggression.

Two. An increase of armament only to keep pace with the increases of other countries.

Three. Pursuit of the "good neighbor" policy in our relations with other nations.

Four. A reiteration of the Briand-Kellogg Treaty obligations renouncing war as an instrument of national policy.

Mr. President, in the discussion yesterday it was quite conclusively shown, it seemed to me, that there was no likelihood at present of any other nation attacking this country, and that if we were not trying to plan for aggressive warfare there would be no need of building two more big battleships and the cruisers which are mentioned in the bill.

The President in his message to the D. A. R. convention referred to the Briand-Kellogg Pact, and, lest some have forgotten what the Kellogg Pact was, I desire to read it. It is short; it consists of two short articles:

ARTICLE I. The high contracting parties solemnly declare in the names of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another.

Of course, that means that we are absolutely against aggressive warfare.

ART. II. The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts, of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them shall never be sought except by pacific means.

A representative of our country was instrumental in getting this pact adopted by 62 other nations, and some of us thought that our own Government meant what it said when it influenced 62 other nations to adopt this pact. Yet when we stop to consider what our own country did to carry out this treaty, and what we are doing to carry it out, it seems amazing, to say the least.

The President refers to the Briand-Kellogg Treaty. His fourth article, as outlined here, was, "A reiteration of the Briand-Kellogg Treaty obligations renouncing war as an instrument of national policy."

Yet in the War Department appropriation bill this year, and in the Navy Department appropriation bill, before us now, we appropriate the largest amount ever appropriated in peacetimes in this Nation or in any other nation, and it seems to me that that is not carrying out the Kellogg-Briand Pact in good faith. In fact, we have never carried it out in good faith, because beginning immediately after the adoption of the Kellogg-Briand Pact, in the next appropriation bill that came along, the very next year, we appropriated more money than we had appropriated before for military and naval purposes, and we have continued to increase almost every year since that time, until now we have reached the peak of well over a billion dollars, and we are providing in this bill for $115,300,000 to lay down more battleships, more cruisers, and more submarines.

I suppose it might be argued that submarines are necessary to protect our shore lines against foreign ships which might attempt to attack us. But I can see no possible defense for the appropriations for the cruisers provided for or the other two battleships.

The President says we want to carry out the provisions of the Kellogg Peace Pact renouncing war as an instrument of national policy. Yet we are leaving it up to the President in regard to these two battleships, and article 2 of his outline as quoted in the press is "An increase of armament only to keep pace with the increases of other countries."

We were the Nation instrumental in the adoption of the Kellogg Peace Pact, and now it is said we are going to ask for new construction only to keep pace with other nations. Because it has been stated in some of the press that Great Britain is about to begin the building of two more battleships, it is thought to be necessary for the United States also to begin to build two more battleships to keep pace with Great Britain, merely in order to have our Navy a little bit larger than that of Great Britain.

Mr. President, as I understand, the new battleships are expected to cost $51,000,000 apiece, if they are built, and it will cost $2,000,000 a year to operate them after they are built. It has been stated by men high in Army and Navy circles, who know, I believe, what they are talking about, that these great dreadnaughts would be absolutely useless in the event of another world war. A very noted general made the statement 2 or 3 years ago before one of the committees of Congress that in the event of another world war the battleships of the United States Navy should be run just as far up the Mississippi River as they could go, because one well-directed bomb would sink one of these $50,000,000 battleships to the bottom of the ocean. It is now proposed to build two more of these floating arsenals, costing $51,000,000 each to build, in order, I suppose, that in case of war they may be run up the Mississippi River as far as they can get in order to keep them from being sunk to the bottom of the ocean.

We are pledged to economy and are trying to cut down expenses. Only a few short weeks ago the Agricultural Committees of the House and of the Senate reported out bills providing for seed and feed loans to take care of unfortunate farmers who, by reason of drought and crop failures, were unable to provide seed for the spring planting and feed for their farm animals. We passed a compromise bill carrying $50,000,000 for that purpose. The bill was vetoed by the President on the ground that we could not afford an appropriation of that kind because it would unbalance the Budget, or, at least, prevent getting closer to a balance. In the pending bill we are now providing $115,000,000, over twice as much as the feed and seed loan bill provided, for the beginning of construction of new battleships and other warships. What are we doing that for? Just to keep pace with Great Britain. Just to have a navy a little larger than Great Britain's Navy.

Mr. President, I cannot see any other answer to the question as to why so much money is being provided for naval purposes. If anyone can give any other reason, I should like to have it.

The seed-loan bill was vetoed, and an Executive order was issued, as will be recalled, to furnish money from other funds for the seed loans. The situation of the farmer developed into a terrible one. Seed loans could not be provided. Seeding time was rapidly passing, and, finally, a little over a week ago, some arrangements were made to take care of at least a large part of the requests for seed loans. There will be thousands of farmers throughout the great agricultural States of the Northwest who this year will not have enough seed to put in a sufficiently large crop to provide for themselves, their families, and their livestock during the coming year until another crop shall have been grown, to say nothing about paying their running expenses, taxes, and interest on loans.

Thousands of farms are being foreclosed. Farm foreclosures are being made at the rate, we are told, of over 2,000 a month, with the Federal land banks themselves foreclosing on farmers unable to pay their loans. Yet we are appropriating for the coming year for our war system $1,000,000,000, which amounts to more than two and one-half million dollars every day of the year, for this war system. Let our farmers have their farms foreclosed! Let their homes be taken away from them! Let people be driven out of employment and into the bread-lines, and let children go hungry to school every day, but we must prepare for adequate defense! Adequate defense for what, Mr. President? Adequate defense for what? The only answer I can see to the question as to what is meant by the phrase "adequate defense", as it is regarded by the President and others who are advocating the passage of this big naval bill, is to have our Navy and Army just a little larger and a little more powerful than that of any other nation on earth and to spend a little more money for that purpose than is spent by any other nation on earth.

Mr. President, it seems to me the Navy bill might be cut down a great deal. At least the provision for the laying down of new battleships and cruisers, and so forth, might well be cut out of the bill. I propose to offer an amendment to strike that provision from the bill.

We are supposed to be a peace-loving nation, and we call ourselves a highly civilized and even a Christian nation. Yet we are preparing for war. The pending naval appropriation bill and the War Department appropriation bill which was passed during the present session of Congress mean nothing less than preparation for war. Last year, out of every dollar spent for general expenses of the Government, 61 cents went to pay for wars past, present, and future. Judging from the preparations we are now making, the percentage will be larger for the coming year than it was last year.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think the ratio for war purposes exceeded the figure given by the Senator. I recall that when Andrew Mellon was Secretary of the Treasury he submitted a statement to the effect that 70 percent of all taxes received by the Federal Government was expended for wars—past, present, and future.

Mr. FRAZIER. I recall that very well. I think at one time 71 cents out of every dollar expended by the Government went for war purposes, but during the last year the difference in the figures has not been so great; not because we are not spending more money for war, because, as a matter of fact, we are, but we are spending more money for other government purposes than we did a few years ago.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from North Dakota, that in view of the recent appropriation of more than $2,000,000,000 for the bonus, plus more than $1,200,000,000 which we will appropriate this year for the Army and the Navy, the figure which the Senator has indicated must be increased from 60 percent to approximately 70 percent.

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes; undoubtedly the figure will be raised for the coming year. Of course, the payment of the bonus to the soldiers is a part of our war expense. We drafted those boys and sent them to war. I believe they are entitled to be taken care of when they come back from the war, and the bonus is a part of that care of those boys.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator's statement is a little too broad. We did not draft all who served in the military forces. The Senator will remember that there were hundreds of thousands, if not several million young men who volunteered, and many of those who were drafted would have volunteered except for the reason that the Government desired that they should delay their entrance into the armed forces of the United States.

Mr. BENSON. We did pass the draft act.

Mr. KING. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. FRAZIER. It was held, of course, that the fairest way was to draft the young men to go to the Army. Of course, we made the mistake of not drafting wealth along with drafting the boys in order to pay for the war as we went along. Had we done that we would not have had the immense debt burden of thirty some billion dollars hanging over us. Practically the whole of the debt is directly or indirectly war debt, because the depression was brought on as the result of the World War. We cannot get away from that conclusion.

The President in his recent message to the D. A. R. conference intimated, or at least implied, that we were preparing for adequate defense because adequate defense will keep us out of war. That is a term which has been used by the preparedness people for years and years—that we must prepare in order to keep ourselves out of war. Germany with her compulsory military training system was armed for adequate defense at the beginning of the World War. Did her adequate defense keep Germany out of the war? No. France was also adequately prepared, and so was Austria, and so was Great Britain, and their adequate preparedness did not keep them out of the World War. They were the first countries to get into it.

The Honorable William Jennings Bryan, in 1915, after the war had started, but before we got into it, in a speech said he hoped that the World War would at least do away with that old saying that preparedness would keep us out of war because, he said, the nations which were best prepared were the first ones to get into it. Mr. Bryan further said that if the United States had been as well prepared as some of the preparedness people had demanded that we should be, that we would undoubtedly have gone into the World War much earlier than we did.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Would the Senator do away with an army and a navy altogether?

Mr. FRAZIER. I certainly would. I have pending before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate a joint resolution to provide for an amendment to the Constitution to outlaw war and preparation for war. If we are going to have disarmament and peace, Mr. President, I believe we must go the limit. We cannot talk about adequate defense and at the same time talk of disarmament or peace. The people of the other nations of the world are anxious for disarmament and world peace also, and I believe that if the United States were to set a shining example by carrying out the principles set forth in the Kellogg-Briand Peace Pact, other nations would follow suit at once and we would have disarmed nations and world peace.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. President Wilson did attempt to set a shining example through the establishment of the League of Nations which would set up some kind of law and order in international affairs in place of a condition of anarchy, but the United States would have none of it and, of course, we were perforce thrown back upon our own self-defense, because we would not have law and order in international affairs but chose rather to perpetuate anarchy.

Mr. FRAZIER. Other nations went into the League of Nations. Would the Senator from Indiana say that the League of Nations has kept the other nations that are members of the League of Nations and of the World Court, out of war, and kept them from anarchy?

Mr. MINTON. If we are to outlaw war we must have something to take the place of the anarchy which exists in international affairs today.

Mr. FRAZIER. I agree with that.

Mr. MINTON. If war is not outlawed through the League of Nations it can only be outlawed by some organization of similar nature.

Mr. FRAZIER. I voted against our entrance into the League of Nations, because I did not like the way the League of Nations was set up. I did not think it was honestly intended for a peace organization, and I have not changed my mind about it, because of the occurrences which have taken place in recent years in the League of Nations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. KING. I have a high regard for my friend from North Dakota and for his views and hesitate to dissent from some of his expressions. However, I do not agree with the statement which he made respecting the purposes back of the League. The Senator will recall that the idea of a league or concert of nations was not new. It had been advocated for centuries. William Penn, Abbe Pierre, and others advocated a league or organization of nations along the line of the frame of the League of Nations contained in the Versailles Treaty.

Gen. Jan Smuts, of South Africa, one of the greatest statemen of this age, was largely responsible for the draft of the League which was presented to the Paris Conference. Undoubtedly, President Wilson played an important part in framing and securing the adoption of the covenant of the League of Nations. General Smuts had from experience in wars learned of their devastating effects. He was a lover of peace, as was President Wilson, Lloyd George, Clemenceau, Lord Cecil, and others who participated in the Versailles Conference. They believed the time had come for the establishment of an international organization which would provide collective security and set up some instrumentality that would prevent war, or at least remove many of the causes of war. They believed it necessary to create a tribunal to which reference might be made for the settlement of international controversies, such controversies which otherwise would be settled upon bloody battlefields.

I have no doubt that those who drafted the Versailles Treaty, which embodied the League Covenant, sincerely believed that it would prevent many international conflicts. They were actuated by the highest motives and sought only the good and welfare of the world. Unfortunately, for the League, our Nation did not ratify the Versailles Treaty; unfortunately Japan and Germany have withdrawn from the League. This Nation, with its great resources, with its power, physical, moral, and spiritual—and I emphasize the two latter; I believe we have moral and spiritual power—would have strengthened the League and would have given to it a permanency, a potency, and a prestige of which it was deprived. It is believed by many that our country, in part at least, is responsible for the failure of the League to reach those heights that it would have attained and which would have brought the results which it was anticipated would be realized under the provisions of the Covenant.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Utah how he thinks we would have accomplished the result of keeping Japan, for instance, and Germany and Italy in line? Would the Senator have favored raising an army and using it and our naval forces to keep Japan in line and to keep Germany and Italy in line?

Mr. KING. No; but I believe that if the United States had joined the League and sat down at the council table, as it would have done—at the head of the table, may I say?—that the current of the world's history would have been different. If that had been done, it is reasonably certain that Germany and Japan would not have left the League. The failure of the United States to enter the League undoubtedly led other nations to doubt its effectiveness or the possibility of realizing the ideals which it was understood the League represented and to attain that for which it was organized.

I cannot but believe that if the United States had been a member of the League it would have been a great factor and a pervasive influence for peace and security in a troubled world.

Let me make one further observation. When President Wilson came back from the Versailles Conference with the Covenant of the League of Nations, and presented it to the Senate, I had the opportunity of conferring with him in his room in the Capitol a few minutes after he had delivered his message. I asked him why he had been so insistent upon the acceptance of the covenant, before the treaty was completed. He said to me, in substance—I shall not attempt to quote him literally—that he believed, with the smoke of battle in the eyes of the representatives of the belligerent nations no treaty could be drawn that would be free from imperfections, if not injustices. He referred to the invasion of France and Belgium and to the loss of lives of the allied forces.

He said that under such conditions it could not be expected that the people of the suffering nations would forget and forgive the wrongs to which they believed they had been subjected, and therefore he regarded it as necessary that some agency should be established to which appeals might be made for rectification of such injustices as might develop in the enforcement of the treaty. He said further that if an instrumentality was not set up to meet developments then violence would be resorted to and upon the battlefields efforts to obtain redress would be made. I believe, Mr. President, the views of President Wilson were those of a great patriot, a sincere lover of justice and peace among all nations. If his high ideals had been carried out by this and other nations the whole face of the world now would be different.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am pleased to have the opinion of the Senator; I appreciate his earnestness in looking toward world peace; but I wish to ask the Senator from Utah if he does not think if a small part of the money we are now spending for war preparation could be used to promote peace—honestly to promote peace—that it would be money well spent and would be very helpful in promoting world peace?

Mr. KING. I answer that unhesitatingly in the affirmative. I agree with some of the observations made by the Senator a few moments ago when he was criticizing this enormous appropriation carried in this bill. I do not justify it. I think that when we arrange to build two battleships it will compel other nations to revise their naval and military programs and invite them to larger expenditures. When this Nation, impregnable as it is, is willing to spend and does spend from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000 per annum more than does any other nation in the world for military purposes, other nations will inquire as to the purpose of such apparent military preparedness; they will be inclined to perceive in our activities sinister motives and say that the United States is arming in order to commit some aggression upon other lands.

Of course, that is not true; but the very fact that we spend so much money for military purposes will result in other nations augmenting their military expenditures and will intensify the suspicions, if not the hatreds, that may be developed in other nations against the United States. We should spend more for peace and less for war. We should do more to organize for peace and less to organize for war.

Mr. FRAZIER. The fact, of course, that we continue to increase our appropriations for war purposes has resulted in other nations increasing their appropriations for war purposes.

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FRAZIER. And will have the same result in the future.

Mr. KING. That is correct.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. KING. I will be glad to answer the Senator, if I can.

Mr. BENSON. It being true, as the Senator says, that we are spending more than a billion dollars on military preparedness, and that we are spending annually $200,000,000 more than is spent by any other nation in the world, if we are not spending that money for the purpose of aggression, why are we spending it?

Mr. KING. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. BENSON. It seems to me those who are managing the large appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments, amounting to more than a billion dollars should come here prepared to tell us what they are for, if they are not for aggression.

Mr. KING. Perhaps it is paradoxical, but I do not believe, of course, that my country has in view any aggression against any other country. We have indicated by our course by withdrawing our sovereignty over Cuba and the Philippine Islands—or at least have permitted the Filipinos to set up a government of their own and agreed to withdraw our own sovereignty entirely within a few years—and by indicating recently to another island that came to the United States as the result of the Spanish-American War our willingness to surrender sovereignty. So the United States has no purpose to wage war against any other nation, either a strong nation or a weak nation. We want the friendship of Latin American as well as the friendship of all other nations; but when we expend these huge sums, I fear that our action will excite fears and apprehensions upon their part and lead some to believe that the United States meditates some aggressive movement against other powers. Therefore I believe in part with my friend that this Nation could make no finer gesture for world peace, for limitation of armaments in the world, than to say, "We will reduce our military expenditures to a minimum; we propose to indicate to you that we have no purpose to infringe upon any nation; we desire to be leaders in a great world movement for the peace and happiness of all peoples and to secure the abolition of war."

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator. Our officials talk about disarmament and world peace, but continue to prepare for war. That is the situation. This makes us wonder whether or not our officials mean what they say and say what they mean.

Throughout history the nations which were adequately armed were the ones which went to war. Preparation for national defense and not for conquest sounds very plausible, but thinking people, of course, realize, because they have heard the same argument year after year repeatedly and must know by this time if they have not found out before, that so-called adequate defense has not kept nations out of war. No thinking citizen will agree that the building up of a great Navy, as we are undertaking to do now, is necessary in order to defend ourselves against Great Britain, that it is necessary for us to have a little bit larger navy than Great Britain in order to defend ourselves against that nation. I do not think anyone will contend there is any likelihood of Great Britain attacking the United States. For that matter, I think there is no danger of any other nation attacking the United States.

Let us analyze just a little the term "adequate defense." What does it mean? It might be possible that we could adequately defend our Nation against any one great nation. That might be possible. I doubt it very much as to any one of the great nations, but conceding that we could adequately defend ourselves against Great Britain, what would be the situation if we should get into a war with Great Britain and the other great nations of the world should join as allies of Great Britain against the United States? Would it be possible for us to arm adequately against the rest of the world? I do not believe it could be done by any means, by the United States or any other nation.

It is further conceded that so-called up-to-date scientific methods of warfare make it impossible for anything like adequate defense to be had. With modern war appliances, remote control of airplanes, bombing planes with explosives and poison gas and disease germs and other so-called civilized devices for the annihilation of humanity, there is no such thing as adequate defense.

In recent months there have been so-called sham battles of the air in several countries, the principal ones of which were held a few months ago over London, over Paris, and over New York. In each instance the enemy's planes have succeeded in getting back of the defensive plans and coming in over the cities. The official board of the sham battle of the air over London reported—and it was after a continuation of the air battle for 5 days—that it was absolutely impossible to keep out the enemy planes. They also stated that one of the big bombing planes with explosives and fire bombs and poison gas and disease germs could annihilate the greater part of any other city—just one plane! The New York situation and the Paris situation were the same. So when we talk about adequate defense, if we mean to protect ourselves and the lives of our people against the attack of any other country or all the other countries, there is no such thing.

When the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] was talking about the League of Nations it recalled to my mind the fact that the United States was instrumental in getting us into the Kellogg Peace Pact and getting the nations of the world to sign that pact. Yet we have not lived up to it by any means, and no one can truthfully say we have. It is true we have not declared war or gone to war with any other nation, but we have spent more money than we ever did before in peace times for war purposes and we have spent more money than any other nation has spent for similar purposes. It cannot be said in truth that we have lived up to the Kellogg Peace Pact ourselves.

It seems to me the great question confronting us is whether we really want disarmament and peace or whether we want war and preparation for war. We have had disarmament conferences. As was pointed out yesterday by my colleague the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], Army officers were appointed to the Disarmament Conference, one of them being an Army officer, whose sole training had been toward more and greater preparedness for war. Undoubtedly every Senator knows personally some of the men who were named as official delegates to the Disarmament Conference, so-called, and knew when they were appointed that they did not stand for disarmament but favored a bigger navy and a bigger army and were in favor of the so-called preparedness program. So it seems to me that even our own officials who are backing this great program do not really believe in what they are giving out to the public—that preparedness is for adequate defense and for defensive purposes only.

An interesting question was suggested about total disarmament. I am frank to say that at one time I introduced a joint resolution proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States to outlaw war. We had some hearings on the proposed amendment, and some very good evidence was submitted to the committee. The proposed amendment was sponsored by the Women's Peace Union, with headquarters in New York City. At the first hearing we held upon the proposed amendment we invited other peace organizations to come before the committee to give their views. None of them would come. Not a representative of any peace organization came before that committee except the Women's Peace Union, with headquarters in New York City. Later we held another hearing, and at that hearing a few more peace organizations were represented. At the last hearing we held—April 14, 1934—so many peace organizations made application to be heard that we could not take care of all of them.

Only a few weeks ago there was a national peace conference held in the city of Washington with practically all of the great peace organizations joining in it. One of the speakers at the banquet said that up until that time the peace organizations had contented themselves largely with preparing resolutions asking for disarmament and peace and sending them to Congress or to the President. He said:

> Now is the time to get together and cooperate and work along the same line.

I believe they will accomplish something by such a course. The speaker even went so far as to say the peace organizations should take some consideration of the political situation; in other words, that they should think something about electing men to office who honestly advocated disarmament and peace, and not content themselves with electing big Army men and big Navy men or preparedness men who were in favor of these immense appropriations for so-called preparedness. I think that was another step in the right direction.

I wish to read just a brief statement from the hearings on the resolution to which I have just referred proposing to outlaw war. It was made by Miss Byrns, an attorney of New York City, who was one of the officials of the Women's Peace Union of that city, who were instrumental in backing the resolution to outlaw war. Before the Committee on the Judiciary, April 14, 1934, she said:

Nothing has been done. Nothing fundamental, honest, direct has even been attempted. Several Presidents have sent delegates to disarmament conferences, but the delegates have not even talked of genuine, complete disarmament. The country favored the Kellogg Pact because it was advertised as outlawing war. The Senate, with its tongue in its cheek, ratified this pact and voted for battleships.

That is the truth, Mr. President.

However, even had the pact been taken seriously by the Government, it could not prevent such war preparations as the Vinson bill provides for.

That was a naval bill which was pending at that time.

The war powers are still in the Constitution—a constant threat to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; a constant menace to beauty, to human dignity, to civilization itself.

This amendment will take the war powers out of the Constitution. There is no other legal method of getting rid of them.

War is the slaughter of human beings on as large a scale as possible. It is organized, deliberate mass murder.

For what purpose? To protect trade and investments; collect debts and seize territory. To enrich munition makers and war profiteers. To satisfy the egos of little men, cover up the weakness and folly of ignorant, inept politicians.

War is never for the protection of life, the defense of human beings. You know that. We know it. Let us then have done with all the hypocritical, lying talk about self-defense. I believe the American people are weary of being duped and deceived by this false appeal to their finest as well as their basest emotions.

As a veteran of that great nonviolent revolution by which the women of the United States won freedom, I am convinced that any just cause can be won by peaceful methods and hard work.

As a lawyer, I bear witness to the fact that the best, the only satisfactory way, to settle disputes is by the use of constructive nonresistance.

As a citizen of the United States, I will not support war and I will not tolerate the fact that the Government of which I am a part shall longer have the power to prepare for, declare, or carry on war.

I am convinced that violence and bloodshed are always wrong in principle, disastrous in practice.

I urge an immediate report of Senate Joint Resolution No. 24.

Mr. President, those words were spoken by a woman who for years has been an attorney in the city of New York, who has also been interested and has taken a leading part in movements for world peace and real disarmament. I agree that if we are going to have disarmament, if we are going to have world peace, we shall have to go the limit. We cannot have disarmament or world peace and talk about adequate defense, because adequate defense means preparation for war if it means anything.

Mr. President, I realize that it does very little good to talk against this bill. The skids are all greased and ready to slide, and the bill will go through carrying the big appropriations; but I wish to offer the amendment, which I send to the desk. The amendment provides for striking out the provision on page 50 which makes available $115,300,000 for starting the construction of new battleships and other war paraphernalia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). The Senator from North Dakota offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 50, beginning with the word "and" in line 7, it is proposed to strike out down to and including line 16.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I should like to have the yeas and nays on this important amendment. It will save $115,000,000 to start with, and several hundred other million dollars afterward, if it shall be agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BENSON] desires to submit some observations; and it might be well to have that done before calling for a vote.

Mr. FRAZIER. Very well.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may we have the amendment restated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be restated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 50, in line 7, beginning with the word "and", it is proposed to strike out down to and including line 16.

Mr. WALSH. I ask the Senator just what that will do.

Mr. FRAZIER. It will strike out the provision for starting the construction of 12 destroyers, 6 submarines, and not more than 2 capital ships as replacements of over-age capital ships, to be undertaken only in the event that the President determines as a fact that capital-ship replacement construction is commenced by any of the other signatory powers to the treaty for the limitation and reduction of naval armament.

Mr. WALSH. I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BENSON obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, what was the ruling on the request for the yeas and nays?

Mr. FRAZIER. That is what I wish to know.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ruling was that the yeas and nays were not ordered, as only five Members held up their hands.

Mr. FRAZIER. That is more than one-fifth of those present.

Mr. WALSH. I suggest that the request be resubmitted, and I am sure it will be granted.

Mr. FRAZIER. I appeal from the ruling of the Chair, because five Members held up their hands, and I believe that is more than one-fifth of the number present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course, the Chair assumes that a quorum is present.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I submit that five is not one-fifth of those present, because presumptively there is a quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct about that.

Mr. CONNALLY. Therefore, since 5 is not 20 percent of 49, the call of the yeas and nays is not in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, no presumption whatsoever is indulged in a case of this kind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is advised by the parliamentarian that it is.

Mr. McNARY. I disagree with the parliamentarian. That is not correct practice and it has never been followed. The number necessary to order the yeas and nays is one-fifth of those present, and it is the duty of the Chair to count the number present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the custom has been to go back to the last roll call. On the last roll call 69 Senators were present, and 5 is not one-fifth of 69; so the ruling of the Chair will stand.

Mr. McNARY. I insist that the ruling is wrong, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield for that purpose?

Mr. BENSON. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Byrnes	George	La Follette
Ashurst	Capper	Gerry	Logan
Austin	Caraway	Glass	Lonergan
Bachman	Clark	Guffey	McAdoo
Bailey	Connally	Hale	McGill
Barbour	Coolidge	Harrison	McKellar
Barkley	Couzens	Hastings	McNary
Benson	Davis	Hatch	Maloney
Black	Dieterich	Hayden	Minton
Bulkley	Donahey	Johnson	Moore
Burke	Duffy	Keyes	Murphy
Byrd	Frazier	King	Murray

Overton	Robinson	Smith	Tydings
Pittman	Russell	Steiwer	Van Nuys
Pope	Schwellenbach	Thomas, Okla.	Walsh
Radcliffe	Sheppard	Thomas, Utah	White
Reynolds	Shipstead	Townsend

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-seven Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. FRAZIER obtained the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me briefly?

Mr. FRAZIER. I gladly yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. On the point of order that there must be a demand by one-fifth of those present in order to secure a yea and nay vote, I desire to set down in the RECORD my own view, without speaking for anyone other than myself.

I state as a matter of fundamental parliamentary law, whether there is any rule on the question or not, that the presumption always exists that there is a quorum present in the Senate unless a point of no quorum is made and the Senate by having the roll call determines that there is not a quorum present. Therefore, when a demand is made for the yeas and nays, unless one-fifth of the presumptive quorum present hold up their hands, the Chair is under no compulsion to order the roll called for a yea and nay vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has so held.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why is that true, Mr. President? If any other rule obtained, acts of Congress could be made to fall by the proof aliunde, in the courts, that there was not in fact a quorum of the Senate present when some particular action, either the passage of a bill or some other official action of the Senate, was taken. So it is absolutely and imperatively necessary for a legislative body to indulge the presumption, and for the courts and everyone else to be charged with knowledge of the presumption, that what is done is done in the presence of a quorum, unless that particular issue is raised, and the body affirmatively determines that there is not a quorum present. Otherwise, there would be legislative chaos.

It was merely for the purpose of maintaining that theory that I desired to set down in the RECORD the basis upon which I made the point of order that five Members of the Senate were not one-fifth of those present. It may not be written in the rules of the Senate, and I understand there is nothing in Hinds' Precedents on the question, but it is one of those absolutely fundamental things inhering in the very fiber of a legislative body.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FRAZIER. I gladly yield.

Mr. McNARY. I entertain a very high regard for the distinguished Senator from Texas as a statesman, but I do not think he knows much about the rules of the Senate. This question does not lie within the language of a rule, and we have no precedents to guide us, but it has been the practice of the Senate—and I speak as one who has been here nearly 19 years—that if one-fifth of those actually present ask for a roll call, a roll call is ordered.

The reason underlying the practice is plain. Much of the time we transact business without a quorum present. A quorum simply initiates a session. Whether we can proceed or not is not necessarily determined by the presence of a quorum. Therefore we do not indulge in any presumption whatsoever. The practice has been unbroken. This mode of procedure is based upon solid, substantial reason. When the yeas and nays are demanded the Chair must decide whether one-fifth of those present support the demand.

Let us take as an illustration what has happened today. The call of the roll this morning disclosed 72 Senators present. If thereafter 15 Senators had been on the floor, and 14 of those present had held up their hands demanding a yea-and-nay vote, under the theory of the distinguished statesman from Texas, the Chair could not have ordered the yeas and nays, because there would have to be 15 to make one-fifth of 72. The mere recital of the figures shows the absurdity of the position taken by the Senator from Texas. The practice has been, and properly so, that the Chair must determine whether one-fifth of those actually present hold up their hands in support of the demand for the yeas and nays.

I think I have covered the subject completely, and in a way which I think is explicable and understandable, and my position is based on the long, unbroken practice of this body.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Oregon has explained the situation very clearly, as he generally does explain anything about which he speaks.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I am very grateful to the Senator from Oregon for his kind and generous remarks about my ignorance as a parliamentarian. I make no pretense of being a parliamentary sharp. I think a parliamentary sharp in the Senate is somewhat of a nuisance. But I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that in my position I have respectable support in the parliamentarian of the Senate. The parliamentarian of the Senate has probably not been here 19 years, as has the Senator from Oregon, but the parliamentary precedents have been here much longer than has the Senator from Oregon. I respect the Senator's long service, and when I shall have been here 19 years I shall hope to know some small percentage of what the Senator from Oregon knows about parliamentary practice.

Let me illustrate, however. The Senator from Oregon contends that if 15 Members of the Senate were present and 14 held up their hands and demanded the yeas and nays, they could not get it. On the other hand, if only five Senators were present, and one of them held up his hand demanding the yeas and nays, the Chair would have to order the roll called, according to the theory of the Senator from Oregon. Is not that just as ridiculous as the example which he has cited, when he said that if 14 out of 15 actually present demanded the yeas and nays, they could not get them? According to the contention of the Senator from Oregon, one Senator could hold up his hand and have the yeas and nays, under the rule that one-fifth of those present can demand them.

I beg to differ from the views of the Senator from Oregon when he says that all that is necessary is that we have a quorum when we start business, and that then we can go ahead. The Constitution, speaking of the two Houses, provides:

> A majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business.

The Senate cannot do a thing on earth legally unless a quorum is present. Therefore it has to indulge the presumption that a quorum is present until the question is raised and determined. That does not necessarily mean that the quorum has to sit in the front row or in the choice places. Some of the quorum may be out in the cloakroom. It usually is. Some of it may be here in the wings, reading newspapers. The presumption is that when a quorum first is established, the quorum continues to exist until the Senate itself determines that there is no quorum present. Any other theory or any other assumption would be absolutely destructive to legislative procedure and legislative processes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has ruled, and there has been no appeal from that ruling. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am not going to appeal from the decision of the Chair, but I agree with the Senator from Oregon that it is rather unusual to have a ruling of that kind. So far as I can remember since I have been a Member of the Senate this is the first time I have heard of a ruling of the kind that was made.

What the Senator from Texas says about a quorum is correct. Of course, no one is contending that business can be done officially without a quorum. Mr. President, we oftentimes transact business without a quorum on the floor. I think it is the intention to have a quorum on the floor at all times. However, that is not the practice. Oftentimes there are only a few Senators in the Chamber while business is being transacted. If yeas and nays are ordered when less than a quorum is present, of course, when the vote is taken there must be a quorum present or there is no official vote. So I think the Senator's argument is not a very good one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that he recognizes the Senator from North Dakota so that no injustice shall be done to him. The Chair now recognizes the Senator to renew his request for the yeas and nays on his amendment.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment on page 50 of the pending Navy bill to strike out, beginning with the word "and" in line 7, down to and including all of line 16. That is, I propose to strike out the provision for an appropriation of $115,300,000 to begin the building of 6 submarines, 12 destroyers, and 2 battleships. On my amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I have only a few words to say with reference to the proposed amendment. The effect of the Senator's amendment would be to stop the construction of all ships of the Navy now under construction.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. Do I understand the Senator to say that it would stop the construction of those ships which have been started?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. FRAZIER. I do not so understand.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I am going on to explain to the Senator that the estimate of the Navy Department includes only $12,000,000 for expenditure upon vessels not under construction, but the balance of the $115,000,000 provides for the construction of all the vessels referred to in the section under consideration, beginning in line 21, on page 49, which includes submarines, the aircraft carriers which are now under construction, the destroyers, and cruisers. The effect of the Senator's amendment would be to stop the construction of all vessels now being constructed for the Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. President, do I understand from the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina regarding the $115,000,000 clause that the United States Government can build 12 destroyers, 6 submarines, and 2 battleships for $115,000,000.

Mr. BYRNES. No, Mr. President; it would be utterly impossible to do so. The Navy knows that $12,000,000 would only be sufficient to enable them to do the preliminary work which must always be done. It takes 3 years to construct a battleship. The money which would have to be appropriated to pay the cost of construction of a battleship would be carried in appropriation bills over a period of 3 years in the future. The bill provides $12,180,000 for the 1937 program. There would be no hope on the part of the Navy to do more than to prepare the plans. It takes many months to draft the plans for a battleship. If the Senator will look at the paragraph beginning on page 49, line 21, he will see that it winds up in line 16, on the following page, with $115,000,000, and it provides for aircraft carriers, destroyers, cruisers, and several gunboats and other craft.

Mr. BENSON. Am I to understand from that statement that the $529,125,806 provided in the bill carries nothing other than the $12,000,000 which the Senator has mentioned for the construction of the two battleships?

Mr. BYRNES. Twelve million dollars.

Mr. BENSON. Twelve million dollars for the construction of the two battleships?

Mr. BYRNES. No; I will say to the Senator that it does not even include that. Should the contingency provided for in the bill arise and should the President see fit so to order, the Navy Department knows that out of this lump sum which is made available for the payment for ships now under construction they could do such preliminary work as could possibly be done. The $12,000,000 for new construction really provides for the submarines and the other craft mentioned, and there is no appropriation specifically designated for commencing the construction of any battleship.

Mr. BENSON. Then I must understand that should the President order the construction of the two battleships for which the bill authorizes the drawing of plans——

Mr. BYRNES. Then appropriations would have to be made.

Mr. BENSON. Appropriations would have to be made for $104,000,000 more to construct the two battleships?

Mr. BYRNES. Appropriations would have to be made if they were commenced. The next naval bill would have to carry the appropriation for so much of the construction as in the opinion of the Navy Department would be completed during that fiscal year. The following fiscal year a similar appropriation would be carried.

Mr. BENSON. The cost of these battleships is estimated at approximately $51,000,000 each; is that correct?

Mr. BYRNES. That estimate has been made.

Mr. BENSON. Then with the authorization to commence the construction of plans for two battleships costing $51,000,000 each, we are in a measure obligating ourselves to the further appropriation of $104,000,000 additional which is not provided in the pending bill?

Mr. BYRNES. The language is plain. I should say to the Senator in answer to his question that the estimate of cost includes armor and armaments and is not solely for the construction of ships.

Mr. BENSON. Yes; and the Senator might also say that the estimate of the cost of $51,000,000 each does not provide for the auxiliary craft which are always provided to protect the battleships.

Mr. BYRNES. It does not provide, of course, for anything except the battleships.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I find a qualification on page 50, line 12, of the bill, as follows:

> Only in the event that the President determines as a fact that capital-ship-replacement construction is commenced by any of the other signatory powers to the Treaty for the Limitation and Reduction of Naval Armaments signed at London.

Under that language certain construction would be started, provided the President finds certain facts. If he does not find them, will that limit the construction?

Mr. BYRNES. If he does not find them, the construction of the battleships could not be undertaken at all.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That limitation only refers to the two battleships?

Mr. BYRNES. That is correct.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I do not have the floor.

Mr. FRAZIER. Then, I desire to ask the Senator a question if I may. I wish to know how much of the $115,300,000 in line 16 is to commence work on the two battleships which are spoken of?

Mr. BYRNES. I will say to the Senator that I have already answered the question in the last 2 minutes, that not a dollar is in contemplation for that purpose. The $12,180,369 to which I referred is the estimated cost of beginning the 12 destroyers and 6 submarines.

Mr. FRAZIER. That is for the beginning of construction of the 12 destroyers and submarines?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. FRAZIER. I do not see why they need to be begun.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER]. On that question the yeas and nays have been demanded and ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BULKLEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], who is necessarily absent from the Senate. I am advised that if present he would vote as I intend to vote. I am, therefore, free to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] on the passage of this bill. I do not know whether the Senator would construe that pair as applying to the pending amendment, but I transfer the pair to the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HAYDEN. My colleague the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is necessarily detained from the Senate. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. LOGAN (after having voted in the negative). I am advised that my general pair, the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], would, if present, vote as I have voted. Therefore I let my vote stand.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS];

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]; and

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN].

I am not advised as to how any of the Senators mentioned would vote on this question if present.

I also announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] is paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE]. I am advised that if the Senator from Vermont were present he would vote "nay."

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair) (after having voted in the negative). The present occupant of the chair has a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND]. He transfers that pair to the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and allows his vote to stand.

So Mr. FRAZIER's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. President, very briefly, I wish to make a few observations regarding the pending bill.

Four years ago, at its national convention, the Democratic Party deplored the fact that this country was fast approaching a time when a billion dollars would be spent in preparation for war. Just a few weeks ago, with very few dissenting votes, we passed an Army appropriation bill providing for an expenditure of more than $600,000,000. We now have pending before us in another appropriation bill, supposedly for national defense, the staggering sum of $529,000,000.

I wonder if it is not about time that we make a survey, as was suggested in the platform of the Democratic Party 4 years ago at Chicago, into the purposes for which these extravagant sums are being spent? Is it not about time that we look into the purposes for which this money is being spent and try to find out just what we are getting for the millions and billions of dollars we are spending in Army and Navy equipment?

It has been stated here on the Senate floor today that battleships costing many million dollars become obsolete in less than 30 years; in fact, in less than 25 years; and yesterday it was stated that, because of modern inventions, practically our entire Navy is obsolete. The statement that present capital ships become obsolete after 20 or 25 years was made by those in charge of this bill which undertakes to appropriate $529,000,000 for the very purpose, among others, of building more such ships.

The amendment which was just offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], and rejected, it seems to me was not very adequately explained to the Members of the Senate by those opposed to the amendment and those in charge of the bill. As I see it, the clause it was attempted to strike from the bill by the amendment would have prevented Congress from committing itself to the expenditure of $104,000,000 or possibly $208,000,000 not provided for or contemplated in the bill at all, but merely on the order of the President of the United States to commence work on the capital ships.

Mr. President, I desire to introduce at this time a joint resolution bearing upon this question. It is suggested to me by a paragraph in the platform adopted at the Democratic National Convention 4 years ago in Chicago. I send the joint resolution to the desk and ask that it may be read and appropriately referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 263) to establish a policy of national defense was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Joint resolution to establish a policy of national defense

Whereas the Democratic Party, in party convention in Chicago, June 1932, submitted this platform:

"National defense: A navy and an army adequate for national defense based on a survey of all facts affecting the existing establishments, that the people in time of peace may not be burdened by an expenditure fast approaching $1,000,000,000 annually."

And

Whereas the appropriations for the Army and the Navy during the 1937 fiscal year total more than $1,000,000,000; and

Whereas there is no established policy for national defense, and therefore no guide as to what is needed by way of Military or Naval Establishments to assure such defense; and

Whereas the Government of the United States under the Pact of Paris renounced war as an instrument of national policy; and

Whereas the Government of the United States has declared its neutrality in the event of war between or among foreign nations; and

Whereas a fundamental principle of our democratic government as embodied in the Constitution is control of the military branches of the Government by the civilian authorities; and

Whereas the absence of a policy of national defense leads to inefficiency, uncoordinated activities of our Army and Navy, growing demands on the National Treasury to support an Army and Navy for unknown purposes, and results in misunderstanding both at home and abroad of the purposes of our Army and Navy: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That a special committee of civilians be appointed by the President of the United States and that the committee is hereby authorized and directed to make a survey of all the facts affecting the existing establishments of the Army and the Navy, to hold public hearings, and to recommend to the Congress of the United States a policy of national defense that shall be—

In harmony with our agreement to renounce war as an instrument of our national course in international affairs;

Designed only to defend the boundaries of the Nation against invasion;

Actually as well as theoretically in keeping with our neutrality laws;

Instrumental in insuring our peaceful relations with other nations of the world;

Conducive to the elimination from the defense establishments of all agencies designed, or primarily useful, for aggressive purposes; and

Determinative of a basic policy to guide expenditures for national defense so that the people in time of peace may not be burdened in the future by war appropriations fast exceeding $1,000,000,000 annually.

SEC. 2. No member of the committee shall have any financial or economic interest in the production, distribution, or sale of materials used by the Army, Navy, or air forces of the United States; nor shall he hold any interest directly or indirectly in the sale, exchange, or transportation of articles, goods, or commodities to foreign nations; nor shall he have any financial or economic interest directly or indirectly in any foreign country.

SEC. 3. The committee shall be authorized to expend a sum of up to $10,000 and to employ needed clerical help.

SEC. 4. A report shall be prepared not later than March 1, 1937, and presented to the President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Vice President of the United States.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. President, one of the things that has been criticized in the Senate very frequently during the past few weeks has been the attitude of the newspapers of the country, their editorial policy and the unfair manner in which they handle news in their news columns. Newspapers have attacked Members of the Senate officially and unofficially. I recall reading Wednesday of this week an editorial which appeared in the Chicago Daily News, which apparently endeavored to convey to its readers the idea that this country of ours is in grave danger of being attacked by some of our foreign neighbors.

It seems to me the fact that we have been appropriating large sums of money, hundreds of millions, yea, even billions of dollars for preparation for war, and that we continually read in the newspapers stories of the possibility of foreign countries, now at peace with us and friendly to us, attacking us sometime in the immediate future, is one of the reasons why it is very easy for the Congress to appropriate these huge sums of money. It seems to me it would be quite appropriate for the Congress to enact a law which would make it unlawful for newspapers or private citizens to disseminate false information with intent to incite our people to war or which would tend to lead our Government into war with other nations now at peace with us and friendly toward us. The violation of such a law should of course be made punishable in some appropriate manner.

Despite the fact that I know I shall be subject to criticism on the part of newspapers, I intend to introduce a bill to make it unlawful for a newspaper or an individual to disseminate false information which would tend to incite our people to unfriendly relations with other countries or which would tend to incite our Government to war with such nations, and to make a violation of such law punishable by fine and imprisonment. The criticisms which probably will be leveled at the Congress for considering such a measure would involve the right of free speech, but I contend that, while we are at peace with other nations, it is just as vicious for a person to talk in such manner or print articles in such manner as to cause other nations to be unfriendly toward us and which would tend to lead us into war as it is during time of war for a citizen to talk against our own country while we are engaged in war. It seems to me the same penalties should be inflicted in each case.

Such a law is not without precedent. We have in this country laws protecting financial institutions against the issuance of false and untrue information, against the printing of such false and untrue information in newspapers when intended to harm such institutions. We even have laws in many of the States to protect the newspapers against persons who give them false information. So it seems to me it is entirely proper that our Government should have a law to protect it against those selfish individuals who would like to publish or print false information which would tend to stir our people or arouse our people to hatred toward other countries now on friendly terms with us.

I realize that it is useless to talk against the extravagant appropriation bill which is now before the Senate, but since next Sunday will be Mother's Day, and since it is a fact that the ladies of America are practically the only organized force in this country against war and for peace, it seems to be entirely appropriate for me to close my remarks with the ironic prayer for war of that great American, Mark Twain. I send to the desk, and ask permission to have read, the quotation from Mark Twain to which I refer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

MARK TWAIN'S IRONIC PRAYER FOR WAR

O Lord our God, help us to tear their soldiers to bloody shreds with our shells; help us to cover their smiling fields with the pale forms of their patriot dead; help us to drown the thunder of guns with the shrieks of the wounded, writhing in pain; help us to lay waste their humble homes with a hurricane of fire; help us to wring the hearts of their unoffending widows with unavailing grief; help us to turn them out roofless with their children to wander unfriended through wastes of their desolated land. For our sakes, who adore Thee, Lord, blast their hopes, blight their lives, protract their bitter pilgrimage, making heavy their steps, water their way with tears, stain the white snow with the blood of their wounded feet. We ask of One who is the spirit of love and who is the ever-faithful refuge and friend of all that are sore beset, and seek His aid with humble and contrite hearts. Grant our prayer, O Lord, and Thine shall be the praise and glory, now and forever. Amen.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on this bill I wish to mention the gratitude I feel to the committee investigating the munitions industry. I think they deserve a word of commendation at this time, when we are about to pass this great naval appropriation bill.

The members of the Munitions Investigating Committee labored long and arduously; and yet they must feel that in the present condition of the world, and the present warlike attitude of this country and its leadership, their work has been in vain. I cannot believe that it has been entirely in vain; but they have a right to believe it has been in vain when we see the present condition of the world, when we recall that men in public life in this country advocated sanctions and embargoes long before any government which had signed the Covenant of the League of Nations had agreed to sanctions, and when we see propagandists throughout the country, as we saw them from 1914 to 1917, spilling the poison that the people of the United States must continue, as they did in the last war, to meddle in the affairs and the squabbles of all European countries under the guise of asserting our moral leadership to help the good as against the bad.

Evidently, the world has learned nothing from the tragedy of the last war. As a matter of fact, the only tragedy many persons saw in that war was the fact that a few laboring men were able to buy some silk shirts!

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a brief statement from an address made by me as to just what is the condition of our Army numerically compared with the armies of other countries, and the exact status of our Navy compared with the navies of other countries.

As the Senate is ready to vote, I do not care to take the time to answer some of the views expressed here, which I think, in view of the facts, are somewhat exaggerated. The figures submitted will speak for themselves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

How can we consider the broad questions of national defense in their concrete application to our own Government and our own Army and Navy and air forces today without dealing with actual facts rather than with theories?

The facts are that adequate national defense means today (1) a strong Navy and (2) a peacetime Army in terms of both Regulars and Reserves, which shall constitute a real basis of defense, and (3) a largely augmented air force in keeping with the tremendously expanding air forces of other nations. We are forging no weapons of attack, but we are urging potent weapons of defense. We are adhering to the doctrine that the way to insure peace is to be prepared against war—that by being strong to resist we shall have immunity from attack. Without taking further time in discussion of the reasons and circumstances which shape our present policy of national defense, I desire to tell you precisely where our Army and Navy stand today in comparison with those of other nations and precisely what it is proposed to do with respect to their further strengthening.

First, let us consider the United States Army, which is composed of three elements—the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Organized Reserves. The Regular Army consists at present of 12,000 officers and 140,000 enlisted men. These are our professional full-time soldiers. For reasons of economy the size of the standing Army has been kept at the lowest possible minimum. For a number of years up to last July there were only 118,000 enlisted men in the Army. The new Budget proposes an increase of 7,000, to 147,000, for the next fiscal year. The duties of the Regular Army include the defense of Hawaii, the Philippines, the Panama Canal, Puerto Rico, and Alaska. Nearly one-third of the Army is absent from the homeland on this duty. The Regular Army also must provide garrisons for our coast and harbor defenses, furnish a nucleus for rapid expansion in time of emergency, take charge of training our National Guard and Organized Reserves, and provide a force sufficiently strong to hold or repel an invader in the initial phases of war.

Our standing Army is one of the smallest of any country. It ranks about on a par with that of Turkey, and is smaller than the armies of such countries as Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and Spain. Russia, for example, has a standing army of about a million and a quarter. Our National Guard is a civilian force organized under the States, and subject to call into the service of the Nation in time of emergency. The National Guard at present has an aggregate strength of approximately 200,000, which is less than half that authorized by the National Defense Act. In addition to the National Guard there are 85,000 civilians composing the Officers' Reserve Corps, who hold Reserve commissions in the Army and may be called to active duty in time of need.

Now, turning to the Navy, we find that it was not until 1933, 11 years after the Washington Naval Disarmament Conference, that we initiated any substantial naval building program. During these 11 years, while we were striving for disarmament by treaty, our own Navy stood still while all the other nations were strengthening and increasing their navies. During the period between 1922 and 1933 the British Navy laid down 394,000 tons of new naval craft and Japan laid 360,000 tons for her Navy, while the United States' total was 173,000 tons. As a consequence of this slowing down of our own naval building program in 1933 we had 351,000 tons of ships yet to be built under the London Naval Treaty of 1930. Our Navy, instead of being the equal of any navy in the world, was distinctly inferior.

But even our substantially inferior naval tonnage, compared with other naval powers, fails to reflect the inadequacy of our Navy. An actual comparison has to take into account a nation's merchant marine, which is available in case of war as a naval auxiliary. Much has been said about the development of an American merchant marine. I myself have been an earnest advocate of the development of a large merchant marine under the American flag, not simply for considerations of national defense, but as an agency for the promotion of American foreign trade. The fact is that we have no merchant marine worthy of the name, whereas Great Britain and other maritime nations have a large merchant marine, which is an additionally important element of their naval strength.

Our organized military forces comprise only one-third of 1 percent of our total population, and Italy has close to 15 percent of her population in arms, and even Sweden, a peace-loving nation, has organized military forces of 15 percent of her entire population.

The British Empire has 390,000 soldiers in active service and 632,000 in trained reserves and 46,000 in its separate air force. Germany has 426,000 soldiers in active service and trained reserves reported as 1,850,000. France has 600,000 men in her Regular Army and 5,500,000 in trained reserves and 34,000 in her separate air force. Italy has approximately 1,200,000 soldiers in active service and more than 5,000,000 in trained reserves and more than 200,000 in its separate air force. Japan has a standing army of 280,000 and active reserves of nearly 2,000,000. Spain reports a standing army of more than 200,000 and more than 2,000,000 in reserves. Poland, a standing army of more than 260,000 and nearly 1,500,000 in reserves.

Turning now to the Navy, President Coolidge, following the failure of the Geneva Disarmament Conference in 1926, took steps to correct appalling difficiencies in our own naval defense. Under President Hoover there was a suspension, but President Roosevelt has pushed forward new naval construction with the result that during 1933, 100,000 tons of ships were provided for. In 1934 there was laid down a total of 66,660 tons. There remains to be built a total of 51 vessels, comprising 36 destroyers and 15 submarines. But even at the present increased rate in naval building, it will not be until 1942, 6 years from now and 6 years after the expiration of and consequent abandonment of the existing naval disarmament treaties that the United States will have a Navy of treaty strength. In addition to the treaty strength, there is still a general class of ships required to round out the fleet and to make it a balanced whole, namely, tankers, repair ships, submarine tenders, hospital ships, and marine transports, which our own merchant marine is inadequate to supply.

Here are some interesting naval figures. As of today the United States has 16 large cruisers, Great Britain 19, and Japan 14. We have 10 small cruisers, Great Britain 36, and Japan 22. Italy has 11 battle cruisers and 17 smaller cruisers. Great Britain has six aircraft carriers with a 22,000-ton vessel now in process of construction, we have four, Japan has four.

Comparative total naval tonnage by no means accurately measures comparative naval strength. The speed of ships, their armament, and their obsolescence are all matters that have to be taken into account, and as matters now stand we still have some distance to go before we can truly say our own naval strength is second to none.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I have been informed that a committee representing the organization known as the People's Mandate to Governments called on the Senator in charge of the naval bill this morning to appeal for the immediate stopping of all increase of armaments and of armed forces. Of course, that applies to this bill. The heading of the petition is:

PEOPLE'S MANDATE TO GOVERNMENTS

We, the people, are determined to end war. War settles no problems. War brings economic disaster, needless suffering, and death to us and our children.

To meet the present threat of complete world chaos we demand that our Government, having renounced war in the Kellogg-Briand Pact, stop immediately all increase of armaments and of armed forces.

The ladies of the committee representing this organization claim to have a million signers to this petition.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, yesterday I offered an amendment, which was adopted, at page 36, line 6. I move to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was adopted, and offer as a substitute for it the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment, on page 36, line 6, was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In lieu of the amendment heretofore agreed to it is proposed to insert:

The present incumbent, as attending physician at the Capitol, shall hereafter, while so serving, receive the pay and allowances of a rear admiral of the lower half and when retired his retired pay shall be computed on that basis.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

FEDERAL AID FOR ROAD CONSTRUCTION

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 11687, to amend the Federal Aid Highway Act, and so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11687) to amend the Federal Aid Highway Act, approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with amendments.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will state the first committee amendment.

The first amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, at the end of section 1, page 3, after line 11, to insert a new paragraph, as follows:

(d) If within the fiscal years 1936 or 1937 the Secretary of Agriculture shall find with respect to any State that the proceeds of all special taxes on motor-vehicle transportation, as referred to in section 12 of the act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 993), are applied to highway purposes as defined in said section, and shall further find that after having so applied such proceeds to such highway purposes other than construction there will be insufficient balance remaining for construction with which to match all, or any part, of the regular Federal-aid road funds apportioned to such State for either or both said years, respectively, in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Highway Act of 1921, as amended and supplemented, all, or such portion, of such apportionment as the State is unable to match shall be available for expenditure in such State in accordance with said Federal Highway Act without being matched by the State with State funds.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I believe it would be proper to make a brief explanation of the terms of the bill.

I have taken the trouble to prepare a rather elaborate report which explains in detail each section and provision of the bill and the purpose of all the amendments. At the conclusion of the report the situation is summarized as follows:

The total annual expenditures from the Federal Treasury as authorized by the bill are $244,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1938 and 1939, made up as follows:

Regular Federal aid, $125,000,000.

Which is the amount carried for the current fiscal year.

Forest highways, roads, and trails, $20,000,000.

Which is twice the amount carried for the current fiscal year; but the evidence submitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads clearly demonstrates the necessity for the increase. Even with appropriations at this higher rate, it will take more than 15 years to construct the planned system of forest highways and approximately 30 years to complete the road and trail work to be done within the national forests.

The next item is:

Nontaxable public-land highways, $2,500,000.

Which is the amount carried in the current law.

National park roads and trails, $7,500,000.

That is the amount authorized for the present fiscal year.

There follows a new provision for national parkways, and the amount is $10,000,000 a year. To date two great parkways have been established—one to connect the Shenandoah National Park with the Great Smoky Mountains National Park, extending through Virginia and North Carolina; another is known as the Natchez Trace in Tennessee and Mississippi. This is a new but a highly desirable activity of the National Park Service.

Indian reservation roads, $4,000,000.

Which is the sum at present authorized.

Secondary or feeder roads, $25,000,000.

This is a new departure, but entirely justified if a serious and sustained effort is made to get the farmer out of the mud.

In the years to come work on the secondary or farm-to-market roads will undoubtedly be expanded as the trunk-line highways are completed. There is a necessity for change in the statutes of the various States to permit a number of the State highway departments to supervise the construction of that type of roads. This bill authorizes a modest appropriation, with the idea that the need for changing State laws may be brought to the attention of the State legislatures when they convene next year.

The next item is for the elimination of grade crossings—$50,000,000. Unlike the appropriation for primary or secondary roads, this sum need not be matched by the States, and properly so, because the States are put to a great burden of expense in acquiring property rights and paying property damages in the centers of population where underpasses or overpasses are built. In addition to that, the railroads provide valuable engineering assistance and rights-of-way.

The total sum is $244,000,000, authorized by the bill to be appropriated for each of the fiscal years 1938 and 1939.

It is interesting to note that since the Federal Government undertook to aid the States in the construction of highways, 20 years ago, under the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1916 there has been expended from the Federal Treasury over $1,987,000,000. Within that same period there has been collected by Federal taxation from those who use the roads a sum total of $2,033,000,000. In other words, in the past two decades those who use the roads have paid Federal taxes amounting to more than the total Federal expenditures for highway purposes.

At the close of the report is shown an even more remarkable set of figures for the past three years and a half. For the fiscal years 1933, 1934, and 1935, and for the present fiscal year up to March 31, 1936, there have been expended the largest sums of money ever appropriated by Congress toward highway construction, a total of $829,000,000. Yet, during the same period there has been collected from those who used the highways a total of $958,000,000. In other words, there has been collected $128,000,000 more than has been disbursed, even at this highly accelerated rate of expenditure.

It may therefore be properly asserted that if a principle is to be followed which we all believe to be sound, that moneys collected from the users of the highways should be expended upon the highways, there has been diversion of Federal funds to the extent of $128,000,000 from 1933 to date.

There is great complaint throughout the United States respecting the diversion of highway funds, which has taken place at an increasing rate, not upon the part of the Federal Government but by the States. A rule was established when the gasoline tax was first imposed by the States, that practically all of the collections from that tax, the tax on oil and on motor vehicles of all kinds, should be expended on building or maintaining highways. In 1925 only $14,000,000 was diverted for other than highway purposes in all of the States. Within the next 10 years the policy of diversion was so advanced that by 1934 over $125,000,000 was diverted to other than road uses. In other words, the diversion increased tenfold in 10 years. On the authority of the National Highway Users Conference, I make the statement that there was enough money diverted from the gasoline tax and like sources to other uses in the States in the year 1934 to build a high type of highway from New York to San Francisco, another from Chicago to New Orleans, and a third from New York to Jacksonville, Fla. Three great highways of that type could have been constructed with the money that was taken away from the users of the roads and diverted to other than highway purposes by the States.

It is a sound proposition that if the Federal Government is to tax the users of highways, Congress should direct that what is collected from that source shall be used on the highways. If the revenue so obtained is not spent upon the highways, it should not be diverted to other uses, but the Federal taxes upon gasoline and motor vehicles of every kind should be correspondingly reduced.

The report shows the sources of the revenue collected from those who used the roads during the calendar year 1935. They are as follows:

Lubricating oils, $28,000,000; gasoline, $172,000,000; transportation of oil by pipe line, $9,000,000; crude petroleum, $1,600,000; automobile trucks, $6,600,000.

The tax on automobiles and motorcycles produced $42,000,000; the tax on parts and accessories produced $7,000,000; on tires, $22,000,000; on inner tubes, $5,000,000.

The total collection for the calendar year 1935 amounted to $296,000,000.

The bill authorizes expenditures for the fiscal years 1938 and 1939 amounting to $244,000,000. While it is true that all of the money collected in the form of the gasoline tax and other taxes on motor transportation does not come from the users of the roads, because a certain amount of gasoline and oil are used in stationary engines and elsewhere, yet there is a margin of between 50 and 60 million dollars a year between what may be clearly anticipated as the total revenue, and the total expenditures authorized by the bill. I say that advisedly, because the records show there are being purchased each year about 3,000,000 new automobiles and trucks. Some of them, of course, are to replace machines now being worn out, but each year there is an increase in the number of motor vehicles on the roads.

There are at present about 26,000,000 automobiles and trucks in use in the United States, and with a continuous increase in the number of motor vehicles on the roads, we have every right to expect that at the present rates of Federal taxation over $300,000,000 a year will be placed in the Treasury. The bill authorizes expenditures to the extent of $244,000,000.

Therefore, it can be truly said that the bill represents a fair return to the motorist, to the user of the road, for the money he pays in taxation to the Federal Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. POPE in the chair]. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment of the committee was, in section 2, on page 4, line 10, to strike out "$10,000,000 and to insert in lieu thereof "$20,000,000"; on line 11, to strike out "$10,000,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$20,000,000"; and on line 12, after the numerals "1939", to insert the following proviso: "Provided, That one-third, but not less than $3,000,000, of the appropriation made for any fiscal year for carrying out the provisions of said section 23 may hereafter be expended for the purposes enumerated in the first paragraph of clause (a) of said section 23: And provided further, That on or before January 1 of each year the Secretary of Agriculture shall apportion and prorate among the several States, Alaska, and Puerto Rico, as provided in said section 23, the sum authorized for the fiscal year immediately following and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to approve projects under any such apportionment, and to incur obligations or enter into contracts under his apportionment and prorating of the authorization, and his action in so doing shall be deemed a contractual obligation on the part of the Federal Government for the payment of the cost thereof", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 23 of the Federal Highway Act of 1921 there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for forest highways, roads, and trails the following sums, to be available until expended in accordance with the provisions of said section 23: The sum of $20,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938; the sum of $20,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939: Provided, That one-third, but not less than $3,000,000, of the appropriation made for any fiscal year for carrying out the provisions of said section 23 may hereafter be expended for the purposes enumerated in the first paragraph of clause (a) of said section 23: And provided further, That on or before January 1 of each year the Secretary of Agriculture shall apportion and prorate among the several States, Alaska, and Puerto Rico, as provided in said section 23, the sum authorized for the fiscal year immediately following and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to approve projects under any such apportionment, and to incur obligations or enter into contracts under his apportionment and prorating of the authorization, and his action in so doing shall be deemed a contractual obligation on the part of the Federal Government for the payment of the cost thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 6, line 1, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 5. For the construction and maintenance of parkways, to give access to national parks, or to become connecting sections of a national parkway plan, over lands to which title has been transferred to the United States by the States or by private individuals, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $10,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and the sum of $10,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939: Provided, That the location of such parkways upon public lands, national forests, or other Federal reservations shall be determined by agreement between the department having jurisdiction over such lands and the National Park Service.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to the committee amendment, on line 2, after the word "parks", to insert the words "and national monuments", so as to read:

For the construction and maintenance of parkways, to give access to national parks and national monuments—

And so forth. I offer the amendment so that the bill may conform to the report.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 6, after line 12, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 6. For construction and improvement of Indian reservation roads under the provisions of the act approved May 26, 1928 (45 Stat. 750), there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $4,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and the sum of $4,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, at the end of section 6, page 6, I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the proposed amendment to the committee amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 6, line 18, after the figures "1939", it is proposed to add the following proviso:

: Provided, That hereafter the location, type, and design of all roads constructed under the provisions of said act of May 26, 1928, shall be approved by the Bureau of Public Roads before any expenditures are made thereon, and all such construction done by contract shall be under the general supervision of said Bureau.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the text of the amendment I am offering is a reproduction of a proviso contained in the Interior Department appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1935, where the appropriation for Indian reservation roads was made. The idea is that there should be the same supervision afforded and the same advice given to the Bureau of Indian Affairs in the construction of roads on Indian reservations as the Bureau of Public Roads extends to States in making their expenditures.

Mr. ROBINSON. The amendment, then, applies to the construction of highways on Indian reservations?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; and only to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, in section 7, on page 7, line 3, after the word "routes", to strike out the words "Provided further, That there shall be established in the Bureau of Public Roads a section of rural roads, subject to the direction of the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. In addition to any other authorizations which have been made, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the several States to be apportioned and expended under the provisions of the Federal Highway Act of 1921, as amended and supplemented: The sum of $25,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938; the sum of $25,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939: Provided, That the sums herein authorized shall be applied to secondary or feeder roads, including farm-to-market roads, rural free delivery mail roads, and public-school bus routes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, in section 8, on page 8, line 3, after the numerals "1939", to insert the following proviso: "Provided, That no part of the appropriations hereafter made for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Federal Highway Act, or any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, shall be approved for expenditure on any highway unless proper safety protective devices shall be installed or be in operation at any highway and railroad grade crossing or drawbridge on that portion of the highway with respect to which such expenditures are to be made and said devices shall comply with the safety standards determined by the United States Bureau of Public Roads at that time as being adequate", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. For the elimination of hazards to life at railroad grade crossings, including the separation or protection of grades at crossings, the reconstruction of existing railroad grade-crossing structures, and the relocation of highways to eliminate grade crossings, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, to be apportioned on or before the 1st day of January of each year preceding the fiscal year for which it is authorized among the several States (including the Territory of Hawaii and the District of Columbia) in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Highway Act of 1921, as amended and supplemented, except that such apportionment shall be one-half on population as shown by the latest decennial census, one-fourth on the mileage of the Federal-aid highway system as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, and one-fourth on the railroad mileage as determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to be expended in accordance with said Federal Highway Act, as amended and supplemented, except that no part of such funds apportioned to any State need be matched by the State: The sum of $50,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938; the sum of $50,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939: Provided, That no part of the appropriations hereafter made for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Federal Highway Act, or any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, shall be approved for expenditure on any highway unless proper safety protective devices shall be installed or be in operation at any highway and railroad grade crossing or drawbridge on that portion of the highway with respect to which such expenditures are to be made and said devices shall comply with the safety standards determined by the United States Bureau of Public Roads at that time as being adequate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, in section 9, on page 8, line 17, to strike out "1, 5, and 6" and to insert in lieu thereof "1, 7, and 8", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. With the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, not to exceed 1½ percent of the amount apportioned for any year to any State under sections 1, 7, and 8 of this act may be used for surveys, plans, engineering, and economic investigations of projects for future construction in such State, either on the Federal-aid highway system and extensions thereof or on secondary or feeder roads.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask that the section numbers may be changed to conform to the amendments made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will make the necessary changes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, that concludes the committee amendments.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 8, after line 14, it is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 10. Every contract for the construction or repair of any highway growing out of an appropriation of Federal funds made under this act, heretofore made or hereafter to be made, shall contain a provision that in the performance of the work the contractor, subcontractors, materialmen, or suppliers shall use only such unmanufactured articles, materials, and supplies as have been mined or produced in the United States, and only such manufactured articles, materials, and supplies as have been manufactured in the United States substantially all from articles, materials, or supplies mined, produced, or manufactured, as the case may be, in the United States. The fact that articles, materials, or supplies have been produced or manufactured in this country from articles, materials, or supplies which have been imported into this country shall not make them eligible for use in the performance of any such contract. This section shall not apply to articles, materials, or supplies which are not mined, produced, or manufactured, as the case may be, in the United States in sufficient and reasonably available commercial quantities and of a satisfactory quality: Provided, however, That before the use of any such imported articles, materials, or supplies is authorized under any contract the head of the department or the independent establishment making a contract for such imported supplies shall give public notice that such an exemption is being contemplated, and after due opportunity has been given for domestic suppliers of such articles, materials, or supplies to be heard, a public record shall be made of the findings which justify such exemption.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the pending Federal-aid highway bill, being House bill 11687, providing for appropriations aggregating $236,500,000 for each of the years 1938 and 1939, will provide important markets for asphalt. Most of the asphalt used in highway construction is made from petroleum. The United States produces about 60 percent of the total world production of petroleum. In spite of this, the United States is importing about 50 percent of the asphalt or asphalt-bearing oils used in this country from other nations whose total production is slightly over 10 percent of the world production. These imports are brought into this country by a small number of importing concerns.

From the various types of crude oil produced in this country, asphalts of almost every quality are manufactured. Road asphalt made from domestic petroleum is available in large quantities. Evidence submitted to the Fact Finding Committee of the Planning and Coordination Committee under the Petroleum Code meeting with the representatives of the Administrative Board has shown that road asphalt produced from this domestic oil is of the highest quality. Such difference in prices as might exist between the domestic and foreign products is very small; and since the cost of the asphalt in any mile of highway is not one of the major items, this slightly increased cost would not greatly increase the total cost of the road built from this asphalt.

The cost of the domestic product is not entirely due to the production nor the manufacturing cost, but is also due to royalties and lease payments made to farmers and landowners and distributed to large numbers of persons in this country. Another portion of the slightly higher cost of the domestic product is due to the American wage scale, which does not prevail in Mexico nor in Venezuela, from which come nearly the entire importation of foreign asphalt or foreign asphaltic oils.

The intent of Congress in the adoption of many emergency construction or relief measures has been clearly expressed. The purpose has been announced to give the largest amount of employment to American labor and to give the largest amount of opportunity to American industry, in order that the purchasing power of the American people might be increased. If an industry like the domestic asphalt industry is to be penalized through loss of potential Government contracts to the slightly cheaper foreign asphalt because of its higher labor costs, then seemingly the only remedy would be to reduce wages and increase hours of labor. Such a suggestion reduces to an absurdity the argument that the lower-priced product should be used even if it is of foreign origin. If this theory were generally adopted, much of the labor which has been put to work during the past 3 years would still be unemployed, since great quantities of the various materials used in the various kinds of construction work undertaken by the Federal Government or with its aid could have been obtained in foreign countries at lower cost than the domestic product.

A large number of petroleum refineries have closed their plants and gone out of business during the past few years. Many of these would still be in operation if imported asphalt, or asphalt made from imported petroleum, had not taken the place of domestic asphalt which could have been produced at these refineries. On the other hand, those refineries which are today producing asphalt in this country from foreign petroleum would still use the same employees if domestic crude oil instead of foreign crude oil were used. The same operations would be required and the same amount of labor would be necessary. All the difference would be that American companies and American workers would produce the crude petroleum from which the asphalt is made. Of course there would be one other difference. Those importers who are today bringing in the cheaper foreign petroleum would not make such large profits if they were forced to use the domestic petroleum.

Since the asphalt of the domestic petroleum industry has suffered because of foreign asphalt, or asphalt produced from foreign oils, being granted exemption from the provisions of acts requiring the use of domestic materials or the products of domestic manufacture, the Independent Petroleum Association of America, which includes nearly all the small producers of the Middle West and Western States, urges this amendment to the Federal Highway Act now before the Senate. This amendment is intended to make effective an intent which Congress has several times expressed in the past, that domestic industry and domestic labor shall be aided and encouraged in the expenditures of these large Federal appropriations whose primary intent, it is generally understood, is to increase employment and to enlarge the purchasing power of the American people.

The suggested amendment follows the general language of the so-called Domestic Origins Act, except that the following sentence has been added:

> The fact that articles, materials, or supplies have been produced or manufactured in this country from articles, materials, or supplies which have been imported into this country shall not make them eligible for use in the performance of any such contract.

The language used in the Domestic Origins Act has also been altered so that when exemptions are made, the head of the department or independent establishment making such exemption can do so only in the case of articles, materials, and supplies which are not mined, produced, or manufactured in the United States in sufficient or reasonably available commercial quantities and of a sufficient quality. This amendment also provides that when such an exemption is being contemplated public notice shall be given and domestic suppliers shall be given due opportunity to be heard, and a public record made of the findings deemed to justify such exemption.

The domestic asphalt industry has suffered severely because of various exemptions made to most of the regulations requiring the use of domestic material in construction work under emergency Federal appropriations.

Russell Brown, representing the Independent Petroleum Association, recently made a statement to the House Committee on Roads in which he said:

> No convincing information has to date been given defining the question as to how it was not practicable to require the use of asphalt produced from domestic crude; neither have any figures been offered, to the best of our information, showing how or where the use of domestic asphalt would unreasonably increase the cost of highway construction. This exemption in favor of the foreign asphalt and discriminating in effect against the domestic product has continued in force to this time. The Domestic Origins Act, so-called, is actually title III of the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill, approved March 3, 1933. This title specifically requires the use of "only such unmanufactured articles, materials, and supplies as have been mined or produced in the United States, and only such manufactured articles, materials, and supplies, as have been manufactured in the United States substantially all from articles, materials, or supplies mined, produced, or manufactured, as the case may be, in the United States."
> In spite of this clear provision of the law, the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department in its Procurement Bulletin SPO–20, issued September 4, 1935, cited a certificate signed by the Secretary of the Treasury under date of August 27, as follows:
> "* * * authority is hereby given to purchase, when required, asphalt made from foreign crude oil, the processing of which is done in the United States of American companies employing American citizens and using American capital."
> Under this ruling of the Treasury Department, bids have been awarded to contractors using foreign asphalt where the difference in price between the foreign and domestic product was very slight. It has been stated a number of times without any contradiction that in at least one instance, this difference of cost, presumably an "unreasonable difference", was one-hundredth of a cent.

Mr. President, the United States has an abundance of petroleum capable of making any and all petroleum products necessary to domestic consumption; and the injection of foreign petroleum into our market must of necessity reduce the amount of oil that can be consumed domestically in proportion to the amount that is imported. The domestic petroleum industry carries a very heavy burden of both State and Federal taxes, from which the foreign industry is free, and is thus contributing materially to the welfare of our Government. It is not fair that the laborer employed in this industry should be forced to remain idle while foreign labor is employed to produce petroleum products to enter into competition with our domestic oils.

For these reasons, I respectfully present the amendment to the Senate for its consideration, and urge that it be incorporated in the Federal-aid highway bill for the promotion of domestic industry and the employment of American labor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, after careful consideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, decided not to report it favorably. The amendment has been before the Senate for some time in the shape of a bill presented by the Senator from Kansas.

A few days ago I received a letter from the Department of State. It is dated May 7, 1936, is signed by the Secretary of State, and is as follows:

MAY 7, 1936.

The Honorable KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Chairman, Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: I wish to transmit herewith a copy of a memorandum dated May 5, 1936, which has been presented to the Department of State by the Mexican Embassy, with reference to an amendment introduced by Senator CAPPER on the calendar day April 29, 1936, to the bill H. R. 11687.

This amendment would require a provision in every contract for construction or repair of any highway growing out of an appropriation of Federal funds made under the Federal Aid Highway Act that there shall be used only such unmanufactured articles, materials, and supplies as have been mined or produced in the United States, and only such manufactured articles, materials, and supplies as have been manufactured in the United States substantially all from articles, materials, or supplies mined, produced, or manufactured, as the case may be, in the United States. It is my understanding that this amendment would mainly affect the use of asphalt produced from imported crude petroleum.

I assume that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which this amendment has been referred, will wish to give full consideration to its possible effects upon our trade relations, particularly with Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, and Peru, as well as to aspects of domestic policy which may be involved.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

Attached to the letter which I have just read, which was addressed to me, is the memorandum to which the Secretary referred, which is as follows:

MEMORANDUM

The Mexican Embassy presents its compliments to the Department of State, and takes the liberty of calling the attention of the Department to the following situation:

The Federal Aid Highways Act, now being considered by the Senate, provides large appropriations for the construction of highways in 1937 and 1938.

At present and for many years past the highways of the United States have been constructed of asphalt made from the crude oil imported from Mexico. In fact, all imports of crude oil from Mexico are converted into paving asphalt.

The western producers of domestic crude oil have tried to prohibit the use of this superior grade of asphalt in public works without success. Their last attempt is incorporated in the amendment presented by Senator CAPPER (copy attached), which in lines 3 to 7, of page 2, provides that no materials manufactured from imported products shall be used in roads.

The result of the enactment of this amendment would be that asphalt manufactured from Mexican crude oil could not be used in public works in the United States. Importations of Mexican crude oil would naturally be diminished or probably terminated.

Furthermore, the amendment would constitute a barrier against commerce of exactly the nature which Secretary Hull deplores.

The Mexican Embassy thanks the Department of State for the attention it might give to this matter.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 5, 1936.

Mr. President, I think it should be said that about half of the crude oil used for roads comes from abroad and about half from this country. Some petroleum fields, I am informed, produce a crude product that is fit for making asphalt used in the construction of roads, while that is not true of the product of other fields. I am informed that the product of the Kansas oil field does not furnish much asphalt for use in road construction. There are differences in oils throughout the country. At any rate, under these circumstances, your committee thought that it was proper not to adopt this amendment, and I hope it will not be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I am not opposed to this amendment for any of the reasons indicated by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], for I heartily concur in the basic thesis of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] respecting complete and absolute preference for American production wherever possible; but there seems to be another question involved in this particular amendment, and, after all, this is a road bill, as I understand, and not a tariff bill.

The State Highway Commissioner of Michigan, Mr. Murray Van Wagoner, telegraphs the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] and myself as follows—and I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to this statement:

Defeat of this amendment is essential for the continued use of high-quality asphalt products in the State of Michigan.

Apparently it appears to be the opinion of the State highway commissioner—and he also asserts in the telegram that this is the experience both of his administration and the preceding State highway administration in Michigan—that he cannot build the kind of roads he wants to build unless he can have what he calls high-quality asphalt which apparently the terms of this amendment would proscribe. What has the Senator from Kansas to say about that?

Mr. CAPPER. I know that large quantities of domestic asphalt are being used, and I have heard no complaint as to the quality of the asphalt. The domestic producers insist they can supply a material that will meet every requirement.

Mr. VANDENBERG. So far as the oil factor of the equation in Michigan is concerned, I think I should probably add from the State highway commissioner's telegram the following:

This does not affect Michigan oil industry, as asphalt made from Michigan crudes is not suitable for paving purposes.

This is apparently another of those situations such as the one to which the Senator from Tennessee is referring.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona, who is the best authority I know of not only on the subject of getting appropriations [laughter], but also on the subject of building roads, whether there is any dependable information conclusively available on the question raised by the State highway commissioner of Michigan?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the best information that I have is based upon data furnished by the chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, and a report from the Secretary of Agriculture, both adverse to this proposal.

This same question was before the Bureau of Public Roads on another occasion, and was decided adversely to those who favor this amendment. The findings of the Bureau were:

That a requirement that all asphaltic material for highway work be produced from domestic crude will unreasonably increase the cost of such materials in a considerable portion of the United States.

* * * * * * *

That with the exception of the importation of some foreign crude by certain east-coast refineries, asphaltic highway materials are largely byproducts of the oil refining industry.

In other words, the materials are byproducts of American industry.

That asphaltic materials constitute only a minor fraction of the output of the oil industry considered as a whole.

That approximately 60 percent of the asphalt manufactured at refineries in the United States in 1932 was used for road and street work.

That approximately 55 percent of the asphalt manufactured in the United States in 1932 was from foreign crude.

Refineries on the Atlantic seaboard accounted for between 85 and 90 percent of the asphalt produced from foreign crude. This asphalt was used principally in supplying the territory adjacent to the eastern seaport, and it is this territory which would be most adversely affected by a requirement to use only asphaltic highway materials produced from domestic crude.

In support of the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads that midcontinent crudes do not provide a material satisfactory for road-making purposes, I should like to read a paragraph from a letter from Warren Bros. Roads Co., the largest independent organization engaged in street paving in the United States, which states:

This company, the most extensive user of petroleum asphalt for paving, has for 30 years conducted research into the quality and uses of asphalt. The results of our laboratory research make it necessary that we require on our guaranteed pavements the asphalt produced from full asphaltic base oils and cannot accept paraffin or semiasphaltic base oils for construction. California, Mexico, Colombia, and Venezuela produce decidedly superior crudes as compared with the now so-called midcontinent fields, and it is essential that sufficient high-grade crudes be made available at the refineries to localize production of these best grades and to head off high price advances and long transportation costs.

The same statement is repeated by the Granite Bituminous Paving Co. of St. Louis, Mo., from whose letter I quote, as follows:

We have found that there are some domestic asphalts that are of high quality, such as asphalt refined from California crudes, but we also know that there are midcontinent crudes which do not produce a high-grade asphalt material.

The Corps of Engineers also finds that in the use of asphalt in connection with river and harbor work midcontinent crudes cannot be depended upon to supply a binder that is as satisfactory as the California or Mexican or Venezuelan crudes. General Markham says:

While there appears to be some difference of opinion as to the relative merits of asphalt produced from domestic and foreign crudes in highway construction work, there is a consensus of opinion that asphalts manufactured from Mexican and South American crudes possess superior qualities particularly desirable to the exacting requirements of river revetment work.

There is no question that if a specification requires the use of the best kind of a binder for highway work, as should be the case if we want to build the best kind of roads, probably the only place in the United States where suitable asphaltic material can be obtained is California. The Pennsylvania and midcontinent fields cannot supply the kind of asphaltic highway materials desired.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then, as I understand the Senator, he thinks the protest of the State highway commissioner of Michigan is probably justified?

Mr. HAYDEN. The protest read by the Senator from Michigan is fully verified and sustained by the information furnished by the Bureau of Public Roads.

I therefore hope, Mr. President, that the amendment may not be adopted.

I should like to include in the RECORD, if I may, a protest against the amendment signed by the American Motorists Association, which goes into the matter in some detail.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 7, 1936.

HON. CARL HAYDEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR HAYDEN: The American Motorists' Association wishes to protest the adoption of the amendment to H. R. 11687 by the distinguished Senator CAPPER, for the following reasons:

1. It is a tariff proposal and not germane to the Federal Aid Highway Act.

2. It would prohibit the use of asphalt manufactured in the United States from imported crude oil.

3. It is not in the interest of the conservation of our natural resources.

4. It will create an asphalt monopoly. The United States Treasury Department reports that the Standard Oil Co. of California controls the only American wells pumping the heavy grade crude oil convertible into asphalt, economically marketable in the East.

5. The use of asphalt manufactured from domestic crude oil only will greatly increase the cost of asphaltic materials, resulting in a greatly reduced road-building program and the consequent employment of fewer men.

6. The forced increase in asphalt prices will serve to justify increased cement prices.

7. It would create delays, confusion, and other dangers attendant to a change in the accepted and established highway specifications of many municipalities, counties, and State highway departments.

The American Motorists' Association is composed of automobile clubs representing many thousands of automobile owners. These members and other highway users through direct taxation have financed the entire Federal highway building program since its inception in 1916, and we respectfully urge that the United States Senate do not enact the amendment proposed.

Sincerely,

AMERICAN MOTORISTS ASSOCIATION,
THOMAS J. KEEFE, General Manager.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I should like to go on record as opposing this amendment for another reason—namely, that it seems to me to involve a very narrow national policy and one which, if carried out to its logical conclusion, would establish the complete isolation of the United States. This is not a tariff, this is not a protective measure or a revenue measure. It appears to be an absolute embargo; and if other countries should assume a similar attitude, the workmen in the United States would pay the bill, because, of all countries in the world, the United States possesses the greatest abundance of resources, materials, and manufactures, and the ultimate penalty would fall upon the American workmen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER].

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I should like to make a few observations on this amendment. It seems to me that at a time when we are trying to create employment for the unemployed in this country it would be a great mistake not to protect as far as possible, by legislation, American industries engaged in producing the very things that must be absorbed in this country to carry on necessary public works.

It has been suggested that only California produces the kind of crude oil from which these necessary materials for road building are made. Suppose that should be true; California is a part of America, and the production of the materials in California, involving a large amount of employment, will result in taking off the relief rolls just that many more men. I feel that we ought in all these cases to give preferential treatment to what is produced in the United States, especially in the present emergency.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. Does the Senator think that California produces enough of a superior quality of crude to supply the normal demand in this country for the higher grade of asphalt used for road improvements?

Mr. McADOO. I have not the present figures of production in California, but I will say that if California does not produce enough, she can do so if given a chance. We have plenty of reserves, ample reserves to supply all that may be needed in this country for road building. I am not making this argument solely for California; I am making it for every American industry involved. I think our first duty is to give our own people the opportunity to get employment instead of keeping them on the relief rolls.

Which is cheaper in the actual money cost involved, I do not know, because I have not the figures, but, in my humble judgment, it will cost much more to keep the unemployed on the relief rolls than it will to pay a little higher price for the necessary materials used in road construction and thereby employ American labor and American enterprise.

Mr. President, the amendment relates not only to oil, but to manufactured articles of all kinds required in the construction of roads and highways. There are many collateral things required in such construction. I think the amendment would be of pronounced benefit for the country in stimulating the production of other things required in road construction, which would cause an additional demand for labor and would take that many more people off the relief rolls. The amendment ought to be adopted. I am in favor of giving America the preference. I am not in favor of giving foreign nations a superior opportunity to American enterprise in the matter of things needed for domestic construction and for domestic use.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a word or two on the amendment. My distinguished friend from California [Mr. McADOO], who was born in Georgia and now lives in the great State of California, seems to overlook the fact that there are sections of the country which would be very heavily penalized if the amendment should be adopted. It is referred to as an amendment which includes materials other than asphalt, but the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] made no mistake about it. He confined his remarks to American asphalt or petroleum.

Mr. President, along the Atlantic seaboard there are a number of valuable and highly capitalized enterprises employing large numbers of men who would be thrown out of employment and forced to go on the relief rolls if we had to import our asphalt or the material for it from the far distant State of California, particularly if we had to pay the price which would induce a volume production twice as great as the present production.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, will my distinguished friend from Georgia yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. McADOO. May I ask the Senator if he does not think that, so far as expense is concerned, it would cost practically the same to bring petroleum, for the purposes we are considering, in ships or tankers from California as from Venezuela and Mexico?

Mr. GEORGE. No; it would not.

Mr. McADOO. Does not the Senator think the amount of oil which could be shipped in that way from California would keep just as many men employed in the factories along the eastern seaboard as if the oil were brought from Mexico or Venezuela or from some other foreign country?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I do not. The crude oil produced in this country suited for a high-grade asphalt will supply only about 50 percent of the demand. If we should adopt measures of this kind, tacked on to a road-building-program bill, without any consideration of its effect upon the commerce and trade of the Nation, if we should pursue this piecemeal, illogical method of dealing with the vital question of the commerce of the Nation without regard to the hardships put upon half of the country, necessarily it would, of course, increase the price of this character of oil, because, if we are now producing only one-half of the crude oil which will make the high-grade asphalt demanded and necessary for use in this country, it stands to reason, in an industry which is already overproducing and which has been here time after time asking for higher tariffs and restrictions on production, that we would again overstimulate the production of crude oil.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. McADOO. I should like to correct the Senator's impression that California is at present overproducing oil. California has been on a quota for some time under regulations which have heretofore been prescribed and which have been observed voluntarily. I repeat that if California had the opportunity of supplying the demands of this country undoubtedly they could be supplied, and at prices which would be less for the American people to pay, and Georgia in particular, than to continue to import a large part of this necessary product and keep men on the relief roll of the Federal Government.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am surprised at my distinguished friend. There is no possible argument on its merits for this proposal. In the first place, the adoption of such an amendment would throw out of employment more men and more families by closing up the refineries on the eastern seaboard. In the second place, the present supply will not meet more than one-half the demand. Everybody knows the producers are on a quota and are repeatedly coming here for tariffs. We have given them tariffs and higher tariffs until now all along the seaboard we are paying a great tribute to the oil-producing States.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad to listen to my friend from California.

Mr. McADOO. We are paying tribute to the cotton States, too. The Senator was good enough to say I was born in Georgia. Naturally, I am in sympathy with cotton planters in that section of the country. But why should not that principle apply just as well to oil in California as to cotton in the cotton-producing States? The same principle should work both ways. We have to pay more in California for the cotton goods we consume because we want to help Georgia. I think Georgia ought to help California by giving us an opportunity to produce a sufficient amount of oil, as we have the capacity to do, to take care of their needs along the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am not aware of any special favors being shown cotton, and I am not asking for any, so far as that is concerned. I am only asking that special favors be not shown to a material which is needed to make our improvements, which would be greatly advanced in cost if this provision should be included in the bill, where it has no possible proper place, as it seems to me, because, if it is inserted at all, it is without consideration of those very much broader questions which affect so vitally so many people of the country, and without any regard as to how it affects them.

I am not unwilling to help California or any other American community, but the facts are that California has no difficulty in selling her crude oil from which is produced the high-quality asphalt used in this country. In fact, she supplies approximately one half of the demand. The other half comes from Mexico or some of the nearby South American countries. We have found from actual experience that we must have this crude oil either from South America or from California, which can only meet one-half of the present demand. It seems to me there should be no just complaint when we consider the size of the tariff we have permitted to be imposed or helped to impose on the oil imports from other competing countries. I very well remember when the last tariff bill was under consideration it was made to appear here that the average competitive advantage of imported crude oil was about 19 cents, and we put on a tariff of 21 cents, as I recollect, which certainly ought to have wiped out that competitive advantage to the foreign producer.

The situation is simply that we do not produce in this country sufficient crude oil from which can be made the high-quality asphalt to meet more than one-half of our consumptive demands. It so happens that production is on the west coast. It so happens that even if California produced enough, the cost of freight to the eastern seaports would, of course, be disastrously high.

While the water transportation would be somewhat cheaper, yet, considering the total transportation costs, from the field to the ports and from the ports on the eastern seaboard to the inland places, towns and cities and country roads where the asphalt must be used, we would still be at a very great disadvantage on the eastern seaboard, and we would suffer actual displacement of American labor if this amendment were incorporated in the bill.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope the amendment will not be adopted. If there is not an adequate tariff on foreign oil, let us consider that subject in some measure having to do with our trade and commerce, and the proper protection of American commerce. Let us not vastly increase the cost all along the eastern seaboard of the necessary work of paving our streets and highways, at the same time displacing and throwing into idleness quite a large number of laborers, and jeopardizing quite a large investment in refineries along the seaboard.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, for the RECORD I think I should read a letter written by the Acting Secretary of Agriculture to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, with respect to this amendment. It is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., May 6, 1936.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Chairman, Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of May 1 to which was attached a copy of an amendment intended to be proposed by Senator CAPPER to H. R. 11687.

This proposed amendment would add a new section to H. R. 11687 as it passed the House on April 16, 1936, to be designated section 8, and would require every contract for the construction or repair of any highway growing out of an appropriation of Federal funds to contain a provision which would practically exclude the use of any other than domestic materials in the performance of such contract.

The provision which the amendment proposes would be much more stringent than the so-called buy-American provisions contained in title III of the Treasury-Post Office Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1934, approved March 3, 1933 (47 Stat. 1520).

It is the Department's view that the existing law on this subject affords adequate protection to the domestic producers of materials for use in the highway-construction field, and that the enactment of the amendment is not only unnecessary but would constitute an unwarranted discrimination against the manufacture and use of road materials. The Department therefore recommends against favorable action on the proposed amendment.

Sincerely,

W. B. GREGG, Acting Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, if there are no further amendments to be offered, I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate a resolution adopted on April 30 at a meeting held in Phoenix, Ariz., of the Western Association of State Highway Officials, representing the 11 Western States. The resolution is as follows:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE WESTERN ASSOCIATION OF STATE HIGHWAY OFFICIALS AT THE ANNUAL MEETING IN PHOENIX, ARIZ., APRIL 30, 1936

Whereas this conference views with alarm the continued sale of motor vehicle fuels on Government military and other reservations, upon which no State tax has been collected, such tax-free fuel being used on the public highways; and

Whereas the various States have no remedy under existing laws: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this conference pledge its support to a bill now before Congress (H. R. 3660) sponsored by the North American Gasoline Tax Conference, which, if enacted, will confer upon the several States authority to collect motor vehicle fuel taxes on all sales made on such reservations other than to the United States Government or its agencies.

The bill, House bill 3660, to which the resolution makes reference was introduced by Mr. WOODRUM, of Virginia. I obtained a copy of it, and submitted it yesterday to the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads. He tells me that there is complaint in many parts of the country about the inability of the States to collect revenue on gasoline sold on Government reservations not for governmental use. I desire to submit the matter to the Senate by offering an amendment which is the exact text of the House bill.

I send the amendment to the desk and ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 8, after line 22, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 10. (a) That all taxes levied by any State upon sales of gasoline and other motor-vehicle fuels may be levied, in the same manner and to the same extent, upon such fuels when sold by or through post exchanges, ship stores, ship-service stores, commissaries, or other similar agencies, located on United States military or other reservations, when such fuels are used for other than governmental purposes. Such taxes, so levied, shall be paid to the proper taxing authorities of the State within whose borders the reservation affected may be located.

(b) The officer in charge of such reservation shall, on the first day of each month, submit a written statement to the proper taxing authorities of the State within whose borders the reservation is located showing the exact amount of such motor fuels sold for other than governmental purposes during the preceding month.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. GEORGE] and myself, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 7, line 3, before the period, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided further, That in carrying out the provisions of this section the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, during the fiscal years 1936 and 1937, deal directly with the authorities in the counties or other subdivisions of the several States having supervision of the construction of roads of the classes specified in this section, and for such purpose to approve projects, make contracts, and exercise any other functions performed through the Bureau of Public Roads under the Federal Highway Act of 1921, as amended and supplemented.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, as appears from the reading of this amendment, it is purely permissive, and leaves in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture the matter of dealing with any agency of the State government other than the highway departments of the several States. The amendment relates only to the section of the bill which appropriates funds for the construction of secondary or feeder roads.

Unless this amendment be adopted, there is likely to be considerable confusion in the administration of the fund provided for improvement of secondary or feeder roads. In a great many of the States it would require action by the legislatures of the several States to confer on the State highway departments any jurisdiction or power over any roads other than those already embraced in the State highway systems. A great many legislatures do not meet until next year or the year following. The title to all these local secondary and feeder roads in most of the States is at present in the local administrative bodies.

Occasions might arise where some States would be delayed for a year or more in the expenditure of their portion of this secondary road fund unless this amendment should be adopted, and the Secretary of Agriculture should be permitted to deal with the local bodies. As I said, the State highway departments in several States, including my own State, have no jurisdiction whatever save over roads that have already been taken into the State highway system by act of the general assembly; and that condition would at least delay the application of this bill for paving and improving these secondary or feeder roads.

I feel quite sure that we are all concerned to see this movement succeed. I think this is the first time the proposal has appeared in a measure of this kind for secondary or feeder roads. We have expended huge sums of money on various State highway systems, and as a matter of fact the Federal Government is paying for the greater part of that construction today. This is an effort to reach out on the farm-to-market roads and benefit not only those who are tourists, and who move from State to State over our highways but to give passable roads, all-weather roads, to the farmers and others who live in the rural sections.

I hope this amendment will be adopted in order that there may be no delay in carrying out the purpose of section 7 of the bill. The title to the roads is in the county authorities. If the Secretary of Agriculture should see fit in any case under the provisions of this amendment, he could deal with and through the county authorities rather than through the State highway departments. That is all the amendment provides.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do.

Mr. AUSTIN. I observe that the amendment, as printed, refers to page 6, line 3. Is not that a mistake?

Mr. RUSSELL. The amendment was changed with pencil in the copy I sent to the desk. I intended to propose its insertion on page 7, line 3.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the Senator intend to have it follow the words "public-school bus routes"?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is the proper place for the amendment, to follow the words "public-school bus routes."

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I merely wish to emphasize what my colleague [Mr. RUSSELL] has said, that this amendment is merely permissive. It gives the Bureau of Public Roads the permissive power, wholly within its jurisdiction as to the particular $25,000,000 appropriated by the bill, to deal with the county authorities rather than with the State highway boards.

My colleague has called attention to the fact that in Georgia, and, I have no doubt, in many other States, the State highway board has no jurisdiction whatever over the farm-to-market or feeder roads unless they happen to constitute a part of the State highway system or the Federal-aid system. The State highway boards have jurisdiction, of course, over both the State highway and the Federal-aid systems.

There is another matter which it seems to me might be taken into consideration. This amendment might well go to conference, and the matter be there considered; and I think it would be quite proper to limit it, perhaps, to the 2 years covered by the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that so far as I am concerned, I see no reason why the amendment cannot be taken to conference and worked out there if there is any trouble about it.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I suggest to the junior Senator from Georgia that if the amendment were limited to the fiscal years 1936 and 1937 it would not be permanent legislation.

The section which the Senators from Georgia are seeking to amend applies to the fiscal years 1938 and 1939, and is merely an authorization for future appropriations. The situation the Senators are seeking to improve is one that exists during the present fiscal year and will probably exist during the fiscal year beginning July 1 next. Can the Senator suggest how to change the amendment so as to provide, as is the case of paragraph (d) of section 1 of the bill, that the exception to the regular procedure shall be applicable only within the fiscal years 1936 and 1937?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I think my colleague and I would have no objection at all to making the amendment applicable to those years, because if in the meantime it seemed desirable to continue it, of course, it could be continued.

Mr. HAYDEN. Let me suggest that the amendment be modified, in line 4, so as to read:

That in carrying out the provisions of this section the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, during the fiscal years 1936 or 1937—

And so forth.

Mr. GEORGE. That would be quite agreeable to me, if it is to my colleague—we offered the amendment jointly—because it will all be in conference anyway.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I know of no reason why the change suggested by the Senator from Arizona should not be made, but I am of the opinion it could be done as well in conference as on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HAYDEN. It would be preferable to be able to say that what we are trying to do is to meet an existing emergency, rather than to anticipate future difficulties.

Mr. RUSSELL. I shall be glad to modify the amendment as suggested by the Senator from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the junior Senator from Georgia, as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

LUCILLE M'CLURE

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1827) for the relief of Lucille McClure.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. LOGAN, Mr. SCHWELLENBACH, and Mr. CAPPER conferees on the part of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF CANAL ZONE CODES OF CRIMINAL AND CIVIL PROCEDURE

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1379) to amend section 103 of the Code of Criminal Procedure for the Canal Zone and section 542 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the Canal Zone.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senate passed a bill relating to the disposition of fees received by marshals, clerks, and other officers in the Panama Canal Zone. The House struck out all after the enacting clause and inserted a provision a little different from that adopted by the Senate. I suggest that the amendments of the House be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That section 981 of title 4, Canal Zone Code, approved June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1122), is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 981. It shall be lawful for the clerk of the district court, referees, and commissioners appointed by the district court, the marshal, magistrates, constables, and other officers and persons hereinafter mentioned, together with their assistants and deputies, to demand and receive the hereinafter-mentioned fees and no more. All fees collected by officers drawing a salary or compensation from the Government, other than those collected by the clerk of the district court and the marshal, shall be paid over to the collector of the Panama Canal. The clerk of the district court and the marshal shall receive, deposit, and account for all public moneys collected by them in accordance with the laws, rules, and regulations governing the receipt and disposition of moneys by clerks of United States district courts and United States marshals, respectively, in the continental United States, exclusive of Alaska.'

"SEC. 2. That section 843 of title 6, Canal Zone Code, is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 843. The clerk shall receive, deposit, and account for all public moneys collected by him in accordance with the laws, rules, and regulations governing the receipt and disposition of moneys by clerks of the United States district courts in the continental United States, exclusive of Alaska.'"

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to amend section 981 of title 4, and section 843 of title 6 of the Canal Zone Code."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

DIRIGIBLE "SHENANDOAH" MEMORIAL

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10544, authorizing the erection of a memorial to those who met their death in the wreck of the dirigible Shenandoah.

Mr. McNARY. What is the amount involved?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, this is a bill authorizing the erection of a tablet at the spot where the heroes of the Shenandoah lost their lives some years ago.

Mr. McNARY. I recall the tragic occurrence. What amount of money is involved?

Mr. BARKLEY. Two thousand five hundred dollars. It is a House bill, and it is desired that action be taken on it at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations (and withdrawing a nomination), which were referred to the appropriate committee.

(For nominations this day received and nomination withdrawn, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination on the calendar.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Public Works Administration.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations in the Public Works Administration be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

COAST GUARD

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Coast Guard.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations in the Coast Guard be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Coast Guard are confirmed en bloc.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE ARMY

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have about 500 routine nominations in the Army to report. It would be quite an expense to print the names, and I ask that I may report the nominations without having them printed, and I ask that they be confirmed at this time. As I have said, they are routine nominations.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this is rather a unique request.

Mr. SHEPPARD. We took this action with about 4,000 nominations soon after the promotion bill was enacted. This is another batch of promotions under that act, principally of first lieutenants and second lieutenants, and one or two higher officers, and a few transfers.

Mr. McNARY. These are nominations of officers who automatically reach the respective grades?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is correct.

Mr. McNARY. Has the committee passed on all of them?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It has.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and the reports are received, and the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

RECESS TO MONDAY

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, May 11, 1936, at 12 o'clock meridian.

POSTMASTER

ARKANSAS

Edgar L. Adams to be postmaster at Stephens, in the State of Arkansas.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MAY 8, 1936

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Lord and our Father, O satisfy us with Thy mercy, that we may rejoice and be glad all our days. Let Thy work appear unto Thy servants and Thy glory unto their children. We unite in a national tribute to mother. Hear us in these moments of praise and grateful retrospection. We rejoice that hers was the first face that brightened at our joys and wept at our tears. It was the first face on which divine love wrote its immortal message; it gave all and asked nothing. We thank Thee for the paths of childhood, where she first placed our wandering feet. We pray that her heavenly, sacrificial spirit may hover over our land. Then strife will cease, brotherly love will take the place of hatred, and men will follow the Golden Rule. We bless Thee, Almighty God, for her wonderful memory. May it abide with us as the inspiration of virtue, sacrifice, and religion, and unto Thee be praises forever. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE FRAZIER-LEMKE BILL

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, on Monday next, May 11, 1936, the so-called Frazier-Lemke bill comes before the House.

The parliamentary procedure is as follows:

Under clause 4 of rule XXVII, the so-called "discharge rule", immediately after the approval of the Journal, and before any other business can be transacted, the Speaker must recognize any Member who signed the petition to discharge to call up the motion to discharge.

The resolution, H. Res. 123, is then read by title only. The title is, "To make H. R. 2066, a bill to liquidate and refinance agricultural indebtedness at a reduced rate of interest by establishing an efficient credit system through the use of the Farm Credit Administration, the Federal Reserve banking system, and creating a Board of Agriculture to supervise the same, a special order of business."

After 20 minutes' debate, one-half in favor of the motion to discharge and one-half in opposition thereto, the House proceeds to vote on the motion to discharge the Rules Committee.

If the motion prevails, the House immediately votes on the adoption of the resolution, H. Res. 123.

If the resolution or "rule" is adopted, the bill H. R. 2066, under the provisions of the rule is taken up on the next day, Tuesday, May 12, 1936, for consideration under the general rules of the House, except that general debate, confined to the bill, is limited to 6 hours, and except that the time is controlled, one-half by the Member requesting the rule for the consideration of said H. R. 2066, which probably means the introducer of H. Res. 123, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE], and the 3 hours in opposition is controlled by some Member of the House opposed to the bill, to be designated by the Speaker. If the first two votes, to discharge the Rules Committee and the adoption of the rule prevail, the consideration of the bill under general debate and the amendments will undoubtedly consume 2 or 3 days. Final vote on the bill, in all likelihood would come late Wednesday or on Thursday.

The Frazier-Lemke bill, H. R. 2066, was introduced in the House by the Republican Member from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE] on January 3, 1935, and about the same time introduced in the Senate by the Republican Senator from that State [Mr. FRAZIER].

The rule, H. Res. 123, was introduced in the House by Mr. LEMKE on February 21, 1935, before the Agriculture Committee of the House had acted on the bill, and the rule is extraordinary in that it was not directed toward the Agriculture Committee, but provided for the consideration of the bill notwithstanding any further action on the said bill by the Committee on Agriculture, "or any rule of the House."

The rule is further most extraordinary in that it directs whom the Speaker shall recognize to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, namely, Mr. LEMKE, the introducer, a minority Member, who is not a member of the Agriculture Committee, nor the Member who filed the motion to discharge at the Speaker's desk. Mr. LEMKE was the fortieth signer on the said petition.

Furthermore, the rule is most extraordinary in that time under general debate is directed to be controlled in support of the bill by Mr. LEMKE, a Member of the minority, contrary to the standing practice in the House, for many years, that time in general debate is controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the reporting committee. In this novel practice the control of the proceedings of the House during the consideration of this bill is in the hands of a minority Member and the majority of the House, of about 3 to 1 to the minority, is out of control.

The bill, H. R. 2066, was reported out of the Agriculture Committee of the House on May 3, 1935. Nothing whatsoever has been done in reference to calling up the companion bill in the Senate and there is no indication that any effort has been made or will be made in that direction.

The bill could have been called up in the House in the regular course of its proceedings on Calendar Wednesday, May 15, 1935, 12 days after it was reported out of the Committee on Agriculture. That committee had the call on that day and had all of the day, if it had desired to use it. The Committee on Agriculture, however, waived its right to the day and no proponents of the Frazier-Lemke bill, including Mr. LEMKE, objected to that waiver.

It has always been impossible to find out how many, or what particular members, of the Committee of Agriculture voted to report the bill. No record vote was taken. Sometime thereafter the committee did vote, without any record vote, to request the Rules Committee to grant a rule for the consideration of the bill and thereupon appointed a subcommittee of two members to wait upon the Rules Committee to request a hearing on the application for a rule. It is most extraordinary that this subcommittee consisted of two Republicans, and to date no Democratic member of that committee has ever requested a hearing before the Rules Committee.

The invariable practice has been that the chairman of a standing committee or some majority member designated by him, makes the request to Rules Committee for a hearing.

When the request was made to the chairman of the Rules Committee by the two minority members, they were informed that in view of the peculiar circumstances and the reputed rumors that the Agriculture Committee had passed the "buck" to the Rules Committee, as was stated in the meeting when the bill was reported out, the chairman of the Rules Committee, after consultation with the leaders of the House, took the position that the request for a hearing should be made by a majority of the members of the Committee on Agriculture, and that if such majority joined in such a request, a hearing would be granted. That normal situation has been a standing offer to the Agriculture Committee as is known by the proponents of the bill but has never yet been complied with.

On March 5, 1935, within 12 days after the introduction of the rule, H. Res. 123, a petition was filed at the Speaker's desk to discharge the Rules Committee from further consideration of the rule. This was 2 months before the Agriculture Committee acted on the bill. Rules Committee has never considered a rule for the consideration of any bill which has not been reported out of a committee.

On April 30, 1936, the petition was completed with 218 signatures, including three Members now dead, and one Member who has never voted during this session of Congress. Under a decision by former Speaker Rainey, the signatures of deceased Members are permitted to remain on the petition.

The Frazier-Lemke bill is a proposal that the Government take over the mortgages on the farms of the country. It is estimated that they amount to about eight and one-half billion dollars. The bill provides that these mortgages be taken over at their face value, and at an interest rate of 1½ percent. Furthermore, the bill applies to any farmer who may have lost his property through foreclosure in the last 14 years. These mortgages are principally held by the insurance companies of the country. The effect of the bill would be that the Government would bail out the insurance companies of the country of billions of dollars of their loans.

The bill is strictly a "farm" bill with no provision to take care of urban or city mortgages, which amount to $21,000,000,000, as compared to the farm mortgages of eight and one-half billion dollars. It is true that through the Home Owners' Loan Corporation about two and one-half billion dollars has been loaned to city dwellers, but on a valuation not to exceed 80 percent and practically does not exceed 60 percent, and further at an interest rate of 5 percent.

There is absolutely no possibility of providing in this bill for any relief for the city mortgagors. It is beyond question that any amendment attempted to take care of city mortgages would be held not germane and ruled out on a point of order, because the Frazier-Lemke bill pertains solely to farm mortgages.

The chief objection to the Frazier-Lemke bill is, however, that it is an inflationary measure rather than a "farm relief" bill. The inflation feature, of providing for the printing of $3,000,000,000 of currency, just as a start, to finance the taking over of the farm mortgages, is the chief feature of the bill and because such an inflationary measure is the prime purpose of the bill, it should have been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency rather than the Committee on Agriculture.

The Members of the House from the metropolitan areas have always supported every genuine farm-relief measure, and if this inflationary feature was not in the bill, in spite of the discrimination against the cities, many of the Members from the cities, including myself, would feel inclined to support the bill.

Organized labor is definitely opposed to the bill as publicly stated by Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, because of its inflationary provisions, which would inevitably increase the cost of living and consequently decrease the purchasing power of the wage earner.

The farmers of this country, who with all their dependents number less than 25 percent of the population, have received especial and preferential treatment at the hands of the Government. Only on last Monday, May 4, 1936, there was passed in the House, on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 10101, introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILLETT] and reported by the Committee on Agriculture, "A bill to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act and the Farm Credit Act of 1935", extending for 2 years the interest on loans on farm mortgages at a rate of 3½ percent. Again this relief can be contrasted with the Government rate on city mortgages of 5 percent. This bill, H. R. 10101, in itself should be sufficient to take care of the situation as to farm mortgages.

Furthermore, there is pending on the Union Calendar, No. 223, H. R. 7593, introduced by Mr. JONES of Texas, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, a well-considered bill which should accomplish anything further needed to be done for the farmer beyond the Gillette bill.

H. R. 7593 is "a bill to facilitate the extension of agricultural credit at lower interest rates by providing for the issue of certain bank notes, and for other purposes." Again, unfortunately, however, this bill cannot be offered as an amendment to the Frazier-Lemke bill, because it is not germane and would be ruled out on a point of order, and it is well known that the proponents of the Frazier-Lemke bill will oppose any amendment offered to their measure.

The Frazier-Lemke bill is the first definite step in inflation yet taken by this Government, and is supported by a number of Members solely because it is an inflationary measure and not because it is a "farm bill." Its accomplishment would be ruinous to over 75 percent of the population of this country and especially to the wage earners in the cities.

It is for the above reason that the consideration of the bill has been opposed, and the sane, conservative, patriotic way to oppose it is to vote against it from the very start, by opposing the first vote taken on Monday, May 11, 1936, to discharge the Rules Committee.

INTERNATIONAL PETROLEUM EXPOSITION, TULSA, OKLA.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 497, to permit articles imported from foreign countries for the purpose of exhibition at the International Petroleum Exposition, Tulsa, Okla., to be admitted without payment of tariff, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 497, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read the title.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, I suppose this is the usual resolution that we have been passing when a certain part of the country desired an exposition.

Mr. DISNEY. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Joint Resolution 497

Resolved, etc., That all articles which shall be imported from foreign countries for exhibition at the International Petroleum Exposition to be held at Tulsa, Okla., from May 16 to May 23, 1936, or for use in constructing, installing, or maintaining foreign buildings or exhibits at the said exposition upon which articles there shall be a tariff or customs duty shall be admitted without payment of such tariff, customs duty, fees, or charges under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during or within 3 months after the close of the said exposition to sell within the area of the exposition any articles provided for herein, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, That all such articles, when withdrawn for consumption or use in the United States, shall be subject to the duties, if any, imposed upon such articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of their withdrawal; and on such articles, which shall have suffered diminution or deterioration from incidental handling or exposure, the duties, if payable, shall be assessed according to the appraised value at the time of withdrawal from entry hereunder for consumption or entry under the general tariff law: Provided further, That imported articles provided for herein shall not be subject to any marking requirements of the general tariff laws, except when such articles are withdrawn for consumption or use in the United States, in which case they shall not be released from customs custody until properly marked, but no additional duty shall be assessed because such articles were not sufficiently marked when imported into the United States: Provided further, That at any time during or within 3 months after the close of the exposition any article entered hereunder may be abandoned to the Government or destroyed under customs supervision, whereupon any duties on such article shall be remitted: Provided further, That articles, which have been admitted without payment of duty for exhibition under any tariff law and which have remained in continuous customs custody or under a customs exhibition bond, and imported articles in bonded warehouses under the general tariff law may be accorded the privilege of transfer to and entry for exhibition at the said exposition under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: And provided further, That the International Petroleum Exposition shall be deemed, for customs purposes only, to be the sole consignee of all merchandise imported under the provisions of this act, and that the actual and necessary customs charges for labor, services, and other expenses in connection with the entry, examination, appraisement, release, or custody, together with the necessary charges for salaries of customs officers and employees in connection with the supervision, custody of, and accounting for, articles imported under the provisions of this act, shall be reimbursed by the International Petroleum Exposition to the Government of the United States under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that receipts from such reimbursements shall be deposited as refunds to the appropriation from which paid, in the manner provided for in section 524, Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. TREADWAY. This is simply to permit the importation of certain articles without the payment of duty provided they come in bond.

Mr. DISNEY. Yes; and if they are sold they pay the regular duty.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL OF 1936

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12624) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1936, and June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MCCORMACK in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY].

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose this morning to enter into any special discussion of the particular provisions of the pending bill. What I want to do if I can is to make a few remarks in the nature of suggestions for my colleagues to think about in the future conduct of the business of this country and for their use in the future action of the Congress.

I have always believed that the Government, like an individual, should live within its income. I think that is as fundamental and sound a principle of economics as any that we may discuss. I think also that the simple things I am going to say are as fundamental as simple, and that, as I understand it, the deficiency appropriation bill is a bill to provide for the payment of indebtedness incurred by Government bureaus in excess of what Congress has heretofore authorized.

It is my information from the membership of the Appropriations Committee that this bill carries a rather small amount of what is, in fact, a deficiency obligation. Stated in another way it is this: We, the Congress, say you can spend so much, and the various departments go ahead without regard to what we have said and spend several millions more, and then come back and say to us we have spent more than you directed and have a deficiency in our departments and you must allow us that, and that continues from year to year, and that is how we get deficiencies. That is what causes deficits. The Government spends more than the taxes that are collected. It is true in this bill, however, that the major portion of more than $2,000,000,000 is for relief. I am convinced—and I think the membership of this House is convinced—that there ought to be a stopping place somewhere in the matter of appropriations and expenditures. There are just two ends, you might say, to the business of the Federal Government—one is the intake end and the other is the discharge end. One is the end that represents receipts and the other is the end that represents disbursements; and when the time comes that receipts are far less than disbursements, we have what we call an unbalanced Budget, or a deficit. The same thing can happen to my bank account and to your bank account, provided the bankers are liberal enough to allow us to overdraw; and just as sure as we overdraw our bank accounts, we impair our credit; and when the Federal Government continuously follows a system of overdrafts or deficits or unbalanced budgets, whatever you choose to call them, it continues to that extent to impair its credit.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. COLDEN. The gentleman is emphasizing the necessity of keeping within the revenues of the Government and mentions the individual. When an individual has sickness in his family, or an emergency, he is compelled by the circumstances to go out and borrow money, regardless of his income. Is not that the situation of the United States Government? We have been sick economically and it has been necessary for us to make these expenditures.

Mr. MAY. The Government or the country has been, indeed, very sick, but the Government has practically recovered from its sickness and is now out on the high plane of good health, in the sunshine, and able to walk, and the time has come when the medical bills must cease, and the time has come when the Government ought to begin to provide against such contingencies as getting sick as it has in the past. One of the best ways in the world to do that is to practice economy when we ought to practice it, so that when the sick spell does come we will have a balance sufficient in the Treasury to take care of the sickness. In other words, practice economy and lay up something for a rainy day. The prudent man will not wait till he is sick but will commence to save while he is able to work.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE. I agree with that 100 percent. Is not the question of the unemployed, which is making this bill necessary in all its largeness, the real cause, and is not that a permanent feature in this country?

Mr. MAY. Unemployment is a problem, but I am not willing to believe the statements of one of the chief witnesses as a proponent of this bill on two propositions; I think he is simply uninformed and I do not ascribe to him any ulterior motive. I do not believe unemployment in this country is as bad as we are told it is, and I do not believe there are 20,000,000 American people who ought to have relief, because there are not that many that have to have relief, and I think relief ought to be restricted to those who meritoriously need relief, and everybody knows there are thousands on relief rolls that are not entitled to be on them.

Mr. PIERCE. Should we not cut our cloth to suit our needs? And I agree with the gentleman fully that we should pay as we go, and if I return here in the next Congress I shall vote on that line, regardless of party lines. Nevertheless, should not we at once prepare to take care of the unemployed who cannot get work?

Mr. MAY. I agree with the gentleman that we must make it possible for the unemployed to get work, and I shall vote accordingly; but there is only one way to stop Government expenditures that are neither wise nor necessary, and that is to stop making unnecessary appropriations for unnecessary activities of the Government. The Government of the United States is engaged in things today that the Members of this Congress do not know it is engaged in. Frequently we hear criticism of some of our Members on the floor of this House who talk a great deal—and I am not one of them, I thank the Lord. They are charged with putting the Government to the expense of $50 a page in printing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Yet in 1935, by an act of July 26, Public, 220—and I am using this as an illustration of what we are doing unconsciously—we created a Federal Register, providing for the publication daily of the proclamations and executive orders of all the executive departments and the rules and regulations of the various bureaus of the Government. The purpose of that was to let the people of the country know what kind of laws they had to obey; in other words, not the acts of Congress but the downtown laws of the city of Washington. That is what it is, and here we have a Register published up to date, beginning on March 14 of this year, 6 days less than 2 months old, which is costing the taxpayers of the country $30 a page to print, and I have in my hand volume 1, no. 40. The page has reached 406 up to date, which, at $30 a page, amounts to $12,360 in 2 months.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in one breath he complains about the fact that the Government is doing things that the people do not know anything about and in the next breath he complains about the only official organ that does tell the Congress and the country what the rules and the regulations and edicts of the Government are.

Mr. MAY. The point I make is that we ought not to have as many bureaus as we have and we ought not to have as many rules and regulations as we have, and we will continue to have them just so long as we appropriate ten and a half billion dollars at each session of Congress. My good friend, Mr. WOODRUM, comes from the great State of Virginia. He is a Democrat and a real statesman, and I am proud of the honor of being his colleague in this great body. No doubt he is familiar with the teachings of the Father of Democracy, the immortal Jefferson, a citizen of his own State, author of the Declaration of Independence, Governor of Virginia, writer of the Virginia Statutes of Religious Liberty, Ambassador to France, twice President of the United States, founder of the University of Virginia, statesman, and philosopher; and may I remind my colleague that it was he that said, "The least governed was the best governed", and he also said, "If the day ever comes that we must look to Washington for direction as to when to sow and when to reap, we shall surely want for bread." That is the doctrine I am contending for.

Mr. WOODRUM. I agree with that; but my friend is a good lawyer and an able and helpful Member of this House. I want to ask him this question——

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Kentucky 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MAY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman will remember the occasion for the establishment of the Federal Register, which was the decision of the Supreme Court in the "hot oil" case, where it developed that people had been brought into court and tried for offenses which were not in violation of the law because some department had changed its rules and regulations and nobody knew anything about it until after the conviction. The Supreme Court criticized this system. Does not the gentleman think that where there are departments like the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the tax department, and other departments of the Government that do have authority under the law to promulgate important rules and regulations, there ought to be some way that those rules and regulations could be collected, annotated, and disseminated? Perhaps this is too elaborate. Perhaps this should be cut down to a weekly publication or some other system, but should there not be some method of giving to the Congress and to the people and to the citizens definite and authentic information as to the activities of departments in that respect?

Mr. MAY. I am in favor of giving the people all the information they desire, and if we follow the teachings of Jefferson, the people will not need all this instruction, neither will we have to go to jail. Congress ought to make the laws and not the bureaus, and the courts, and not the bureaus, ought to enforce them. I called the Bureau of Archives this morning and talked to the director of this publication. He told me that although the subscription is $10 a year, the subscription list to date has not reached 500, and that the only people who received it free were heads of bureaus and Members of the Congress of the United States.

The point I am trying to make is this, that just as surely as you give men money to spend, they will spend it, and until we reach a point where we can begin to cut out some of these agencies—and I think Congress is in humor to cut them out—and I think they should be cut out, I think every emergency organization that has been set up should be abolished just as soon as it can be done. I find authority for that in the last Democratic platform. I believe in being a Democrat. I am in thorough sympathy with the President of the United States in his determined effort to rescue this country from the terrible depression, and everybody here knows that under his wise and patriotic leadership we have emerged from the depths of depression and are back again to sound and lasting prosperity; but I say when the war is over and peace has been declared, we ought to stop mobilizing armies and undertake true economy. [Applause.] There must be a stopping place. There will be a stopping place, and unless Congress again assumes its legitimate functions under the Constitution that stopping place will be either bankruptcy or inflation in an uncontrollable form, and one is the equivalent of the other. The mere fact that we have during the Seventy-fourth Congress appropriated and authorized the expenditure of more than $20,000,000,000 is a general invitation to the bureaucrats to expect and demand more. There is only one place to stop it, and that is right here on the floor of this House. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THURSTON].

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee in charge of this bill held hearings covering a period of about 6 weeks, during which time approximately 2,000 pages of hearings were accumulated. So it is obvious that one Member could not discuss the many phases of this measure in detail.

At the outset, I desire to comment just briefly on the composition of the bill. As you know, there are two main sections, one which deals with the deficiencies of the regular departments of the Government. The items carried in this section total approximately $938,000,000.

Then, the more important and controversial division in regard to relief, which carriers $1,425,000,000, making an aggregate sum of $2,364,000,000. It seems to me it would have been much better if two separate bills could have been brought in so that relief could have been discussed separately and free from departmental askings of the other portions of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer in this connection a table on page 6 of the hearings of the Deficiency Subcommittee on Appropriations which shows the type of project included in the $1,425,000,000 portion of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The table referred to is as follows:

Type of project	Amount	Percent
Highways, roads, and streets	$413,250,000	29
Public buildings	156,750,000	11
Parks and other recreational facilities	156,750,000	11
Public utilities, including sewer systems, water supply and purification, airports, and other transportation facilities	171,000,000	12
Flood control and other conservation	128,250,000	9
White-collar projects	85,500,000	6
Women's projects	85,500,000	6
Miscellaneous work projects	71,250,000	5
National Youth Administration	71,250,000	5
Rural rehabilitation and relief to farmers	85,500,000	6
Total	1,425,000,000	100

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, there are just two general phases that I desire to touch upon. One is the question as to whether or not there is political interference in the distribution of relief and a proposal to correct this evil, and the other is the contribution that has been made, or should be made, by respective States.

In regard to the contribution that has been made by the Federal Government, supplemented by either State or subdivisions of State governments, I desire to offer in this connection table no. 4 of the hearings, which gives in detail the amount of funds granted by the Federal Government and each State, plus the amount contributed by each State government; also table no. 8, "Allocation relief funds by States", and table no. 23, "Relief grants."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, briefly I want to direct the attention of the membership to these figures. There is a very wide discrepancy in the amount that has been contributed, from the different States, in order to meet this great emergency. My own State of Iowa the first year practically matched the Federal funds by contributing 50 percent of the amount used for general relief purposes. Last year probably 41 percent, but this table shows that there are a number of States which have only contributed 2, 3, 4, or 5 percent, and possibly there are one or two States that did not contribute 1 percent. So the Federal Government was either required or obliged to make up the deficit. I contend that this was not a fair allocation. Surely, there is no State in this Union that was not in a financial position to have contributed some substantial portion of the relief needed for the support of its citizens requiring relief or assistance. It seems to me we should have a provision requiring each State to make some specific contribution to relief funds and if that amount should be fixed at 20, or possibly 25 percent, then the State would be more interested in the administration of relief funds.

We or the States or their subdivisions would have a personal interest in the allocation or the distribution of the funds and it would be more equitable to the entire country if such a rule were adopted. I interrogated Mr. Hopkins in regard to this subject when he was before our committee 2 years ago and he said he would insist that there should be a matching of funds, a 50–50 contribution. When he came in the next year, however, and the disparity in these figures was called to his attention, he said he was overruled—and he could only be overruled by the President—that he was unable to follow the rule or the agreement he had made. Being further interrogated he said it was largely a question of the ability of the governors of these different States to get all they could. So we here have concrete evidence of the bargaining power of some of the Governors in these States, and certain Governors did get very excellent bargains for their States as compared with amounts received by other States. If all States should be required to furnish, say one-fifth or one-quarter of the funds, and have direct immediate contact in the distribution of these funds with local persons in charge of the distribution who would be better acquainted with the needs of the community, doubtless, a more equitable and even a less expensive administration could be established. In the main, in my section of the country all of the administrators are imported from other sections of the country. I hear this complaint made generally. We are in favor of home rule, and it seems to me it would be preferable and, in fact, imperative, to require it in this respect.

As to whether political influences have had anything to do with the relief situation, I have before me a page from a local Washington newspaper under date of April 26, 1936, giving rather concise and interesting tables upon this subject. I take it is is wholly nonpartisan, unbiased, and was obtained through a broad Nation-wide contact or poll with different classes of people throughout the United States. These figures were collected by the American Institute of Public Opinion. Concisely, it says:

A fair majority of the Democrats believe there is political influence in relief administration and a huge majority of the Republicans are convinced of it.

The question asked was:

In your opinion, does politics play a part in the handling of relief in your community?

The poll disclosed that 65 percent of those interrogated say "yes", 18 percent replied "no", and 17 percent have no opinion upon the subject. So, of those voting, almost 4 to 1 say there has been and there is political interference in the administration of relief.

As divided according to the political affiliation on this page, the Democrats are listed next and 55 percent say "yes", 25 percent say "no", and 20 percent express no opinion. So, more than 2 to 1 of the Democratic faith say there is political interference. Of the Republicans, 80 percent say "yes", 8 percent say "no", 12 percent express no opinion. So 10 to 1 of the Republicans feel that this harmful influence is at play.

As to the Socialists, and they surely cannot be regarded as partisan in this sense, 77 percent say "yes", 9 percent say "no", or 8 to 1 say political influence has been used.

It is interesting to note the percentage in some of the great States. Sixty-seven percent of the people in the State of Pennsylvania believe there is political influence; in Illinois, 60 percent; in Massachusetts, 72 percent; and in the States where opposition is expressed, only one-quarter, one-fifth, or probably one-sixth express opinion in opposition.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THURSTON. I yield.

Mr. SHANNON. From what paper is the gentleman quoting?

Mr. THURSTON. This is from a table taken from the Washington Post, but the figures were compiled by the American Institute of Public Opinion, a nonpartisan organization.

This poll furnishes nonpartisan evidence that political influence is at play in all sections of the country. So if we could turn this relief from Federal administration of a highly political character to State agencies free from political control, undoubtedly we would meet the desire of a great majority of our people; we would have administration free from politics and under the control of those who are most capable of exercising this function. The decisive result of this poll should be carefully considered by the Congress.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman care to yield right there?

Mr. THURSTON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in the gentleman's very fair discussion of this interesting phase of relief, but I would like to suggest to the gentleman, and to know his reaction to the suggestion, as to why he thinks if relief were administered by State agencies there would not be the same so-called political influence? And may I draw his attention to this: I do not know what his experience has been, but my experience has been that there has been politics in this business. It has, however, usually been confined to localities and to local people in charge of relief. There have been localities, and there are localities today, where the influences are Republican, and the Republican influences are handling relief.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is, just a few.

Mr. WOODRUM. Oh, no; and they are handling it—I do not say with the approval of the leaders of the Republican Party, but this is just as natural as it is for people to be natural, human beings. Now, this is happening in my own district, I may say to the distinguished gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. THURSTON. Should we not relieve those gentlemen from the temptation?

Mr. WOODRUM. You cannot relieve them as long as they are human beings. They are gentlemen in strategic positions in this relief program in the State of Virginia—in Democratic counties, Republicans handling relief. Wherever they can they are doing it beneficially to their own party. The point is I want to suggest——

Mr. THURSTON. I hope the gentleman will be brief, for my time is being shortened.

Mr. WOODRUM. I will give the gentleman some of my time if he does not object to this interruption.

Mr. Chairman, the point I make is that, after all, is not our particular interest at this time in whether or not the Relief Administration in Washington or the national administration is making any effort at all to divert this relief proposition to its own political advantage? I venture the assertion that no party or power could administer relief such as this without politics creeping into it at certain points, very often against even its own wishes.

Mr. THURSTON. In reply to the gentleman, may I say that in the State of Iowa practically all of our boards having to do with charity and public assistance of every character are nonpartisan, and both the major political parties are represented in the constituency of the board or the commission. We therefore rarely have any complaint that partisan influence has in any degree affected the action of those bodies.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THURSTON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman read certain statistics from a survey which has been made. I would like to know if the State of Kentucky is reported in those statistics, and, if so, what is the percentage of approval or disapproval.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Chairman, to expedite this and other inquiries that may be made, I ask unanimous consent to include in my extension of remarks the complete table, which will show the percent in all the States.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. The table shows the entire country?

Mr. THURSTON. Yes; each of the 48 States.

Mr. Chairman, we must recognize that this relief problem is not a current one. It must be apparent to all Members that it will be a problem of long duration. If this premise is correct—and I believe it is—we must prepare to handle this matter not only in a logical and economical manner but in a humane manner as well. We are all equally interested in the welfare of women and children who are unfortunate and who do not have a sufficient income, as well as the men who may be aged or impaired; but it must be apparent to all of us that after 3 years of Federal relief administration and the expenditure of approximately $16,000,000,000, we still have practically as many people on relief and unemployed as we had 3 years ago. Under these circumstances we have not solved this problem, and if we have not obtained real, satisfactory results under the present procedure, surely we are broad enough and we should be tolerant enough to explore the field and ascertain if we cannot make some changes or agree to some amendments so that the future administration of this program may be sound and fair to all concerned.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THURSTON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. For the last year Members of Congress have criticized the way the relief proposition has been handled. This bill proposes to handle the relief matter exactly the same as it was handled last year. Why are the Members of Congress permitting this bill to go through in the same form as last year after all of this criticism?

Mr. THURSTON. The final vote, of course, will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. MAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THURSTON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAIN. Is it not significant and rather disheartening to have Mr. Hopkins, after these years of experience and the large amount of money at his disposal, admit that he has no answer or solution for the unemployment problem?

Mr. THURSTON. Yes. However, I think the problem and the solution of relief and unemployment is one for the Congress and not for an administrative or executive officer of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, to summarize my contention, the membership will have an opportunity to vote upon making these important changes, which would require a reasonable contribution upon the part of the States, and the power of directly supervising relief will be delegated to nonpartisan local officials. Not having made any appreciable gain, or having corrected to any great degree the relief or unemployment problems, surely we should be open-minded in our approach to any other proposed changes or suggestions that might assist in solving these problems. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK] such time as he may desire.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I realize that the most important matter contained in this bill is the question of the appropriations for relief, but there are other matters contained therein of great interest, and it is one of these to which I desire to call the attention of the Committee this morning.

Mr. Chairman, the first deficiency appropriation bill includes an item for the establishment of an Air Corps depot in the vicinity of Sacramento, Calif. This is a most vital air-defense appropriation, urged by the War Department as part of its general air-defense program and one immediately necessary. I am happy to have had a hand in the work which has led to the adoption of this program. Approval of this item will bring to a successful conclusion the campaign which I have waged since my first election to Congress in 1932 for the establishment of Sacramento as a major Army air base.

During 1918, the final year of the World War, the War Department established an aviation field about 14 miles west of the city of Sacramento, the site of which was donated by local citizens and which was christened Mather Field. This was used as a training school until 1919. Later it was used as a base for an aerial forest control. In 1922 it was placed on an inactive status, but in 1930 it was again opened as a training school and kept in service until November 1, 1932, when the units then stationed there were removed to permanent Air Corps fields. The close proximity of this station to Sacramento made its citizens air-minded long before the rest of the country awakened to its present state of air consciousness.

It has been the earnest desire of those of us who are fully informed of the facts, and who know the strategic advantages to the Nation and to the Army in the location of an air base somewhere near Sacramento, to see action taken to locate there permanently a major branch of the Army's air activities. This I have been urging continuously since the very first months of my first term in Congress. Facts, fortunately, have been with me. As General Embick said, in testifying before the Appropriations Committee in the hearings on the pending bill:

> From a strategic standpoint Sacramento is a good location. It is a central location, and we think it is withdrawn enough from the coast so it is reasonably secure. It is an economical location because it is at the main railway junction in that area.

The climate is mild; the average percentage of sunshine is high; the prevailing winds and average wind velocity are excellent, and even during the so-called rainy season there is a great preponderance of bright weather. These natural advantages I have presented from time to time to the War Department, to the Committee on Military Affairs, and to the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee handling the War Department bills, in efforts to secure their cooperation in providing funds such as are carried in this bill. As their investigation has proceeded, these gentlemen have come to the conclusion that Sacramento is the ideal location for an Army air repair depot that would serve all peacetime needs of the west coast. I am indeed happy to find that the Appropriations Committee, as a whole, has seen fit to include in this bill the recommendation of the War Department for an expenditure of $7,000,000 to establish this permanent air depot.

It will be established on land to be newly acquired, on which options have been secured through the cooperation of local authorities. The new site will comprise 1,117.21 acres of land lying to the northeast of Sacramento on the main line of the Central Pacific Railroad. On this will be built necessary barracks, noncommissioned officers' and officers' quarters, administration building, post exchange, hospital, gymnasium and auditorium, heating plant, as well as other necessary accessories. The depot supply building will provide a structure of approximately 961 feet in length by 430 feet in breadth, containing approximately 12,600,000 cubic feet of space, together with the necessary utilities and appurtenances, such as water and sewer mains, electricity and power, paving, and so forth. This one building will cost $1,167,086.

Other parts of the work proposed include engineering shops, to cost $1,406,198; a repair dock, consisting of a building 602 feet in length by 152 feet in breadth, containing approximately 6,000,000 cubic feet; operations building and hangar; paint, oil and dope storage buildings. Radio towers, night lighting system, runways, and necessary equipment are similarly provided. The entire break-down of the proposed Pacific air depot may be found on pages 621–623 of the hearings before the Appropriations Committee, where it was inserted by General Guiney, of the Quartermaster General's Office.

It is anticipated that it will take approximately a year and one-half to complete construction of the air depot. When completed, as General Westover said in his testimony, the Sacramento depot will serve all peacetime repair and overhaul purposes of the west coast, including the overseas units at Hawaii. It will also serve to meet an essential and initial wartime need.

By an Executive order on September 26, 1935, President Roosevelt approved the recommendation of the Secretaries of War and Navy that Rockwell Field, San Diego, should be evacuated by the Army, and Moffet Field by the Navy. Moffet Field is, however, entirely unsuitable, according to the Army officials, for an air depot, and subsequent developments have made it inadvisable to give further consideration of the utilization of Benton Field at Alameda for this purpose. This order and the subsequent developments have, of course, hastened the necessity of developing a new field for the protection of the west coast. Confidential investigations and surveys by the War Department have been in progress for the last 5 months and have resulted in definitely fixing on the Sacramento site which has been recommended unhesitatingly to the Appropriations Committee.

The question will now arise in the minds of many as to why Mather Field, which the Government already owns, is not to be utilized as the site of this new air repair and supply depot. This I think I should explain a little, so there may be no thought in your minds that we are needlessly expending money when the Government already owns land in the vicinity of Sacramento.

In the first place, the acreage of Mather Field is not sufficient for the proposed plant. Additional land would have to be acquired in any event. Secondly, the new site is to be located on a land-grant railroad, which will give the Government an immense saving in transportation costs to and from the new field. But the primary reason is that Mather Field has been selected as the proper location for a bombardment group for the defense of central and northern California. This means that eventually Sacramento will be the heart of Army Air Corps activities, both offensive and defensive.

The selection of Mather Field as the location for this bombardment group is one of the reasons why, from the standpoint of economy, an air depot in the same vicinity is not only advantageous but probably necessary. Permit me to quote General Westover again, in his testimony before the committee, when he stated that the Department "would consider it both an unwise as well as an inefficient way of doing it to put a depot on the same field with a bombardment or other heavy aerial unit. The two would not have sufficient room for their respective operations with the increase of the size of bombing aircraft." There would be conflict between training and field operations of the tactical units and the flight testing of aircraft overhauled by the depot. Hence there would result a loss of time and efficiency by both the units and depot if they were located together.

This, I think, fully explains the reason why Mather Field is not to be utilized in the establishment of the new air repair and supply base. It will, however, be utilized later by combat units of the air force to be organized in accordance with the Drum Board development.

As one who has fought earnestly and sincerely for the development of the Air Force by both the Army and Navy, and, in fact, for the development of every branch of the national defense, I am delighted to see this first step taken in carrying out the air-defense program authorized by Congress at its last session. Naturally I am grateful that the first unit is to be established in my own district. To that extent I hope I may be permitted to congratulate the citizens of Sacramento and vicinity and to thank the public-spirited citizens, newspapers, and civic bodies who have continuously aided my efforts here to bring about recognition by the War Department and Congress of Sacramento's availability as a strategic location for this base.

May I add, in closing, that I hope to see this unit added to in the next regular War Department appropriation bill by the establishment of other units which are necessary wherever they may be located. Nothing is more important under modern conditions to the protection of our Nation and preservation of our liberties than the proper location of adequately equipped air bases. The ground work there performed, the repair and overhaul, the testing and retesting of our planes, are the essentials of successful operations in the air. Bases such as this one about to be established are essential to any intelligent defense policy. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURLEY].

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would have to disregard all the statistics of all the agencies of this country on the unemployment problem to agree with my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. MAY]. When I point out to the gentleman from Kentucky that 20 percent of the 7,000,000 people of the city of New York are handcuffed to misery and suffering and are unemployed, perhaps the gentleman might change his opinion.

Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of engaging in debate on this proposition at all, but at the suggestion of the chairman of the committee, I thought it might be well at this point to state my views on this humane legislation. I have listened intently to the discussions both for and against this deficiency bill. I was quite amused at the statements made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD], as well as my distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. TABER]. The gentleman from Massachusetts pointed out the fact that in New York City relief money is being spent for boondoggling, eurythmic dancing, cartography, and other useless projects, and for all sorts of nonsensical things which had nothing to do with the relief of the unemployed.

Since the open debate on the deficiency bill before the House for consideration began, several Members on the minority side engaged, unwittingly perhaps, in some rather unwarranted and unbridled criticism of certain features in administration of relief in certain localities, among which was the city of New York. Ridicule and selected satire seemed to be the weapons employed.

With 12 millions unemployed and 40,000,000 members of their families handcuffed to poverty and misery, it is a dangerous proposition to inject glaring inaccuracies in the discussion of this vitally human legislation.

During the discussion yesterday on this question of relief money, reference was made to the conduct of the administration of relief in the city of New York at a time when there were approximately 1,400,000 persons receiving relief.

It is because of this reference that I deemed it proper to enter into this debate in order that certain misstatements may be corrected.

I have heard the word "boondoggling" and "eurythmic" dancing mentioned frequently at different times in this House in various debates and particularly in the one now in force. The reference was plainly made with the object of bringing down ridicule on the administration of relief and especially in New York State. To clarify the situation, as one in a position to know, permit me to state that on September 14, 1934, a special investigating committee of the legislative branch of the government of the city of New York instituted an investigation of the affairs of the department of public welfare and other bureaus and departments of the city of New York concerned with the administration of relief.

A series of public hearings was held. In fact, 18 public hearings were held from March 22, 1935, to May 9, 1935, and 110 witnesses testified.

During the course of the public hearings, William Hodson, Commissioner of the Department of Welfare and Chairman of the Emergency Relief Bureau, resigned as a result of the disclosures brought out at the said hearings.

This complete report is predicated upon sworn testimony and exhibits and are set forth in a complete, accurate analysis in a complete printed report at its conclusion on July 8, 1935.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York 2 additional minutes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURLEY. I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania yesterday to yield to me and the gentleman refused.

Mr. RICH. I wanted to ask whether the gentleman had read Mr. Johnson's report?

Mr. CURLEY. The set-up of the Relief Administration in the city of New York was authorized pursuant to a number of statutes, rules, and regulations.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] stated yesterday in his criticism of relief administration that he would make an effort to have the said Administration revert back to municipalities. For the information of the gentleman from New York, the administration of relief in his State of New York was and is authorized under chapter 798 of the laws passed at the extraordinary session of the New York Legislature in 1931. This law is known as the Wickes Act and became effective as of September 23, 1931.

And who is Mr. Wickes? He is a member of the same party as the gentleman from New York, the Republican Party. There was no authority in the city of New York to provide direct relief to needy in their homes. Pursuant to this law an emergency work bureau to administer work relief was set up on November 6, 1931, and early in December of 1931 the home-relief bureau was organized. The Federal Government played no part in this program until May 1933.

At this point there were 1,400,000 members of families on the relief rolls of New York City. At the present time there are 201,000 heads of families, approximately, on relief. In the spring of 1934 a new set-up came into existence to control and direct relief work. That was the E. R. B.—emergency-relief bureau—all the members of which were appointed by the mayor. The New York City commissioner of public welfare, an ex-officio member of the bureau, was designated to act as chairman of that bureau and in such capacity was director of the entire relief program of the city of New York. He resigned his appointment as chairman, but he continued on as a member of the E. R. B.

For the information of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] the Wickes Act was and is the source of authority for the E. R. B. and describes the rules for the administration of relief in the city of New York. It also sets up a State body known as the T. E. R. A.—temporary emergency relief bureau.

The life of the T. E. R. A. has been extended from year to year at successive sessions of the legislature. By chapter 25 of the Laws of 1935 the emergency period was extended to February 16, 1936.

To stress the point raised by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from New York, that he intended that relief should revert back to the municipalities the aforesaid Wickes Act describes the present depression and bases the enactment on the declaration of emergency. It is stated that the granting of relief is primarily an obligation of municipalities, but it is necessary to supplement such municipal relief by the assistance provided for in the act. However, all payments made by the State are made expressly subject to the rule of the T. E. R. A. A violation of these rules was made a misdemeanor.

The responsibility is placed upon the city for a proper administration of the relief because the law declares that relief is primarily a function of the municipality.

Under the authority of the Wickes Act, grants are made to municipalities, which was 75 percent of the total expenditures, 50 percent of this by the Federal Government, the other 25 percent by the city.

By the State law, the Governor is authorized, as agent of the State, to receive Federal grants. It might be well to note that in addition to the 25 percent paid by the city 16 percent of every dollar of Federal taxes collected comes from New York City and approximately 65 percent of every dollar of State taxes comes from the same sources.

At the first public hearing Commissioner Hodson, at that time chairman of the E. R. B., was interrogated under oath. He said in answer to the question:

So that by reason of improper investigation, or at least insufficient investigation, the taxpayers of the city of New York are losing approximately $24,000,000 a year through plain, ordinary grafting and chiseling on the part of people who are on these rolls—this is so, isn't it?

Replied:

I should say substantially so.

This was verified to a still greater degree through a subordinate, Mr. Arthur P. McNulty, administrative assistant to the director of the home-relief administration. He estimated that 15 percent of the people receiving relief were not entitled to it under the law. He concluded, therefore, that approximately $3,000,000 were taken a month by chiselers.

In the face of these facts it seems to be that the shoe is on the other foot. The Democratic administration is not to be blamed for the appalling conditions as shown by the sworn statements of Republican administration of relief in the city of New York.

Much has been said about "boondoggling." Under title "Service Projects", on page 161 of the report, we find the inventor of the word "boondoggling" testifying. He is Mr. Robert Marshall, of Springfield, Mass. He is the gentleman who gave this investigation, and the world, "boondoggling", a subject taught in his branch of the recreational schools. There are 150 relief workers engaged in boondoggling in his school in various craft activities. [Applause.]

SOCIAL JUSTICE

President Roosevelt's program of social justice for all instead of any special or privileged group in this Nation can only be realized by the application of plain, homely, common sense and rational reasoning. Any other course would be the essence of invincible ignorance in a crisis such as we are passing through. It was my proud privilege to have been elected on a platform pledged to the New Deal last November. After serving in the House of Representatives for the past 5 months, I am firmly convinced that no other nation at its very best was ever as good as the United States of America at its worst. With 153 years of tremendous growth to its credit, the Nation in 1929 was sliding down a financial hole with no sign of a bottom in sight. So that by March 4, 1933, all that was left of the gears of the Hoover Republican machine were stripped completely and threw our American economic structure out of balance. The first step under the New Deal was to replace the wornout gears with new ones in this human mechanism, which now are meshing properly and grinding slowly but surely toward recovery of normal economic balance.

For the past 5 months all I heard from the Republican minority is the stereotyped squawk, "Where are you going to get the money?" and "When are you going to balance the Budget?" Well, my answer to that is where economy is established at the expense or sacrifice of essential expenditure to eliminate misery, suffering, and starvation among 33⅓ percent of our population, then I say it is parsimony and not economy. When our Republican critics pretend to worry about the billions of dollars spent, and to be spent, to relieve human suffering, why did not they think of that back in the days of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover? Did they leave a balanced Budget to the New Deal in 1933? They did not. Did they provide or set up any concrete plan to give relief to the 15,000,000 unemployed in the Hoover administration? No; they did not. Did they try to promote better trading relations with friendly foreign nations, so that a market could be maintained for our surplus commodities? No; they did not; but they did the best they could to close those foreign markets by the enactment of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act.

The New Deal is refreshing in that it spelled the departure from the past reactionary and orthodox mechanics of our American system of economics, in keeping pace with the times, and in quest of real social justice for all our citizens. The sneers of an enemy are sometimes worth more than the flattery of a friend. All the golden promises of future prosperity offered by the board of strategy of the Republican Party could never sweeten the bitterness of the cup of fear the millions of poverty-stricken citizens were compelled to drain under the Hoover debacle of 1929. Like the ostrich that buries his head in the sand, they deceive themselves with belief the public has forgotten the 12 years of Republican misrule. To hear their constant warnings to the majority side about "extravagant spending" one would think this child of depression was ours. When, as a matter of record, they petted and pampered it for over 12 years when it was healthy, and then when it became afflicted with nervous break-down they abandoned it on the doorstep of President Roosevelt. Now, a fact is just like a birthmark; you may try to cover it up, but you cannot rub it out.

A LEGACY OF CHAOS

As a matter of public record, the previous Republican administration bequeathed the Democratic administration under President Roosevelt in 1933 an unbalanced Budget amounting to $3,068,000,000. Then, in answer to the constant partisan clamor about "broken platform pledges" by the Democratic administration, let me state that from the day in June 1932 when the Democratic platform was adopted in Chicago up to March 4, 1933, the whole economic structure was in a badly shattered condition under the then existing Republican regime. So that when Franklin D. Roosevelt took his oath of office as President of the United States on that date he faced the greatest economic collapse in our history as a problem to solve. What a solemn and grave situation left him to face by these present-day critics. Banking institutions closing in every city and town in every State in the Union. Business paralyzed all over the country. Bankruptcies galore were common headlines in the daily papers. Fifty million people facing starvation, poverty, and stark misery. Railroads throughout the Nation crippled financially.

That was the picture of our great Nation when Hoover, the great engineer, handed the reins over to our real, peerless leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt, in 1933. In such an emergency what did he do? He appealed to Divine Providence to guide him to solve the human problems. He rose far above any party platform pledges. Ten months had passed since they were approved and when the crisis arrived. Extraordinary and heroic measures and action were necessary, imperative, and mandatory in the premises. All previous policy to save the Nation from complete collapse had failed under the Hoover Republican regime. And, just like the master surgeon resorting to the last extreme, President Roosevelt performed a major operation on a very sick body politic to save her life by issuing his famous proclamation declaring a bank holiday, closing all financial institutions throughout the country, thereby saving what was left of deposits. Yet in the face of that masterpiece in leadership these partisan critics inject the fiction about "broken party platform pledges" not only in the spoken but in the written word. In the words of Don Louis Gougoud:

O Hand! How much white vellum thou hast written; thou wilt make famous the vellum, but thou, thyself wilt remain the bare top of a fagot of bones.

The Roosevelt theory of a real democratic form of government of, by, and for the people, applied in a common-sense, practical manner, actually means the distribution of the wealth of the Nation in work and wages for the mass through healthy cooperation and coordination of industry and its related business with labor. It is the only practical solution of the appalling social crime of unemployment. As a matter of fact, it is a fundamental principle of our American system of government and the very essence of any remedy to give relief in this crisis. The mechanics of our economic structure must be revamped to give a proper balance to all the human elements that enter into the life of our great Nation. The substitution of common sense for all the unbridled criticism wandering around in a vacuum would help materially to steer our national ship of state out of troubled into calm waters. It seems, however, that not only must our great President submit himself as a target of unjust criticism, but a mud-slinging spree as well, in a pitiful exhibition to pillory him because of his pledge to keep the faith with the "forgotten man."

No, partisan critic, it was your own great engineer, Herbert Hoover, and his Republican administration from 1928 to 1933 that broke the faith with the American people to "abolish poverty forever and his philanthropic gifts of two chickens in every pot and two cars to every garage."

COMMON SENSE VERSUS RIDICULE

Mr. Chairman, on March 4, 1933, the dawn of a new day in a new era appeared in our American history. The forces of light and reason assumed control of the Government of these United States of America, under the peerless leadership of Hon. Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Simplicity, directness, and sanity were the ingredients of the serum employed in his preparation to vaccinate the then existing impoverished blood of the American people against panic.

Andre Maurois said:

Panic is the result of blind imitation of others. It comes when the critical sense fails, and it is vanquished when logic, displacing imitation, returns to govern the human conduct or action of men.

The radiating, refreshing, and stimulating vitality of President Roosevelt's magnetic leadership immediately aroused the dormant energy of the dazed, weakened, human forces throughout the country and mobilized our vast natural sources of wealth into a galvanic battery of vibrant human activities which electrified the Nation from end to end. His prompt and progressive action in seizing direct control and command of our senile and tottering financial institutions immediately was a masterpiece in leadership as well as statesmanship that has no equal in history.

It was an outstanding constructive public achievement in the form of public service that stands without a parallel in Government administration. It was a fearless display of courage which spelled the doom of the black Pharaohs leading the forces of misery and distress in this country. Yet they heap ridicule and satire on him today.

Warburton said:

Reason is the test of ridicule, not ridicule the test of the truth.

The Democratic administration of our National Government under President Roosevelt's humane policies has turned America's face definitely toward recovery. The shadows of misery and distress are behind us forever. We have met our enemies of reason and common sense in fair combat, with logic as our ammunition—and they are ours. The budding cycle of returning prosperity has arrived under President Roosevelt's practical, homely, common-sense administration.

Permit me to state, Mr. Chairman, that the reactionary critics of our New Deal in government, who thrived on special privilege in the past Republican administration, who bartered and traded the economic birthrights of the 48 States in the Union, the right to regulate and control unfair monopoly, are now spreading poisonous propaganda against the New Deal in a most vicious, invidious campaign to regain control of our Government. They do not understand that our Government under the New Deal is the servant and not the master of the people; that the New Deal recognizes the fundamental principle that sovereignty still resides with the people, not with special-privileged groups.

WILL OF THE PEOPLE

When that principle is flagrantly violated by any powerful element in the economic life of the Nation, through striking crushing blows at other vital sections of that human structure, then the instrument of the will of the people, the Government, is vested with the police power to intervene temporarily to regulate and control a vicious and dangerous condition which threatens and affects the "peace and happiness", the "general welfare", and "the blessings of liberty" guaranteed the people under the Constitution.

Under such circumstances, temporary governmental regulation and control, as well as protection, of the flow of the blood stream of our national economic life is absolutely essential to our well-being, not primarily in the interest of the State but fundamentally in the interest of the people who comprise the State.

As that great champion of human liberty, Abraham Lincoln, once said, "When an occasion is piled high with difficulties, we must rise to the occasion."

Well, that is exactly what our great President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, did in this crisis when he initiated his humane, common-sense program to bring our smitten Nation back where she belongs on her feet again. He has led the way to sunshine and happiness out of the chaos he found the Nation in. Why should we not encourage instead of ridiculing him to still greater effort for the less fortunate among us? Let us give him all the support a thankful and grateful Nation has always given to her tried and true public officials. For President Roosevelt has proven our claim he is a peerless leader. The record is the proof.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I expect to vote for this bill, although I hope to see it amended to provide for the allocation of the relief appropriation to the States according to their need, the same to be administered by the States and local communities on a nonpartisan basis, thereby taking the Federal Government out of the business of administration of relief funds.

The principal items in the bill, outside of the regular deficiency appropriations, are the appropriations for social security and relief. I supported the social security legislation, knowing that it would require an appropriation to put it into effect, and I am in favor of making the necessary appropriation for that purpose. Without it the social-security law is of no force or effect and might just as well not have been passed.

I shall vote also for the provision in the bill appropriating $1,425,000,000 for relief. That it is the obligation of the Federal Government to provide funds to care for those who are unemployed and in need so long as they remain in that condition and the States and local communities are unable to provide for them is a question not open for debate as far as I am concerned. The fact that inefficiency, waste, boondoggling, and politics are prevalent in the administration of relief funds is well known, but criticism of the administration of the funds will not feed the hungry, and they must be provided for. The States and local communities should contribute as much as they can toward the support of their unemployed, and everyone hopes that they will be able to carry the full burden without any help from the Federal Government within the not far distant future, but until that time comes the Federal Government must help.

No matter what the percentage of local contribution may be, I believe that it has been demonstrated to the satisfaction of the great majority of the American people that the States and local communities can administer the funds, whatever is contributed by the Federal Government as well as the amount raised locally, more efficiently and economically and provide for the needs of the people within their respective jurisdictions more adequately and satisfactorily than the Federal Government can do. They should be given that authority, and I shall vote for an amendment to the bill to that effect.

As indicating the sentiment of the country on some of the questions raised by this bill, I have had in mind calling attention to the poll of the American Institute of Public Opinion, which was published in the newspapers a week ago last Sunday, April 26, to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THURSTON] has already referred.

It seems to be the prevailing sentiment of the country, as indicated by this poll, that these relief funds should be turned over to the States and the local communities, and there are some facts brought out or emphasized by that poll to which I should like to call special attention. I assume the poll is a nonpartisan and disinterested one and was made without any reference to partisanship.

The questions submitted to the public were:

First. In your opinion, does politics play a part in the handling of relief in your locality?

Second. Should the responsibility of caring for all persons on relief be returned now to the States and local governments?

The results of the poll show—I quote from the report as printed in the newspapers—that—

> Approximately 6 out of every 10 Americans on the average think that politics influences the handling of Federal relief funds in their localities. Nearly one-half the people receiving relief admit it. A fair-sized majority of Democrats believe it. A huge majority of Republicans are convinced of it.

Of the total number of replies received to the first question, 65 percent answered "yes", 18 percent answered "no", and 17 percent expressed no opinion. Divided as to parties, 55 percent of the Democrats said that they believed politics played a part in the handling of relief in their localities, 80 percent of the Republicans so expressed themselves, and 77 percent of the Socialists. Even of those on relief, 49 percent, or nearly one-half, stated that in their opinion there is politics in the handling of Federal donations, 25 percent did not think so, and 26 percent expressed no opinion.

In Michigan, 63 percent of those voting said "yes", 10 percent said "no", and 27 percent expressed no opinion.

As to the second question, "Should the responsibility for caring for all persons on relief be returned now to State and local governments?" 55 percent of those voting said "yes", 45 percent "no." Classified as to party affiliations: Republicans, 72 percent voted "yes", 28 percent "no." Democrats, 44 percent "yes", 56 percent "no."

In Michigan, 63 percent of all the votes, both Republican and Democratic, gave it as their opinion that the responsibility of caring for all persons on relief should be returned now to State and local governments, and 37 percent expressed the opposite opinion.

That the relief program and other administration policies during the last 3 years have gotten nowhere, as far as relieving the unemployment situation is concerned, seems to be conceded. As stated in the report of this poll of the American Institute of Public Opinion:

> Nearly everybody knows that approximately 20,000,000 persons were on relief in March 1933; that the Federal Government has spent or loaned $16,000,000,000 for relief and recovery since then; and that in March 1936 there were still 20,000,000 on relief.

That is not a partisan statement but a plain statement of fact.

The report continues:

> The course of action which the voters favor, after watching 3 years of Federal aid to the needy, is to turn the responsibility for relief over to the States and localities.

The vote in Michigan was 63 percent in favor as against 37 percent opposed.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCFARLANE].

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include certain data.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to compliment this committee on bringing in this bill $23,859,268.38 under the Bureau of Budget estimates. Since this deficiency appropriation bill carries appropriations for many of the departments of government as well as funds for relief purposes, I believe it appropriate to refer to the work of these different departments of government and the legislative program worked out under the leadership of our great President, Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, and let the record show the results accomplished under this administration. I will also point out as I go along just what this great record of service has meant to the people of Texas and, particularly, of my district.

AGRICULTURE

This is the first national administration we have had in many years that has really tried to do something for agriculture. Recognizing that buying power must be restored before we can remedy unemployment, the agricultural-adjustment program was speedily worked out which has increased the gross incomes of the farmers from $5,337,000,000 in 1932 to $8,110,000,000 in 1935, and their net income from $1,473,000,000 in 1932 to $3,550,000,000 in 1935.

It will be interesting to compare the records of the last 3 years of the Old Deal with the first 3 years of the New Deal as we go along. Time of comparison dates is March 1, 1930, to March 1, 1933, of the Old Deal and March 1, 1933, to March 1, 1936, under the New Deal.

Cotton declined 61 percent to 5.9 cents per pound under the Hoover administration and advanced 92 percent to 11.35 cents per pound under the Roosevelt administration. Wheat declined 59 percent to 48 cents per bushel under Hoover and advanced 111 percent to $1.015 per bushel under Roosevelt. Corn declined 73 percent to 24 cents per bushel under Hoover and advanced 152 percent to 68.87 cents per bushel under Roosevelt.

WICHITA GARDENS AND WICHITA VALLEY COLONY PROJECTS

I was the first to suggest to the citizens of Wichita Falls the subsistence homestead project, which up to that time was unknown to any of them. After considerable work we were able to finally secure this project, which provides homes for 62 families and sufficient ground, outhouses, and so forth, to supplement low incomes to assist these families in earning their livelihood. The total estimated Government cost of the Wichita Gardens is approximately $200,000.

I have been glad to assist in securing the approval of the Wichita Valley Farms, which involves an acquisition of approximately 5,300 acres of farm land in Wichita County. Options have been taken on 3,430 acres of land at a cost of $123,381. This project is designed for the resettlement of 93 farm families on farm units averaging about 52 acres each. The total estimated Government cost of the Wichita Valley Farms is approximately $862,400.

The following loans, grants, and farm-debt adjustments have been made by the Resettlement Administration for my district:

LOANS MADE BY FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

For the first time in the history of the Nation, under legislation worked out by this administration, a complete system of farm credit has been set up separate and apart from the old commercial bank-credit system.

The Farm Credit Administration, through its different agencies, has loaned $187,208,160 in the State of Texas from May 1, 1933, to March 31, 1936. The Federal land bank and the land-bank commissioner has made a total of 3,358 loans in my district and a total of $8,134,700.

From January 1, 1933, through September 30, 1935, there were 4,770 emergency crop and feed loans made in my district, amounting to $376,710, and 3,469 drought loans totaling $305,027.

FARM-MORTGAGE FORECLOSURES

This administration, through legislation enacted, has refinanced about 750,000 farm mortgages, totaling $3,230,308,000, at a savings in interest rates over previous rates charged of more than $50,000,000 as compared to previous interest rates charged for the same service.

The following table shows the number of foreclosures and similar transactions per thousand farms during the last several years:

Foreclosures on farm real estate—number per 1,000

1926–30 (average)	16.7
1931	18.7
1932	28.4
1933	38.8
1935	21.0

While we see from the above table that we have made great progress under this administration in reducing the number of foreclosures on farms and savings made the farmer in lower interest rates, however, as compared to the interest rates paid by industry there is still great room for improvement in lowering the interest rate for the farmer, small businessman, and consumer. Our big problem is redistribution of buying power and continued high rates on the fixed charges, interest, taxes, and so forth, will continue to retard recovery.

SOIL CONSERVATION SERVICE

During this administration there has been located in the State of Texas 77 camps under the Soil Conservation Service program. There has been expended in Texas under this program to May 1, this year, $41,071,000; there has been allotted to dependent relatives of enrollees in these camps in Texas, the sum of $9,722,000; there has been 62,671 Texas boys enrolled in these camps together with 7,017 officers and necessary employees for operating said camps in Texas. Under this soil-conservation program to January 1, 1936, there has been erected in Texas 7,000 bridges and 2,000 old bridges repaired and maintained; they have built 1,200 miles of telephone lines; over 3,000 truck trails have been constructed and 27,000 erosion-check dams; about 5,000 terrace outlet structures have been built, about 4,600,000 forest trees set out. Timber standing on about 86,000 acres of forest land has been thinned; rodent control over 101,000 acres of land and timber set out over 168,000 acres.

There were six of these soil-conservation camps located in my district, as follows: Gainesville, Denton, Boyd, Jacksboro, Graham, and Bowie.

Thus we find from reviewing the above figures that under this administration there has been expended in the thirteenth district by the Government, on account of these C. C. C. camps, approximately $3,200,958.

VETERANS' LEGISLATION

After a 7-year battle this Congress finally passed a bill to pay the World War veteran the balance due him on his adjusted-service certificate. This legislation passed the House on January 24 by a vote of 325 to 61, and passed the Senate on January 27 by a vote of 76 to 19. Thus nearly 18 years after the close of the war, the veteran is finally paid the balance granted him for service rendered his country.

In keeping with my campaign pledges, I gladly supported and voted for the final passage of this measure. I have always favored paying this debt through the issuance of non-interest-bearing currency. However, since it seems we could not secure enough votes in the Senate to pass such a measure this session, there was nothing left to do but to give the money changers their "pound of flesh" and pay same through a bond issue which will cost the taxpayers an additional $2,000,000,000 in interest, because of their forcing the issuance of interest-bearing bonds.

The payment of the soldier the balance due on his adjusted-service certificate will distribute about $83,000,000 in Texas and about $4,323,733.13 in the Thirteenth Congressional District, as follows:

Archer County, $143,110.16; Baylor, $109,623.21; Clay, $214,946.01; Cooke, $356,681.81; Denton, $485,043.52; Foard, $93,323.07; Hardeman, $214,753.90; Jack, $133,681.79; Knox, $167,996.91; Montague, $283,131.71; Throckmorton, $77,628.84; Wilbarger, $363,228.47; Wise, $283,412.49; Wichita, $1,099,719.65; Young, $297,451.51.

Two years ago I was bitterly opposed, as you know, by the special interests in my candidacy for reelection to a second term because I had dared to actively support not only what was fair and just for the soldier but because I had voted for what was right for the plain people. During my entire legislative career of 4 years in the Texas House of Representatives, 4 years in the State senate, and 4 years as your Representative in Congress, I have always actively fought and voted for what would best protect the rights of the greater number.

During this administration there has been enacted into law or restored by Executive order practically all of the rights taken from the soldier due to the enactment of the so-called economy bill, which took from the soldier and others many of their rights.

INDUSTRY

Between 1921, the low point of the post-war depression, and 1929, when industrial activity was at its peak for the post-war years, the number of people engaged in all industries increased from 40,008,000 to 46,800,000; estimated national income increased from $58,271,000,000 to $78,632,000,000, and the value of manufacturing production increased from $43,653,283,000 to $69,960,910,000. The national income decreased from $78,576,000,000 in 1929 to $44,431,000,000 in 1933, and the value of manufacturing production decreased from $69,960,910,000 in 1929 to $31,358,840,000 in 1933.

The export and import trade of the United States followed the same general course, as shown in the table which follows:

Exports and imports

Year	Domestic exports	Domestic imports
1921	4,378,938,000	2,509,148,000
1925	4,818,722,000	4,226,589,000
1929	5,157,083,000	4,399,361,000
1933	1,647,220,000	1,449,559,000

Total exports declined 56 percent under the Hoover administration and advanced 33 percent under the Roosevelt administration.

Under the Hoover administration business in general dropped 64.2 percent of normal, while under the Roosevelt administration general business went up to 94.1 percent of the 1923–25 average. Listed stocks on the average declined 75 percent under the Hoover administration and advanced 134 percent under the Roosevelt administration. Listed bonds on the average declined 22 percent under the Hoover administration and advanced 22 percent under the Roosevelt administration.

Wholesale prices declined 34 percent under the Hoover administration and advanced 33 percent under the Roosevelt administration. Automobile registrations declined 66 percent under the Hoover administration and advanced 326 percent under the Roosevelt administration; steel production declined 70 percent under the Hoover administration and advanced 257 percent under the Roosevelt administration. Industrial production declined 44 percent under the Hoover administration and advanced 51 percent under the Roosevelt administration.

LABOR

Under the Hoover administration, weekly pay rolls declined 53 percent to $188,355,000, while the weekly pay rolls advanced 61 percent, to $302,373,000, under the Roosevelt administration; on April 1, 1930, the records show 3,188,000 unemployed; on April 1, 1933, 13,178,000 unemployed, an increase in unemployment of 313 percent, while under the Roosevelt administration unemployment declined 36 percent, from 13,178,000 to 9,177,000 on December 1, 1935, and Mr. Green, of the American Federation of Labor, recently issued a statement showing further declines have placed unemployment now at less than 9,000,000.

Under the Hoover administration, families of millions of unemployed wage earners were facing starvation, receiving some aid from uncertain local charity and inadequate State relief, while the Hoover administration was loaning billions of dollars to the banks and railroads but did nothing for the destitute. Under the Roosevelt administration, destitute wage earners and their families are taken care of with Federal relief, the unemployed have been given work by the P. W. A., W. P. A., and other work-relief programs set up by this administration.

OUR CRITICS

Early this year the special-privileged crowd, headed up by the miscalled American Liberty League, the Crusaders, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the National Manufacturers' Association and their puppets, held one of their famous banquets in the Mayflower Hotel in Washington at which, according to the press, there were seated around the banquet tables men representing billions of dollars of wealth. It was the most openly brazen gathering of wealth ever assembled in Washington, to hear former Governor Al Smith, who has turned spokesman for this plutocratic crowd, caustically criticizing the Roosevelt administration. This same crowd was in Washington in March 1933, begging for immediate action to save their business and the country from revolution, which they knew in truth and in fact was "just around the corner." Now, we find them, as soon as this administration has enacted legislation that has brought the country well on the road to recovery, and they are among the chief beneficiaries of this recovery program—we find them back in town, bitterly condemning the administration that made possible the saving of their business and the country from wrack and ruin.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Under the Hoover administration nothing whatever was done for the aged, the dependent children, maternal and child welfare, the blind, vocational rehabilitation, or unemployment compensation.

Under the Roosevelt administration a Committee on Economic Security, composed of the leading economists of the Nation, was appointed by the President to carefully study this great problem. This board reported back to the President and he recommended to Congress the Social Security Act, which was speedily enacted and became a law on August 14, 1935.

Under this social-security program the Federal Government for the first time has recognized the justness of dealing with these different questions from a national standpoint. This seven-point program of legislation enacted, while not claimed to be perfect and will no doubt need amendment from time to time, still it is a beginning, and it grants more real relief than any other legislation ever enacted by any nation in the world. Under the Social Security Act the Federal Government has appropriated sufficient funds to match State funds up to $15 per month for the aged and for the blind and grants aid for dependent children on the basis of $1 of Federal money for each $2 expended by the State, but the Federal cost is not to exceed an amount equal to $6 per month for the first child in the family and $4 per month for each additional child. Proper provisions are made for maternal and child welfare, for the extension of public-health service as well as social rehabilitation. This act also provides a Federal old-age-benefit system for employed persons to provide them with a definite income upon retirement. This system of old-age benefits will be financed chiefly by taxes upon both employer and employee; these taxes will be levied in equal amounts upon both employer and employee and will be collected by the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The tax upon employers and employees affects both alike, regardless of the number employed, and becomes effective January 1, 1937, and is equal to 1 percent of the pay roll in 1937, and the tax gradually increases to the amount equal to 3 percent of the pay roll in 1949. This tax is computed in respect of all wages paid not in excess of $3,000.

The tax against employees is an income tax upon wages, payable by them, and the rates, scope, and effective dates of such tax are substantially the same as in the case of the pay-roll taxes against employers described in the preceding paragraph.

PENSION SCHEMES

The House Congressional Committee appointed to investigate the different pension schemes and the mode and manner these promoters work to filch nickels and dimes from the unsuspecting aged of the Nation, have day after day in the testimony given before their committee disclosed to what extent these schemes have been organized purely for selfish motives of those engaged, to enrich themselves at the expense of any who may contribute. This investigation has clearly shown that most of the leaders of these pension schemes have largely been controlled by either temporarily reformed persons with criminal records or by persons who have followed this form of racketeering and have preyed upon the unsuspecting over a long period of time.

Since Dr. Townsend has endorsed the Downey plan to provide pensions through the issuance of a $10,000,000,000 bond issue and has abandoned his so-called Townsend plan, and has joined Gerald Smith in a share-the-wealth movement with a slogan "anything to defeat Roosevelt", this so-called Townsend-Downey-Smith political pension coalition is beginning to be better understood and the real purposes of the organization and consolidations back of these schemes is becoming better understood.

THE SPECIAL PRIVILEGE CROWD

The special privilege crowd throughout the years have managed to drag a red herring across the trail to try to divert the people's attention from the real fundamental issues of government onto some kind of fantastic scheme, and through such tactics continue their program of special privilege unmolested.

This administration has refused to be thus sidetracked. So far, of the many primary elections held in the different States throughout the Nation, not one single Townsend candidate, as such, for Congress has been nominated. Somehow it seems that 92 percent of the workers of the Nation seem to object to giving at least one-third of their earnings to the 8 percent for them and their families to live in luxury while those who work and earn this money live on beans.

I have always favored adequate old-age pensions, and have so voted. I voted for a pension of $40 per month—see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 6068, first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress. I agree with the leading economists Nation-wide that the so-called Townsend plan is not economically sound, and the leaders of this movement know or could easily know that their bill, H. R. 7154, now pending in Congress, to which they refer, would not provide more than $40 per month through the 2-percent pyramided transaction sales tax, and the economists all agree that this consumption tax would increase the price of the necessities of life not less than 50 percent.

THE TOWNSEND TAX PLAN

The Townsend plan is not a pension plan at all. This administration has already carefully worked out a pension plan that is the law today. The Townsend plan is a tax plan whereby every person in this country to start with will pay a 2-percent pyramided transaction sales tax on every transaction made. This tax must be paid on all purchases and transactions made, including all necessities of life, and covers every separate transaction from the producer through the merchant, jobber, wholesaler to the manufacturer, and back through the same endless chain to the consumer.

This is what it would cost the 92 percent of the people of the Nation to pay the 8 percent—10,000,000 aged eligibles—a $200 pension per month at a cost of $24,000,000,000 per year. The 1930 census shows we have a population of 122,775,046. Therefore to pay a $200-per-month pension, we find, by dividing $24,000,000,000 by 122,775,046, that it will require each and every man, woman, and child in the United States to pay an average of $195.40 per year in new taxes. This is how this new sales-tax scheme would affect Texas and my district It would require the citizens of Texas to pay, in new additional taxes, $1,138,149,811, based on the 1930 census, and would require the different counties in my district to pay the following new additional taxes:

Archer County $1,892,253.60, Baylor County $1,444,477.20, Clay County $2,722,093, Cooke County $4,716,174.40, Denton County $6,413,418.80, Foard County $1,234,951, Hardeman County $2,728,370.20, Jack County $1,767,588.40, Knox County $2,121,307.20, Montague County $3,743,868.60, Throckmorton County $1,026,436.20, Wichita County $14,540,886.40; Wilbarger County $4,802,736.60, Wise County $3,737,381.20, and Young County $3,933,011.20, making a total of new taxes for the Thirteenth Congressional District amounting to the sum of $56,829,954 annually.

I have always favored raising revenue based on ability to pay rather than through sales taxes, which are always shifted onto and must be paid principally by the poor. The State of Texas is now operating with a tremendous deficit, and daily I am receiving letters from my constituents trying to secure relief under the home and farm loan authorities to save their homes and farms from foreclosure. Texas now has more than $150,000,000 in delinquent taxes; I am unwilling to vote to saddle this additional annual tax burden upon the overburdened taxpayers of my district.

FISCAL AFFAIRS

The interest-bearing public indebtedness on March 31, 1933, was $20,991,640,520, and on November 30, 1935, it had increased to $28,482,013,190, an increase of $7,490,372,670. While our bonded indebtedness has increased $7,490,372,670, the records in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, and Home Owners' Loan Corporation showed a total of $4,529,574,043 of guaranteed liabilities, leaving a net increased bonded indebtedness under this administration because of increased expenditures due to the depression amounting to the sum of $2,960,798,627.

LOANS UNDER RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

There has been loaned to the counties of the Thirteenth Congressional District under legislation enacted by this administration the following sums:

Archer County, $10,000; Baylor County, $50,000; Clay County, $58,285.78; Cooke County, $400,000; Denton County, $130,000; Foard County, $18,000; Hardeman County, $18,062.38; Jack County, $50,000; Knox County, $52,500; Montague County, $16,000; Throckmorton County, $27,500; Wichita County, $1,041,643.32; Wilbarger County, $84,505; and Young County, $75,000, making a total of $2,032,096.48 for the Thirteenth Congressional District.

Commercial failures increased enormously from 1929 to 1932, and they involved a total of $502,831,000. In 1934, however, the liability in commercial failures totaled $264,248,000.

FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

During the past three Republican administrations 11,144 banks failed in the United States. Six thousand and fifty-four banks failed during the Hoover administration alone, losing to their depositors $3,650,015,000.

The collapse of the bank structure of the Nation wrecked thousands of businessmen and caused thousands to be in want through no fault of their own. The first official act of this administration was to close all remaining banks until they could open on a safe and sound basis under legislation speedily enacted by this administration. The different amendments to our banking laws have placed the banks on a safe and sound basis and the enactment of the bank guaranty law has assured adequate protection of the depositors' money for the future.

There were but 57 bank failures in 1934 as compared to 179 from March 16 to December 31, 1933, and 449 bank failures from January 1 to March 1, 1933. There have been but five banks closed in Texas since the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation was created July 1, 1933, and under this administration but one bank has closed in the Thirteenth District.

FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION

Under the Hoover administration, homes were foreclosed throughout the Nation. Nothing was done to save the equities of millions in their homes which were sold under the auctioneer's hammer. Millions of homes were going to wrack and ruin because the owners were unable to finance needed repairs. Under this administration, legislation promptly enacted set up machinery that saved 995,531 homes through the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, which loaned $3,005,000,000 to home owners, more than 90 percent of whom have taken care of their payments on time. The Federal Housing Administration was set up to take care of needed repairs and improvements on homes. Many millions of dollars have thus been loaned to make needed improvements. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation has made the following loans in the Thirteenth Congressional District of Texas: Archer, $9,635; Baylor, $54,640; Clay, $41,898; Cooke, $169,208; Denton, $302,368; Foard, $40,538; Hardeman, $155,073; Jack, $2,122; Knox, $27,559; Montague, $48,684; Wichita, $1,556,223; Wilbarger, $193,192; Wise, $29,595; Young, $58,438; making a total of $2,689,173 loaned in my district.

The Federal Housing Administration, according to the latest information available, has transacted to May 1, 1936, $781,197,015, $365,609,493 of which has been for modernization and repair and $260,772,061 home mortgages accepted for insurance. It has transacted the following business in the Thirteenth Congressional District of Texas.

ELECTRIC POWER PROGRAM

Under the Hoover administration, power production declined 9 percent from 7.87 billion kilowatt-hours to 7.14 billion kilowatt-hours, while under this administration, power production increased 19 percent from 7.14 billion kilowatt-hours to 8.50 billion kilowatt-hours, yet the Power Trust crowd and their lobby have done everything possible through their campaign of propaganda over the radio and through the press, magazines, and so forth, to mislead the people into believing that the legislation enacted under this administration has destroyed the private utility business. As a matter of fact the enforced regulations under the Wheeler-Rayburn Act, the Securities Exchange Act and other legislation has caused the 19 percent advance in the sale of power production during this administration. Practically all stocks of the Power Trust are hitting new highs daily and yet we find the Power Trust continues their program of bitterly opposing this administration in every way possible.

Bulletin No. 175, recently published by Judson King, director of the National Popular Government League, contains this statement, signed by 110 Members of the present Senate and House of Representatives:

THE UTILITY ISSUE IN 1936

Four years ago many Members of Congress in both House and Senate, without regard to party affiliations, warned the American people that the utility and banking interests were quietly working to control the nomination and election of candidates for the Presidency and the Congress.

Since a like effort is now being made, we repeat that warning and call special attention to two methods, among others, intensified in use since that time, to thwart public control of the utility "empires."

1. These corporations, and especially the holding companies, have redoubled their "back home" lobby and political activities, not only to dominate local governments, but also as a means of increasing their influence in national affairs. They seek to manipulate the nominating and election machinery without regard to party and usually employ concealed methods.

Second. They are brazenly utilizing the very machinery of the courts—legal procedures set up to insure exact justice among men—as instruments in their private warfare to postpone and frustrate either effective regulation or public ownership, undertaken in response to public demand, for low rates.

We refer not to legitimate suits testing valid legal questions, but to the endless number of abortive injunctions instigated for the sole purpose of delaying execution of the public will, after that will has been formally expressed through the processes of constitutional government, and often after contests have been decided against them in the highest courts.

These suits, seldom brought with hope of success, are paid for by consumers and charged to operating expenses. They drain public treasuries, exhaust public patience, and paralyze the machinery of Government. We submit that the multitude of suits of this character now pending against cities and towns, public-utility commissions, rural power districts, States, and Federal Government constitute a national scandal.

The power war is by no means ended. The efforts of private corporations to minimize its importance and deflect public attention must not prevail. It must be carried forward in this election, and all elections, until the American people are masters in their own house, and until they shall be freed from exorbitant and unjust charges, and until electricity shall be supplied to every urban and farm home in America, at rates the people can afford to pay.

We have a fair example of the Power Trust injunction suit tactics in the suits filed to stop the construction of a municipal light plant at Electra, Tex., which was approved by the vote of the people by more than 7 to 1, and injunction suits filed by the different power trust companies operating in Texas enjoining the construction of the Colorado and Brazos River power and flood control projects. There is already ample evidence available showing how the power trust has been able to secure control of the sale of power from the Colorado and Brazos River projects if and when constructed.

It will be remembered that at the request of the Wichita Falls City Council, and many citizens of Wichita Falls, last fall at my own expense I came to Washington and secured the approval of a loan and grant for the city of Wichita Falls for $1,750,000 for the purpose of constructing a municipal light plant. The citizens throughout the Thirteenth District have been furnished with ample proof showing how the Power Trust crowd was able to thwart the will of the people and thus keep the citizens of Wichita Falls from enjoying lower light rates.

There is no reason under the sun why any community should be forced to pay from 2 to 10 times as much as it costs to produce electricity. So long as the people sit idly by and allow the utility crowd to control and dominate their city councils and other public officials, then just so long will the citizens be forced to continue to pay these unreasonable high utility rates.

No administration has tried harder to enact just legislation so as to place within the grasp of the local communities the power to force down utility rates than has this administration. The battle this administration has waged to bring about this result has been carried on through the Federal Power Commission, through the enactment of legislation setting up the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Rural Electrification Administration, the Electric Home and Farm Authority, the Public Works Administration, and appropriations to carry on the big power projects scattered throughout the Nation. This is the first administration that has ever dared to do battle with the Power Trust to force lower power rates. All those of this administration who have supported the administration's utility program should have the earnest support of those who believe in honest fair dealings between man and man.

As shown by the records of the Public Works Administration, the power program of this Administration has been practically blocked through the many different injunction suits filed and other dilatory tactics used by the Power Trust to block this program set up by this administration for the purpose of furnishing ample yardsticks throughout the Nation to demonstrate what constitutes a fair price for the services rendered.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS UNDER P. W. A.

The Power Trust has graciously permitted this administration to loan money to construct public-school buildings, dormitories, auditoriums, sewerage and water systems, and school gymnasiums without filing injunction suits or forcing same to be blocked through pressure on the governing authorities. The Power Trust crowd have used their influence to have any and all such buildings constructed, especially if there was any possibility of that city filing an application for a municipal light plant that might interfere with their private monopolistic services which permit them to continue their excessive charges for electricity. The public-works program has thus been tremendously successful Nation-wide as it applies to the above-described buildings, and there has been or will be constructed under this program in the Thirteenth Congressional District in Texas buildings totaling $10,721,750, as follows: Archer County, $64,545; Baylor County, $148,654; Clay County, $83,635; Cooke County, $492,250; Denton County, $2,979,540; Foard County, $46,272; Hardeman County, $41,654; Jack County, $137,095; Knox County, $293,218; Montague County, $361,900; Throckmorton County, $47,272; Wilbarger County, $294,222; Wichita County, $5,153,695; Wise County, $291,680; and Young County, 286,118.

There has been or will be constructed in the State of Texas under this program buildings amounting to the sum of $255,630,740.

COMMUNICATIONS

The Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending January 30, 1935, reported an increase in postal receipts of $44,062,136.17 over the previous year, giving the Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, a net surplus of $4,964,149.31.

AIR MAIL—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC

The domestic air-mail system has been completely overhauled during this administration; rates reduced from 13 cents to 6 cents per ounce; a new air-mail net work of routes has been established, increasing the air-mail mileage from 25,248 to 29,106 miles. The average rate of pay per mile under the present contract is 30.4 cents, as compared to 42.65 cents per mile prior to the annulling of all contracts in 1934, and 54 cents per mile for 1933.

Real adjustments have been made in the foreign air-mail system saving over $1,000,000 per year in the cost of this service.

POST-OFFICE BUILDINGS

This administration has constructed 797 public buildings badly needed throughout the Nation and out of this program there has been constructed in the thirteenth district the following post-office buildings: Vernon, $50,000; Graham, $61,900; Nocona, $64,000; and Bowie, $53,500.

There has been an appropriation made for the immediate construction of post-office building at Quanah to cost $80,000.

Funds have been allocated and one additional post-office building will be constructed in the thirteenth district as soon as the proper appropriation is made and site determined.

RELIEF ADMINISTRATION

All relief prior to this administration was cared for by State, local, and private agencies. Because of the chaotic condition existing at the beginning of this administration, the demand came in unison from throughout the Nation that relief be administered by the Federal Government. Because of the great emergency existing, first the Civil Works Administration program was begun to put more men to work. Last year this method was changed and the Works Progress Administration established.

The total emergency relief expenditures covering State, county, and local needs from July 1, 1933, to December 1, 1935, were $3,607,197,492, while expenditures for the Civil Works Administration were $938,000,000. In January 1935, there were 4,614,965 families on relief. This number was decreased in November 1935, to 2,846,910 families.

The Works Progress Administration, set up May 6, 1935, and designed to give three and one-half million people work, had, on November 30, 1935, put 2,484,000 people to work.

ALIENS ILLEGALLY HERE SHOULD BE STRICKEN FROM RELIEF ROLLS

It was pointed out yesterday in debate the lack of provision in this legislation prohibiting aliens illegally in this country from sharing in this relief money.

I do not know how you feel about it, but personally I feel that aliens in this country illegally shoud not be allowed to share in this money that comes from the American taxpayers.

I feel, as pointed out yesterday, that something like 400,000 aliens on the relief roll being taken care of by the American taxpayers under this program should be allowed to wait until the Americans in this country are taken care of.

Mr. CURLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. For a question.

Mr. CURLEY. Does the gentleman know that there is a bill, introduced on January 29 in my name and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, for that very purpose?

Mr. McFARLANE. I know that the Veterans of Foreign Wars has tried to get the committee to do that, but up to this time they have refused to do it. I trust when that amendment is offered by the gentleman from New York it will be agreed to. I would like to offer the amendment myself. I think many men on the floor of this House feel keenly the need of such an amendment. I think we should unanimously vote for it.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. Yes.

Mr. CURLEY. Does the gentleman know that in a recent investigation in the city of New York, 30,000 aliens were found to be on relief rolls in that city?

Mr. McFARLANE. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. DONDERO. But I understand that all points of order are waived against the bill. How can such an amendment be made germane at this time?

FUNDS FOR P. W. A. PROJECTS

Mr. McFARLANE. We will cross the creek when we reach it. There was a point made last night in the caucus on the proposition of earmarking some of this money for P. W. A., and while it would not be exactly ethical to tell what took place in the caucus, yet gentlemen have read in the morning papers something of what took place.

A point of order was raised to an amendment which I offered earmarking $250,000,000 of this money for worthy P. W. A. projects that both Mr. Hopkins and Mr. Ickes admit would come under this program if we could get the money to put it through, and yet when I offered the amendment, the identical amendment submitted by Mr. BEITER, the only change being that I struck out $700,000,000 and made it $250,000,000, the Chair sustained the point of order that my amendment was not germane. If that is true, then the caucus was not germane, and we who signed the petition to call the caucus are completely out of order.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. Yes; for a question.

Mr. KNUTSON. I take it that it was a typical old-fashioned Democratic caucus.

Mr. McFARLANE. Yes; just like the typical old-fashioned Republican caucus.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield for a question.

Mr. RICH. Much has been said during the past year about spending this money for relief under Mr. Hopkins and that we were not going to do it again this year, yet here comes a bill just like the old one. Why did not the Democratic caucus change it after you talked so much about doing so?

Mr. McFARLANE. The gentleman's question answers itself. I called the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, for instance, to 33 different projects pending in my district, as above pointed out, and my district is not different largely from others. They are worth-while projects that have been approved that are now waiting funds from this legislation for their construction.

The people of my district are greatly interested in seeing that these projects are constructed. I know there is no finer piece of work being done in anybody's district anywhere than has been done under P. W. A. in my district. It is true that we have been slow in getting these projects started. It is true it has taken State legislation practically throughout the Nation. It has been slow all the way up and down the line in getting started under P. W. A., but all of these difficulties have been ironed out, these projects have been approved, they have been raised to their present status where now we are advised they are ready to immediately proceed with the construction of these projects if they are allowed to have funds under this legislation.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. Yes.

Mr. MAY. I believe it is the view of the gentleman from Texas, as it is my view, that if Mr. Ickes were allocated a few of the millions of this appropriation it would go into construction work that would stimulate the major industries of the country and give employment generally over the country to the people in industry as well as on the Government rolls.

Mr. McFARLANE. I think we understand the matter rather thoroughly, and that P. W. A. projects do not necessarily conflict with W. P. A. projects, where the citizens of a community want to put in about half the money that is necessary to build these worth-while projects, that are badly needed by them. It seems to me that we ought to allow them to do that, and in that way we will employ almost as many men under the P. W. A. program as you are employing under the W. P. A. program, with less money, when that is taken into consideration.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. I am sure there are many Members on the floor who are in sympathy with the gentleman in respect to what he says about aliens. I think we all recognize it is a very difficult problem to handle, and what are we going to do with it? If 4 percent of this money goes to aliens, that would mean nearly $280,000,000, or enough money to build the St. Lawrence seaway, which we are spending in that behalf.

Mr. McFARLANE. In answer to the gentleman I would say that the administrative cost of securing this information and stopping payment of these funds to aliens would be very little, because a few questions on the application blank they sign would get the necessary information to eliminate the aliens from the rolls. That is a matter of administration that could be easily worked out.

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

The Works Progress Administration has completed many worth-while projects throughout the Nation. There has been expended under this program in the Thirteenth Congressional District, a total of $10,109,272.42 distributed as follows:

Archer County, $295,594.65; Baylor County, $218,652.62; Clay County, $379,941.42; Cooke County, $338,289.06; Denton County, $503,515.49; Foard County, $186,603.28; Hardeman, $462,623.36; Jack County, $250,852.60; Knox County, $179,338.87; Montague County, $553,945.99; Throckmorton County, $3,536,880.69; Wichita County, $1,206,400.05; Wilbarger County, $647,872.67; Wise County, $533,376.10, and Young County, $815,385.58.

SPECIAL PROGRAMS

In addition to the program of direct-work relief the Government has sponsored other special programs for relief from destitution as follows:

Transient program.

This division was set up to care for the destitute transient population and has cared for more than 300,000 destitutes in nonurban camps.

Self-helping cooperatives.

These organizations were the outgrowth of barter associations established by the unemployed themselves as a form of production for use. Through this program 100,000 persons were cared for.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION

Under this program 933,189 pupils were cared for at a cost of $48,866,067. Under this program there has been expended in the Thirteenth Congressional District in Texas a total of $108,603 as follows:

Archer County, $503; Baylor County, $694; Clay County, $914; Cooke County, $4,483; Denton County, $54,752; Foard County, $2,102; Hardeman County, $2,766; Jack County, $564; Knox County, $981; Montague County, $2,050; Throckmorton County, $968; Wichita County, $23,772; Wilbarger County, $6,828; Wise County, $3,947; and Young County, $3,339.

In conclusion let me point out that this bill carries an appropriation of $2,364,229,712.53 principally to be expended for work relief. I have briefly called to your attention some of the many benefits brought about as a result of the legislative program worked out under this administration. I have gladly cooperated with the President and have voted for the program in its entirety as above set out.

COMMITTEE WORK

I have been active in my different committee assignments and have offered constructive suggestions whenever possible. For example as a member of the Naval Aircraft Investigating Committee, under permission of the President I inspected all the income-tax returns of the corporations selling the Navy equipment, and upon disclosures I made, I offered legislation to abolish the right of corporations to file consolidated income-tax returns (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 6280–84, 73d Cong., 2d sess.). Senators NORRIS and BORAH used these facts I had thus disclosed in debating this matter in the Senate (see pp. 6409, 6466, 6559, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 73d Cong., 2d sess.) and the right to file consolidated returns was eliminated, thus saving the taxpayers about $300,000,000 a year as the records show:

Corporate returns

1934	$321,456,000
1935	465,370,000
1936 (estimated)	615,000,000

In addition to this, I have been active working and trying to not only stop some of the many leaks in our income-tax laws, but have tried to limit the profits of the war-materials manufacturers and to enact legislation that will keep them from annually "raiding the Treasury." I wish I had the time to cover these different subjects. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE] has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to discuss this legislation, but it seems to me it is so fraught with danger to the future of this Nation that I would be lacking in my duty to my constituents if I did not address the House at least briefly on the subject.

This bill is another fatal delegation of the public purse to the Executive. Since these delegations began, and including this measure, the Congress will have handed over to the Executive $11,732,000,000. There is no parallel to this performance since the birth of parliamentary government. The present-day records of Italy or Germany show no such delegation of power. I make the definite statement now—and it is made without fear of successful, honest contradiction—that at least $6,000,000,000 of that money has been wasted and every cent of it has been colored with Democratic politics. All of it is now a charge upon the people of the United States and must be subsequently paid in taxes. Never have there been such indecent raids on the Treasury.

For example, take the State of Mississippi. Our good friend from that State [Mr. DOXEY] presented a very full and complete statement of what Mississippi had received since the beginning of this administration. According to his figures, Mississippi has received some $260,784,000. Mississippi has paid in Federal taxes during that period approximately $7,500,000. Much of that money was used for extraordinary, boondoggling activities and is completely wasted both to the Nation and, indeed, to that State. Yet Mississippi, according to Mr. DOXEY, is not satisfied, for, like Oliver Twist, "it is asking for more."

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. No. I am sorry; I cannot yield.

One phase of that Mississippi expenditure was discussed in an article in Labor several weeks ago. Under the urge of various chambers of commerce in the State of Mississippi, certain vocational schools were constructed by the Government. They were constructed as vocational schools, but they were in truth textile factories, and were built as such. Upon those so-called vocational schools, which represent a disbursement of approximately $100,000, it was the definite intention to use the money and credit of the Northern States, or the States that are at least solvent with respect to the Treasury, to create industries and then steal, bodily, from the industrial States their going industries. That is not all. They made a contract, if you please, with a penal or reform institution in the State of Oklahoma, and they are going to import as help the "ladies" from this penal institution, under probation, into the State of Mississippi to compete with the free labor of the industrial States.

This administration is a continuing threat to going industry. Here is an example:

Agents from the T. V. A. area have gone into my State and have told industry there if they did not move down to the T. V. A. area they would begin to manufacture at Muscle Shoals the particular product made by them. It is such delegations of power as are proposed here today that makes such conditions possible. How long can this sort of thing continue and the present industrial States, which are paying the shot, retain their self-respect as members of this Union of States?

In this discussion attention has been called to the fact that some States have paid only 1 or 2 percent of their own relief. What a shameful situation that is! What a terrible reflection upon those areas which have not enough civic character and vitality to—at least in part—take care of their own. Where is their vaunted manhood gone? Their role is parasitic. They are without shame. They are intent only upon raiding the Federal Treasury to which they contribute nothing. They are heading the Federal Treasury into bankruptcy, the country into inflation, while they themselves are losing the manhood and character which was once the birthright of every American community.

How has this situation come about? Why have heretofore splendid Americans whose communities were formerly self-sustaining come to be almost a complete charge upon the Federal Treasury? I can tell you where, in my judgment, the fault lies. The President, while ostensibly delegating this authority to Mr. Hopkins, is himself the man behind the gun. The only one he listens to in this connection is "Field Marshal" Farley. This genial gentleman, trained in the Tammany school of politics, has no illusions about the political value of jobs or the use of money in politics. Farley tells Hopkins where the money shall go. He tells Hopkins when the money shall go to a particular area. General Farley is an astute politician. One of his principles is that political parties, like armies, travel on their bellies. It is the intention of Farley to let loose this $2,000,000,000 at election time in an endeavor to buy the election. Farley is true to his instincts when he does this, but it is a shameless thing, especially when done in the name of suffering humanity. I do not believe that this Republic can survive such procedure. If this plan of debauchery is successful, it will leave a stain on the heart and consciences of the American people which would unfit them for future participation in free institutions. My belief is that this procedure paves the way to fascism, where there is no personal liberty and where there will be no legislative branch of government. Such will be the fate of America if this procedure is successful. If Farley can buy the election with money taken under fraudulent pretenses from the Treasury, this Republic is at the end of its rope.

No man in this House is concerned about the welfare of unemployed more than I am. But to use their unhappy condition to reelect the present occupant of the White House is, to my mind, the depth of governmental depravity.

I listened carefully to the words of the distinguished and able gentleman from Virginia, the acting chairman of this committee. I have the greatest respect for him as a Member of the House. I do not agree with him, however, that this money is not to be used for political purposes. The fact is, and I repeat it, that it is the intention of the President and "Field Marshal" Farley to turn over this present appropriation and the billion dollars that are yet in the Treasury for political purposes, extracting only a modicum for relief. It is to be turned over to "Field Marshal" Farley to be used in the doubtful States to carry the election this fall.

In conclusion, I wish to emphasize with all the earnestness that I possess that these billions are not the President's and title to these funds does not go to the Democratic Party. It is not a fund to be used to continue his party in power. These moneys are a sacred trust. This vast sum and the national credit on which it is based was created by the past and present generation of toilers out of their blood and sweat. Theoretically at least it is dedicated to the cause of humanity. The situation calls for the best brains, the largest experience, and the highest idealism possible. The preservation of this Republic is more important than the election of either a Republican or Democratic President, but if politics are to dictate the disposal of this fund and chaos ensues, the blood is properly on the head of this Congress, which in an hour fraught with evil destiny ignores and basely surrenders to the Executive its manifest constitutional power.

Despite this threat against the life of the Republic I have faith in the American people provided they can be aroused to the dangers that confront the Nation. I hope and pray that every real American—North, South, East, and West—will participate actively in the November campaign and drive these raw deal money changers out of the temple of the Republic. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the chairman of the committee [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish it had been such that I could have gone into this bill fully and discussed it from beginning to end. I have had to save myself on this bill a little bit. As you have probably heard, I was confined to the hospital for 6 weeks, under orders of the doctor. When I was discharged I had to commence hearings on this bill almost immediately. I conducted them as rapidly and completely as possible. As a result we have approximately 2,000 pages of hearings for you to read in order to get a clear understanding of it.

I am under instructions from the doctors to work not over a certain number of hours a day. I am trying to comply with those instructions, but it is impossible.

My colleague, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], has been kind enough to volunteer to sit throughout the hearings of the subcommittee, to assist in conducting the examination, and to assist in conducting this bill through the House. I appreciate it. He has done it in an able manner and I desire to compliment him on it.

I shall now discuss for a few minutes some of the important items in the bill. He has already told you we reduced the bill over $23,000,000.

You have heard a little discussion of the P. W. A. and W. P. A. I am going to show you now why we have brought all this money to be expended by the Works Progress Administration; and let me state to start with that I have nothing in the world against P. W. A. I think a great deal of the Administrator—the Secretary of the Interior. During the first part of his administration I did not understand him. After holding hearings last year and hearing him I felt the Secretary of the Interior was in every respect an honest man [applause]; and that is what we want in the Government service.

Mr. Chairman, our purpose is to put the destitute unemployed to work, to give them employment, to give them something by which they may earn a living for themselves and those dependent on them. It is our purpose to put only those to work who are in actual need, to feed the hungry, and to clothe the naked. This bill, therefore, is centered largely around the purpose of relieving distress.

My friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], and he is my friend, and he is a good economist, he makes a good member of the Appropriations Committee, was out interviewing reporters this morning, saying we had appropriated $11,000,000,000 in round figures for relief. He did not tell that a large part of our relief outlay is loaned money. Yes; we have appropriated a lot for relief and recovery. I am proud of it, because it fed the hungry and clothed the naked, saved farms, homes, railroads, banks, and so forth. I am proud of it because it places our great President as the greatest humanitarian in the world today. [Applause.]

Let us get down to the subject of the bill, however. I want to give some data as of March 28, 1936. All told, on that date, 3,763,334 were employed as the result of our big appropriation last year. Works Progress employed 2,884,161; Civilian Conservation Corps, 433,770; Public Works Administration, 77,464; all other Federal agencies, 367,939.

As for allotments of money by that date from that big appropriation, Works Progress had been allotted $1,300,000,000; the Civilian Conservation Corps had been allotted $526,500,000; Public Works Administration, $447,500,000; all other Federal agencies, $896,000,000. Thus, Works Progress, having been allotted 41 percent of all allotments made up to that time, had employed 76 percent of all who were employed. Civilian Conservation Corps, having been allotted 17 percent of all the allotments, had employed only 12 percent of all those employed. Public Works Administration had been allotted 14 percent of all allotments and employed only 2 percent of those who were employed. All other Federal agencies, having been allotted 28 percent of all allotments, employed only 10 percent of those who were employed. Just think of it! Works Progress allotted 41 percent and employed 76 percent of all those employed.

I listened with interest to my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCFARLANE] talking about the Public Works Administration and giving them money. Let me read you some figures: At the beginning of the fiscal year 1936—that is this year—P. W. A. had unexpended balances of about $450,000,000. When we passed the big appropriation of $4,880,000,000, Public Works received an additional allotment of $450,000,000, making a total of $900,000,000. It is estimated that when the end of this fiscal year comes only $150,000,000 will have been paid out, leaving for actual expenditure by P. W. A. in the next fiscal year $750,000,000. In addition to that this bill and other bills passed by this Congress carried $400,000,000 for heavy industry construction. These two sums, $400,000,000 and $750,000,000, gives to the heavy industry construction of the United States $1,150,000,000 for expenditure next year; yet we hear complaints about not being fair to heavy industry.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Can the chairman tell us how much money remains available to the Secretary of the Interior as Administrator of the Public Works Administration?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is now estimated that $750,000,000 will remain unexpended on July 1 next.

Mr. MAY. That is from previous appropriations?

Mr. BUCHANAN. From the previous appropriation.

Mr. MAY. Does he get anything at all under the pending bill?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No.

Mr. MAY. I think $750,000,000 is a pretty good allowance.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Not only that, he is authorized by law to sell the securities he takes from the cities and this constitutes a revolving fund with which he can operate.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I note that the bill, on page 21, appropriates for the Works Progress Administration $1,425,000,000; that it allocates these funds, in a way, to different things and at the end contains the proviso that 15 percent of these allocations may be transferred from time to time to other classes. Under this provision would the Works Progress Administrator be allowed or authorized to transfer funds from his work to the Ickes outfit?

Mr. BUCHANAN. He would not be.

Mr. MAY. He would be confined to transferring from one of his own activities to another of his own activities?

Mr. BUCHANAN. We went into that question very carefully, drew the bill very carefully, and had a consultation with the Comptroller General's office. This I did myself; and I can assure this House, I want the Members to understand it, because they must not be mislead, that every bit of this money must be spent under the guidance and direction of the Works Progress Administrator.

He may adopt a project from the P. W. A. as his own project and put men to work on it. He may adopt a project of Tugwell's and put men to work on it, but not a cent of money may be transferred to either one.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The sum of $750,000,000 for the Public Works Administration is still available to its credit. Is it the contention that all of that money has been pledged or allocated?

Mr. BUCHANAN. All of it has been allocated because the President has taken all the unobligated money and the balances of other appropriations in order to give W. P. A. enough to continue giving work to the unemployed the balance of the present fiscal year.

Mr. BANKHEAD. So that the P. W. A. has no fund still available for other projects?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No. The only other funds involved may be in the sale of some securities.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But under the proposal that has been made it is expected that funds of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may be available for public-works projects?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Certainly, if the Congress and the President adopt that as a policy. In my judgment, and it is a deliberate judgment, and a judgment formed from a full investigation of the facts, that in view of the recovery that has taken place in the country the time must soon come when we must stop lending so much money and spending so much money. [Applause.] That is where I am going to stand from this Congress on, and that is where I have stood during the present Congress.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KVALE. I want to commend the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee for giving of his energy that he should spare, but I want to ask just one question in all seriousness.

I have in mind certain projects throughout the Middle West that have been held up, delayed, retarded, withheld because an administrative ruling was made that they had to be completed within the present fiscal year before they could be approved.

Has the Committee on Appropriations in its further grant of funds given any consideration to such administrative limitations upon funds or projects? I should like to have a little statement in the RECORD from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations upon that particular point because it is of great interest to myself and to the people I represent.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The committee gave no consideration to administrative provisions, restrictions, or rules governing the expenditure of this money. We felt that was an executive function and could be better dealt with and that the rules and regulations could be better prescribed by those who had charge of the spending of the money and knew more of the details of the projects than we did.

Mr. KVALE. Just one further question: Does the gentleman think that the administrative branch of the Government should be given full authority to withhold approval of projects simply because they cannot be completed within the particular fiscal year the plan contemplates?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think so, and I will tell the gentleman why. I do not personally endorse the administration's expending emergency funds for projects that may take 10 years to finish or 5 years to finish, and which might involve the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. KVALE. The projects I had in mind would be completed at the most in 2 years but could not have been completed within the present fiscal year.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Oh, I do not think it should cover any project that may take 18 or 20 months to finish.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I am interested in one other matter, and the chairman of the Appropriations Committee has been very liberal in giving information. The gentleman will remember that at the beginning of this session a question arose in connection with another appropriation bill with regard to certain projects that had been authorized without the consent of the Congress. These projects were suspended by the Appropriations Committee, and will remain in suspension unless authorized in the future by the Congress. Is there anything in this legislation that prohibits or prevents the selection of new projects not authorized or contemplated by the Congress, either by the President or the Works Progress Administrator or the Public Works Administration?

Mr. BUCHANAN. There is nothing except as appears on the face of the bill where the projects have been enumerated.

Mr. MAVERICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MAVERICK. No provision was made in the original bill last year covering confirmation by the Senate of the State administrators. In the bill brought in this year I notice there is provision for confirmation by the Senate. Of course, that was in the bill last year when it came back from conference, but I am talking about the original bill. If we delegate to the Senate the confirmation of these officials, is it not turning over a power to them and making more or less a doormat of us?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; but that was in the bill last year and we carried it forward in this bill. There was a serious controversy over that matter, and we did not want to have this held up in conference this year.

Mr. MAVERICK. We are delegating a power to the Senate which we are not required to do legally?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MAVERICK. I think it is a bad policy. We unnecessarily let the Senate have superior powers.

Mr. CROWE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CROWE. What assurance have we of getting money from the R. F. C. for P. W. A. projects? They are pretty hard to get money out of. What assurance will there be?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I agree with the gentleman they are very hard to get money out of, and I further contend that they ought to be hard to get money out of. The country is recovering and will continue to recover. As it recovers, we must stop these tremendous expenditures. That is what I meant awhile ago when I said I was opposed to certain things.

Mr. CROWE. But some of these projects are good projects. What assurance have we that there will be help coming from the R. F. C.?

Mr. BUCHANAN. There is no assurance the R. F. C. will approve the projects. They are pretty hard to get approval from, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, there is another question I want to discuss before concluding. I direct attention to page 99 of the bill to the section known as no. 7, which contains the following language:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of law, none of the establishments or agencies named in subsection (b) of this section, shall after June 30, 1937, incur any obligations for administrative expenses, except pursuant to an annual appropriation specifically therefor by Congress.

[Applause.]

The section goes on to name 13 so-called independent agencies, 13 agencies that have been granted a revolving fund, 13 agencies about whose operation and handling of public funds this Congress knows nothing. No regular committee of the House is called upon to investigate them. Of course, we could order a special investigation, but, God knows, I am sick of special investigations. This provision brings them within the jurisdiction of the Congress and makes them come to Congress with regular estimates and ask for the money necessary to administer their respective corporations or organizations.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Are they likewise required to come under the supervision and audit of the Comptroller General?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Some of them are.

Mr. MAY. Does not the gentleman think they should be?

Mr. BUCHANAN. When they come to the Congress to get their money they will be.

Mr. MAY. Why not restrict them by some such method now?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman need not be uneasy about that. When they come here for their appropriations, if they are not under the Comptroller General, the Committee will put them under him, because we believe in that system. We believe in every account being audited and we insist upon them being honest. I do not charge that any of them are dishonest, but I believe some of them are getting too much salary; I believe some of them have too many employees, and I do contend that they should be restricted to a reasonable and efficient force. Therefore, I am going to ask the Congress to adopt this section.

This is close to my heart because I believe it is essential to good administration and this is the first step with respect to their administrative expenses, including personnel and administration. The second step is to make all the money they receive payable into the Treasury and then if you want to create a special fund, you can do so, but require them to come to Congress for all appropriations, not only for operating expenses, but for their loans, if they are making loans, or doing anything else. Let the representatives of the people know what they are doing, because if we continue in this way we will have a government not by Congress, but a government by corporations, and God forbid we should ever have that. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken or may hereafter speak on the bill may have permission to revise and extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER].

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein quotations from various records.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

THE STATE OF MAINE

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise primarily for the purpose of defending the State of Maine, much as I should like to indulge in a discussion of the philosophy of relief, and to present to the committee the very persuasive reasons why I believe we should adopt as a policy in extending relief the principle enunciated in the Democratic national platform of 4 years ago, the wisdom of which I have, through the sad experiences of the past 3 years, come fully to perceive. That platform declared for extension of aid by the Federal Government to the States and through them to be administered.

The State of Maine has been rather a football of politics as the only State with an early election, and a great deal of attention, therefore has been directed to its affairs. It has also served as what was conceived to be a horrible example of State administration, as a result of the indictment of the administrator selected in the State of Maine and of 15 of his more responsible associates. One has already been convicted and the rest are still under indictment, and an administrator has been appointed by Mr. Hopkins, who is now carrying on in rather glittering contrast to the previous administration. It has been urged that this establishes that Federal is far better than State administration of these affairs. Considerable attention was directed to this situation in the State of Maine in the questioning of Mr. Harry Hopkins before the subcommittee considering this resolution.

As one with executive experience in Maine, and a proper pride in its traditions, I should wish it to be clear that the administration which preceded the present one in Maine of the F. E. R. A. and the E. R. A., was not a State administration.

NO MAN'S LAND

In the first place, it is a matter of controversy even in the courts, as the Governor of Maine has testified before the court where these men were indicted that they were not State officials. Mr. Hopkins, meanwhile, has testified before a committee of the House that they were not Federal officials and were not appointed by him. The result is that they are left in a no man's land, apparently, responsible and accountable to no one. Hon. William R. Pattangall, until recently chief justice of our State, has suggested that the only mistake they made was in not taking all the funds that were intrusted to their care instead of permitting some of these funds to reach needy citizens of Maine.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. For a question; yes.

Mr. MORAN. I just want to ask a question to make it clear, so there will be no confusion in the minds of your constituents and mine and all the people of Maine. The charges the gentleman is now making are against the defunct Maine Emergency Relief Administration, and not against the Works Progress Administration?

Mr. BREWSTER. That is correct.

Mr. MORAN. And has the gentleman any criticism of the management, honesty, or integrity of the present Works Progress administrator, Albert Abrahamson, of Maine?

Mr. BREWSTER. I have not. It is being most admirably carried on. The former E. R. A. administration in Maine, however, was not selected by the executive authority of the State, as in the State of Maine the Governor and the executive council possess the full executive power. There are only two other States with similar machinery of administration.

It has been stated by students of government that we have eight governors in Maine, instead of one. The Executive Council of Maine is entirely Republican and the Governor is a Democrat.

Whatever may be thought about the controversy between Mr. Hopkins and Governor Brann as to the responsibility for the selection of the E. R. A. administrator, there is not a suggestion anywhere that the Executive Council of Maine, which was entirely Republican, was ever consulted or considered in any way. If the money had been turned over to the State of Maine for administration, as proposed by the minority, the Executive Council of the State of Maine would necessarily have been consulted in the selection of the E. R. A. administrator. In that event it is my firm conviction, from 4 years of executive experience in Maine, that no such wholesale indictment of an administration would have been required.

I am a good enough Jeffersonian Democrat to want to return the responsibilities of our Government, in accordance with our Democratic traditions, more nearly to the people. The more quickly that is done the more quickly we shall solve the problems with which we are faced. [Applause.]

The following excerpts from the record of the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations will indicate the basis for this discussion:

INVESTIGATION OF CHARGES OF IRREGULARITIES IN EXPENDITURE OF RELIEF MONEY IN THE STATE OF MAINE

Mr. BACON. I want to refer now to a particular State: I understand that you made an investigation in a State as to the way these funds were spent. I refer to the State of Maine. In July the Governor of Maine announced in the papers that he had been allocated $1,000,000. That was correct, because it appears that on July 17, 1934, he got $638,400, and on September 4, 1934, he got $429,779, or a total of over $1,000,000. Now, who appointed the administrators of that F. E. R. A. money that was given to the Governor of Maine?

Mr. HOPKINS. I am not quite sure whether there was a board in Maine appointed by the Governor.

The CHAIRMAN. I think it was a board.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir; but I am not quite sure.

Mr. BACON. You did not appoint either the board or the administrator?

Mr. HOPKINS. No, sir; there was no Federal relief appointee in the State of Maine.

Mr. BACON. Then, whether it was a board or an administrator, the appointment was made by the Governor.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAYLOR. They were local people of that State?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. What I am getting at is the check-up you made as to this money that is allotted to the States. In the case of the State of Maine, the man who administered that money, John McDonough, was indicted, and his assistant, Martin, was indicted and is now serving time. You made an investigation of that whole situation?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. And you had a report.

Mr. HOPKINS. Charges were made of irregularities, and, according to our regular practice, when irregularities are charged, we made an investigation of the charges. Then, in the event there are irregularities established in the expenditure of the funds, we turn that information over to the local prosecuting officer. There was no Federal man involved in it.

In view of the fact that Federal funds had been granted to all States, we made an investigation wherever there were irregularities charged in the expenditure of relief money. We took the position that even though the funds legally became State funds once they were granted to the Governor, we still had a responsibility in seeing that the expenditures were made properly. We have always felt that we should investigate all charges.

Mr. BACON. That is what I wanted to bring out—that you do carefully investigate charges of irregularities in the handling of these funds.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. That is the only object of the questions I have asked with regard to the State of Maine, because I was informed that you made a very thorough investigation of those charges. I think it would be useful to us if you could furnish a copy of the report of that investigation as an example of how you check up on F. E. R. A. funds in the States where irregularities have been shown to exist.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is a confidential document that was turned over to the district attorney in the county where the irregularities took place. The indictments that resulted, or some of them, are still subject to trial.

Mr. BACON. In that case I do not want to press the inquiry. When Mr. McDonough was removed you sent an acting administrator up there to take charge of the situation—Paul Edwards?

Mr. HOPKINS. No——

Mr. BACON. How did he get there?

Mr. HOPKINS. He was given by the Governor a letter of appointment as acting administrator. Edwards was our field man who audited the accounts. He was made acting administrator by the Governor, not by me, because I would have no power to appoint an acting administrator.

Under W. P. A. these appointments are Federal appointments. Mr. Abramson was appointed W. P. A. administrator in Maine.

Mr. BACON. The reason I asked that question is that a number of citizens of Maine wrote to Members of Congress from Maine regarding the status of the Maine Coast Fisheries, Inc., who apparently were receiving a large amount of Federal funds.

Mr. HOPKINS. That was part of our investigation in this case.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Edwards wrote to Congressman Brewster, of Maine, and said:

"The Maine Coast Fisheries, Inc., is an independent cooperative and is not subject to the jurisdiction of this administration. In the past it has received unsecured loans from the Fishermen's Relief Corporation, a charitable organization formerly maintained by means of earmarked grants from the Federal Emergency Relief Administration. I am unable to state at this time just how much is owing the Fishermen's Relief Corporation from the Maine Coast Fisheries, as neither of these corporations is subject to supervision of the Federal or Maine Emergency Relief Administrations.

"For details regarding the financial status of the Maine Coast Fisheries I would have to refer you to the Governor or Rufus H. Stone, executive director of the Maine Coast Fisheries."

Mr. HOPKINS. I think Mr. Edwards is partly in error since previous to Edwards appointment, the former administrator, Mr. McDonough, and his assistant, Mr. Salter, had been directors of these corporations and could control their policies since they could always refuse to grant further funds to them. However, there has been no direct legal control over the corporations by the relief administration, although we have had access to their accounts and books.

Mr. BACON. And you have access to the books of the Maine relief administration, and in your investigation you investigated this, among other situations?

Mr. HOPKINS. That was investigated thoroughly, and is part of this same case.

Mr. BACON. I brought this question up just to bring out the extent of the investigation of the handling by the States of some of this F. E. R. A. money.

Now, in connection with W. P. A., you have a closer control over it, and it is all handled from your office; that is, from the 1st of December it is a Federal proposition entirely?

Mr. HOPKINS. The W. P. A. has been a Federal enterprise from the beginning, and each W. P. A. administrator is a Federal appointee.

Mr. BACON. So that from now on you will have complete control of these funds and the auditing of them, and you do not rely on any State official?

Mr. HOPKINS. The Treasury handles our accounts, and the Procurement Division of the Treasury procures all our supplies.

Mr. BACON. I brought this Maine question up in order to get in my mind clearly the difference between F. E. R. A., and how it worked, and the new set-up of the W. P. A.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MORAN].

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, my colleague from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] has just called to the attention of the House the charges of graft and incompetence which have been made publicly against the Maine Emergency Relief Administration—known as the Maine E. R. A.—and which have resulted in several indictments, with one conviction so far, and the other cases still to be acted upon. In reply, let me say that I do not intend to stultify myself, on the floor of the United States House of Representatives or anywhere else, by condoning wrong-doing by public officials. But, I do intend to draw a few distinctions in order that the matter may be clarified.

First, let me point out that the criticism of my colleague [Mr. BREWSTER] was directed to the Maine E. R. A.; he frankly so stated when he courteously yielded to me a few minutes ago in answer to my specific inquiry on that exact point. The Maine E. R. A. no longer exists; his criticism therefore is directed against an organization that is dead and gone. This in no wise answers his criticisms against that organization, but this is a fact which should be understood. The real point is that his criticism lies against an organization that formerly existed in the State of Maine, and the persons indicted were not appointed by Mr. Harry Hopkins.

Second, I call attention to the fact that the criticism of my colleague [Mr. BREWSTER] was not directed against the present Federal organization for administering relief in Maine, namely, the Works Progress Administration. The record will show that when my colleague kindly yielded to me a few minutes ago, I propounded that precise inquiry, and he frankly replied that he had no criticism whatever to offer against the present Works Progress Administration organization in Maine, and no criticism concerning the ability, integrity, honesty, efficiency, and management of that organization by the present Maine State administrator, Albert Abrahamson.

Third, the industry of my colleague [Mr. BREWSTER] in ascertaining the facts concerning the now defunct Maine E. R. A. has doubtless caused him to ascertain another interesting fact—the part played by Works Progress Administrator Harry Hopkins. I am confident that he is aware of the uncontrovertible fact that when the alleged wrongdoings were called to the attention of Administrator Hopkins, that he took the position that although the Maine E. R. A. was a State and not a Federal Government organization, that Federal funds granted to that State organization were involved, and therefore required his attention. Mr. Hopkins acted without fear or favor, energetically and promptly, and the evidence now before the Maine courts was obtained and presented to the Maine county attorneys having jurisdiction, by agents of Mr. Hopkins, at his direction. In addition, he forced the immediate removal of officials subsequently indicted. Here is a specific case where Mr. Hopkins practiced what he preaches; he is determined to have honest and efficient administration of relief; he will move heaven and earth to attain that ideal, and his action in the Maine situation so demonstrates. His record in the Maine situation is clear and not criticized by anybody. It will be noted that my colleague [Mr. BREWSTER] did not in any way criticize Mr. Harry Hopkins. Personally, I have no patience whatever with the current criticism of Harry Hopkins. He is an able, honest, and conscientious individual and public official; he assumed responsibility for a program that no human being could possibly administer without some mistakes and much criticism, and has done a marvelous piece of work. Our citizens on relief have every reason to be thankful that relief is administered by a man of such great ability and human sympathy and understanding as Harry Hopkins. Harry Hopkins is the kind of a man sorely needed in the public service of America.

Fourth. It is a source of real personal pleasure to me to have my colleague [Mr. BREWSTER] freely grant that he has no criticism to offer concerning the Maine Works Progress administrator, Albert Abrahamson. Mr. Abrahamson has performed a difficult task amazingly well. As one specific instance of Mr. Abrahamson's efficiency, he was given money enough to put 9,000 persons to work, and he put 12,000 to work with that same amount of money. No charge of incompetence, no assertion of graft, no breath of scandal, has touched his organization. Maine Republican newspapers specifically except the Maine W. P. A. when they make charges of boondoggling or inefficiencies against the New Deal. I do not know anything about the W. P. A. in other States, but I am informed concerning the W. P. A. in Maine. On the basis of that information I make the flat statement that no one in this House of Representatives, no one in the United States Senate, no informed person of responsibility in Maine has made, or can make, a single charge of incompetence, graft, or boondoggling against the Maine Works Progress Administration under the splendid administration of Albert Abrahamson.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORAN. I am glad to yield to my distinguished friend from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. One of the Works Progress projects for Maine involves the disbursement of $7,000,000 for the elimination of mosquitoes. Are there mosquitoes in Maine?

Mr. MORAN. I will tell the gentleman there is no project of $7,000,000 for mosquito elimination in Maine.

Mr. CULKIN. Is the gentleman sure of that?

Mr. MORAN. I am positive of that.

Mr. CULKIN. I understand there is.

Mr. MORAN. Let me state to the gentleman this fact, which may have caused his misunderstanding. Due to the efficiency of our State W. P. A. administrator, he has prepared and sent to Washington projects presented by local officials totaling over $125,000,000. Only $2,600,000 was originally allocated to Maine, a sum later raised to $3,600,000. The State administrator selected out of the total list of projects the comparatively few which he could undertake with the money allocated to Maine. Obviously, therefore, with only $3,600,000 to spend on all projects all over Maine, he has not selected and will not select any single $7,000,000 project.

Mr. KVALE. Is it not true that the mosquito season ends concurrently with the end of the fiscal year in Maine?

Mr. MORAN. I am bragging, and justifiably so, about the Maine Works Progress Administration, but I do not want to brag about mosquitoes in Maine.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 minutes more.

Mr. MORAN. I have studied carefully the Maine Works Progress Administration and its projects; I spent my summer doing it. Of course, I do not know about every project that has been presented in Maine, but I do know about projects in operation all over the State, and I do not know of a single boondoggling project. I have repeatedly invited critics to name a single project of that character in Maine, and the invitation has not yet been accepted, which emphasizes the fact that we have an honest and efficient Works Progress Administration in Maine.

The objective of the Maine W. P. A. has been to render relief, but not all the relief needed. After all, this relief responsibility rests first on the local community, second on the State, and last on the Federal Government. This is the answer to the charge, based on misunderstanding, that the W. P. A. is not providing jobs for everybody who needs a job. Certainly it is not, and it should not; it is not the responsibility of the Federal Government to carry the whole load. To be specific, the Maine E. R. A. reported that there were 22,000 persons on relief in Maine. The Federal Government has undertaken to provide jobs for about 20,000 of that 22,000; certainly a fair and generous share of the burden for the Federal Government to assume. It is up to the local communities and the State, and private business, to do their share in shouldering this burden. With the immense sums now spent by the Federal Government to carry its share of the relief burden, which sums are severely criticized, certainly no one could expect the Federal Government to do more than it is now doing at consequent increased cost.

Our Republican friends offer the dole as an alternative. Three years ago they opposed the dole. They criticize the W. P. A. because it does not provide jobs for everybody who needs a job, but inconsistently criticize the cost of the present program, the cost of which would be immeasurably increased if jobs were provided for everybody by the Federal Government. Instead of increasing the Federal relief program we must retrench, but not at the expense of human suffering. The Federal Government must continue financial assistance as long as the local communities and States cannot handle the problem; we cannot allow people to starve. I know that Maine communities greatly need the W. P. A. aid they are receiving. I do not know what they could do without it. They could not meet their relief problem today without the aid of the W. P. A., and they know it. Maine communities should and do appreciate the Federal aid extended by the W. P. A. and know that aid is rendered honestly and efficiently.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I want to pay a very sincere tribute to the splendid work which the chairman of my committee, Mr. BUCHANAN, has done this year under great physical difficulties. In the early part of the session, as we all know, he was seriously sick. Therefore he has been under a tremendous strain in the past 6 weeks, holding hearings on this important bill. In spite of the strain he has always been courteous and fair, and I am very glad, indeed, to serve under such a fine man as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

ALIENS ILLEGALLY IN THE UNITED STATES

I want to discuss today some amendments that I will offer to the bill when it is read under the 5-minute rule. The gentleman from Texas, Mr. BLANTON, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. MCFARLANE, made reference in their talks yesterday and today to the effect that I would offer an amendment that would prevent aliens illegally here, who are subject to deportation, from being benefited by Federal funds to the detriment of American citizens, and aliens who are here legally. The amendment is germane. I will read it for the information of the Committee:

On page 99, after the section ending on line 3, insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. 7. No part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be paid on account of any wage or salary to any alien within the continental limits of the United States, who is not in possession of valid evidence of legal admission to the United States."

That amendment has the approval of many patriotic societies and veterans' organizations.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks a letter from the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS,
Washington, D. C., May 7, 1936.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Federal funds should in no event be used to give Federal employment to aliens who are illegally in this country.

If Federal funds are insufficient—as they have been—to furnish employment to all unemployed residents, then such Federal employment as is available should preferably be furnished, (1) to American citizens and to those aliens who are now legally on their way to citizenship; and only after that (2) to those legally entered aliens who have failed to take out their first citizenship papers.

This limitation and preference as to Federal employment could be assured by an amendment to the deficiency appropriations bill now being considered in the House today, as follows:

"No part of any appropriation contained in this act shall knowingly be paid on account of any wage or salary—

"(1) To any alien, within the continental limits of the United States, who is not in possession of valid evidence of legal admission into the United States.

"(2) To any person, within the continental limits of the United States, who is not a citizen of the United States, or who, prior to the approval of this act by the President, does not possess a valid declaration of intention to become a citizen, except when no qualified person, as above defined, is available for any of the employment made possible under the provisions of this act.

"Provided, however, That this paragraph shall not become operative until 60 days after the approval of this act by the President."

Such a limitation and classification would soon become self-policing, self-enforcing. Local cititzens would see to that. Therefore, to interpose the possible objection that such an amendment would necessitate any extra administration expense is not valid. Such a limitation would cause a saving to the Federal Government directly and indirectly, and would automatically help in the enforcement of other Federal laws. Please refer to page 1217 of hearings on deficiency appropriations.

We have bipartisan assurance that such an amendment will be offered from the floor of the House. Can anyone question its desirability and fairness? We earnestly hope that you will vote for such a limitation clause on this and on all other Federal appropriation bills.

Respectfully yours,

MILLARD W. RICE,
Legislative Representative.

Mr. BACON. My suggested amendment has the same general purpose as that suggested by Mr. Rice. I am heartily in favor of this proposal of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. I am afraid, however, that it will be subject to a point of order. I have, therefore, reworded it and changed the language, but not the purpose, so that it will not be subject to a point of order.

Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that this amendment does not affect in anyway an American citizen. It does not affect in anyway an alien who is here legally. It only affects and applies to aliens who are here illegally and therefore ineligible to citizenship.

I also want to call your attention to the fact that an alien who has smuggled himself into the United States, under our immigration laws, has committed a felony. I do not believe we want to displace American citizens who cannot obtain work relief, with aliens in this country who are here illegally and who, under the terms of a Federal act, have committed a felony by smuggling themselves into this country.

Mr. Hopkins has testified that if he is granted this $1,425,000,000, only a little over 2,000,000 people will be able to receive work relief and relief under that appropriation. There are many more than 2,000,000 out of work who are in need of employment and who are destitute. This sum is not sufficient to take care of all the needy destitute. That being the case, it seems to me that American citizens and aliens who are here legally should have the first opportunity as against those who are here illegally. One word as to the alien who is here legally and who honestly is taking steps to win citizenship and to become a part of our country—he is in no way hurt by this amendment.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I wish to finish my statement first.

The alien of legal status in this country can easily produce the necessary evidence in four different ways: First, showing his declaration of intention to become a citizen. The minute he takes out his first papers he must show legal entry. The mere possession of his declaration of intention is proof positive that he is here legally; second, he can produce an identification card which has been issued to all aliens since July 1, 1928, and which was given him when he applied for a visa in his native country; third, he can produce a letter from the Department of Labor, through the port of entry where he arrived, and he can obtain this letter without it costing him a cent; fourth, he can produce a certificate of registry, if he has been registered under the act of March 2, 1929. Every alien here legally has at least three of these documents with him, and he can obtain any one of them without any expense whatsoever.

The amendment has been worded so that it is negative limitation. I am assured that it cannot possibly be subject to a point of order.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. BACON. For a brief question; yes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will not the amendment which the gentleman intends to offer be tantamount to an alien registration act, as far as it applies to aliens on relief?

Mr. BACON. I do not think so.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. They will have to give all of these records.

Mr. BACON. An alien here legally carries at least two or three of these documents with him. All he has to do is to show them, and that is the end of it.

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. Gladly.

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman realize that prior to 1906, aliens came in sometimes at the rate of 5,000 a day, so I am told? At that time they did not have to have passports so long as they had the necessary amount of head tax, or whatever it was called, and did not have trachoma. Fulfilling these two conditions, they came in legally and were registered; but their names were very difficult for the clerks to write and they put down names that sounded something like the true names. Those immigrants who have gone back to find records of their legal entry have not been able to find them.

Mr. BACON. Of course, those aliens who came in prior to 1921 have been taken care of by the so-called Registry Act of March 2, 1929. All they have to do if they came in prior to that date is to prove they are people of good moral character. They do not have to prove legal entry. They can pay their head tax and register, and then are eligible for American citizenship. That was the purpose of that act. Now, if these aliens cannot prove they are people of good moral character, I do not think they ought to replace American citizens on the relief rolls.

POLITICS AND RELIEF

Another amendment I propose to offer will attempt to minimize and curtail the opportunities of using these relief funds for political purposes. When Mr. Hopkins was asked for information concerning politics in the administration of the Works Progress Administration he assumed the general attitude that he was not responsible for such circumstances if they existed. He told us that he could not be responsible for what some dumb politician may have done back in the different States. He seemed to feel that he had done his part when he had written to the local administrators informing them that campaign contributions were not to be solicited from employees on work-relief projects. He did not seem to realize that, inasmuch as all officials of the W. P. A. are Federal employees and not State or local employees, he was directly responsible for their actions.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] referred to the poll taken a little over a week ago, and he told us it shows that 76 percent of the American people believe there is politics in relief, that the relief money is being used for political purposes. The former Governor of Pennsylvania, Mr. Pinchot, wrote to the President, and I want to quote from his letter.

> Washington has put in charge of work relief in Pennsylvania an utterly incompetent, political henchman of the notorious spoilsman Guffey. Today men are chosen for work relief on the basis of political advantage. W. P. A. in Pennsylvania, under Guffey's man, Jones, has been degraded into a Democratic pie counter.

Mr. Pinchot summed up this situation by saying:

> Such prostitution of relief to politics is a stench in the nostrils of all decent people.

I do not think anybody will deny this last statement of Governor Pinchot.

I have in front of me a letter distributed from the Democratic campaign headquarters in Erie, Pa.:

> DEAR FRIEND: We understand that you are at present employed under W. P. A. This employment we believe was only made possible through the Democratic Party. We are, therefore, asking you to assist us with a financial contribution. Please call on Ken Thompson, treasurer of the finance committee, Commerce Building, not later than Wednesday of this week. Your cooperation in the matter will be greatly appreciated.
>
> Very truly yours,
> DEMOCRATIC FINANCE COMMITTEE.

I have another letter here from Indiana, Pa. This was written to a woman who was working on relief and was addressed to her at the Community Center Building, Indiana, Pa.—another one from Pennsylvania:

> DEAR MADAM: I am very much surprised that you have not responded to our previous letter requesting your contribution in the amount of $28.08, to Indiana County democratic campaign committee, as I was sure that you appreciated your position to such an extent that you would make this contribution willingly and promptly. I must, however, now advise you that unless your contribution in the above amount is received promptly, it will be necessary to place your name on the list of those who will not be given consideration for any other appointment after the termination of the emergency relief work, which, as you know, will terminate in the near future.
> Please make your check payable to A. Lucile Baun, treasurer, and mail the same to her at 402 Indiana Theater Building, Indiana, Pa.
>
> Yours very truly,
>
> HARRY W. FEE,
> Chairman, Indiana County Democratic Committee.

Outstanding in the exposé are conditions in West Virginia. Out of the mouth of a man elected as a New Dealer comes the following:

> The W. P. A. in West Virginia smells to high heaven, and it is my desire to work to clean up the rottenness that causes the political odor.

Senator HOLT, of West Virginia, who made this statement, adds:

> There is only one way to identify the W. P. A. in West Virginia, and that is to say that it is a horrible mess.
> With thousands begging for an opportunity to work, the big boys at the top sit back and take away money that should go to those at the bottom.
> I charge the W. P. A. in West Virginia with being full of politics, with being extravagant and wasteful, and with a thorough censorship and spy system to prevent any complaints.

And again, Senator HOLT, citing how far the political set-up has gone, said that an administrative assistant to W. P. A. State Administrator McCullough, of West Virginia, sent out the following letter:

I hand you herewith a list of doctors in Ohio County. Kindly separate the Democrats from the Republicans and list them in order of priority, so we may notify our safety foremen and compensation men as to who is eligible to participate in case of injury.

Here is a letter purportedly signed by Charles McDonald, Democratic leader of the fourteenth ward of Philadelphia. It speaks for itself—and in volumes:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., March 14, 1936.

DEAR COMMITTEEMAN: Contact all houses in your division and get the names of all men on relief, also all those holding W. P. A. jobs. Urge them to register Democrat on March 25 or else lose position.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES MCDONALD.

From Missouri comes another sordid tale. The Kansas City Star, reporting registration in Buchanan County, Mo., said:

The Democrats had an efficient, hard-working organization on the job, headed by Fred J. McGinnis, county supervisor of the W. P. A. It was estimated that 3,000 names and changes of address were put on the books today. W. P. A. workers were using more than a hundred motorcars to take registrants to the courthouse, and there were long lines waiting to register all day.

But Mr. Hopkins says there is no politics in W. P. A.

And in Kentucky allotments of Federal relief money were made 10 days before the election of November 5, 1935, in the amount of more than $42,000,000 of W. P. A. and P. W. A. funds, and at the same time unsigned letters were mailed from Washington to voters on relief rolls declaring that—

President Roosevelt, a friend of the poor, provided relief so that those in need would not suffer.

And further—

Won't you help President Roosevelt and yourself by voting for Chandler on the Democratic ticket?

Chandler was the New Deal candidate for Governor.

To remedy this abuse of the proper use of relief funds, which is widely admitted and believed to be true, and which is substantially supported by the above evidence that I have read, I am going to propose two amendments to this bill which read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. BACON: Page 21, line 12, after the word "Administration", strike out the comma and insert in lieu thereof the following: "cooperatively under States and local nonpartisan boards to be appointed by the Governor of, or as may be determined by, each State and Territory, and the personnel thereof to be composed of citizens of the United States residing in the respective areas of administration."

This amendment would provide for the Works Progress Administration to administer cooperatively with State and local boards the moneys appropriated for relief and work relief in this bill.

My second proposal provides:

Amendment proposed by Mr. BACON, page 23, after the paragraph ending on line 9, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"It shall be unlawful for any administrative officer or employee of the Works Progress Administration to influence or attempt to influence, through fear or intimidation, the vote of any person who is an applicant for, or who receives relief or work relief under the provisions of this act, in connection with any election at which Presidential and Vice Presidential electors or a Senator or Representative in, or a Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, Congress are to be voted for. Any such officer or employee who violates or consents to the violation of the provisions of this paragraph shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 1 year, or both."

Those who sincerely believe that politics should be eliminated from relief and that politicians should not use money to relieve distress for political purposes should vote for these two amendments. Let us have a show-down. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PEARSON] such time as he may require.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to direct the attention of the Committee to pages 18, 19, and 20 of the bill now under consideration, said portion of the bill dealing with appropriations for the Tennessee Valley Authority, and to ask your consideration of an amendment which will be proposed to this section by either the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREGORY] or myself.

You will note that the appropriation carried in this bill is for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the original act of 1933 creating the Tennessee Valley Authority, as amended by the act approved during the last session of this Congress, including the continued construction of Norris, Wheeler, Pickwick, Guntersville, and McReynolds Dams; the beginning of construction of Hiwassee, and the continuation of preliminary investigations as to the appropriate location and type of a dam on the lower Tennessee River.

When the Authority was first created, the directors individually and collectively visited the western section of Tennessee through which the lower Tennessee runs and by every act and inference led the people to believe that a dam was to be built on a site at or near what is known as Aurora. Since that time from month to month and year to year the assurances that this dam would be constructed have been continued, and it was not until recent months that it became apparent that the directors were postponing or delaying the construction of this particular dam for some purpose unknown to the people of that section.

It has been conceded from the outset and is still conceded by the Authority and its engineers that a dam on the lower Tennessee is absolutely necessary for a unified system of transportation on the river. In spite of this fact, each year Congress is asked to appropriate funds to begin the construction of other dams and all persuasion to get action on the lower Tennessee seems futile.

What is the reason for the delay, and should Congress acquiesce in it? The reason for the delay is the evident purpose of the directors of the Authority to eventually ask to have the Ohio River placed under its jurisdiction and to construct a dam across both rivers at or near Paducah, Ky., at a cost of approximately $200,000,000. In order to eventually accomplish this objective, the directors apparently are purposely constructing all other alleged necessary dams on the river, putting Aurora Dam at the foot of the list so that at the psychological time this tremendous dam may be constructed and the Aurora project abandoned. This means, if Congress acquiesces in this delay, it will in the not far distant future be asked to make an appropriation for the beginning of this huge and expensive plant, constituting the first step in a far-reaching program on the Ohio River. Should Congress refuse to acquiesce it will mean that the Authority must complete its program on the Tennessee River before branching out into new and expensive fields. In my judgment, its activities should be confined to the Tennessee River until all work thereon has been completed and before permitting the Authority to launch a new "dream program" on some other river.

This conclusion on my part is not prompted by selfish motives. If the Ohio River should be developed and investigation reveals the fact that it is to the interest of the people affected by that river to have it developed, I shall certainly not interpose any objection to such a program, but I am convinced that no such program should be undertaken until the work on the Tennessee has been completed, and Congress should not permit such a thing to be done at this time.

I appeared before the committee in charge of this bill and explained this situation fully, requesting that a specific authorization for the beginning of the work at Aurora or Gilbertsville be carried in this bill, but received no assurance that my suggestion would be acted upon favorably.

About 2 weeks ago the Senators from Kentucky and Tennessee and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREGORY] and myself had a conference with the President about this matter, explaining to him the necessity of beginning construction on a dam on the lower Tennessee at some point deemed sound from an engineering standpoint. I am sure I violate no confidence when I say that the President received our suggestion and request favorably and stated that he had no objection to the bill specifically authorizing the beginning of work on the lower Tennessee Dam, and if necessary, would approve an increase in the allocation of $650,000, which the Committee on Appropriations proposes to use in preliminary surveys.

The amendment which we propose to offer will authorize the beginning of construction work on this dam, and is offered in good faith and will not necessitate an increase in the amount of appropriation now provided in the bill. It will only authorize early action on a project which the directors of the Authority themselves admit must eventually be constructed.

In view of the fact that such action on the part of Congress will forestall and possibly prevent the fantastic and expensive proposal to build a dam costing $200,000,000 across the Ohio and Tennessee Rivers, we feel that the adoption of this amendment will mean the saving of large sums of money to the taxpayers of this country and will be the means of bringing to a final conclusion construction work on the part of the Authority on the one river which it was created to develop. If the amendment is adopted, it will mean that the Authority by legislative enactment must keep its promises and assurances to the people of west Tennessee, and if they will not do that without legislative enactment, I say that it behooves Congress to force compliance by virtue of its affirmative action in this appropriation bill. [Applause.]

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, first I want to congratulate the House on the splendid committee it elected to take charge of appropriation matters. Of course, it has been said that self-praise is malodorous, but I am speaking of the committee membership outside of the present speaker.

Under the able leadership of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], who addressed you this morning, the committee on deficiencies, consisting of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDLIN], the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THURSTON], and myself, held extensive hearings on the various items included in the deficiency bill. May I say this was no small task? Ordinarily when a subcommittee handles matters entrusted to them, they are confined to a particular field or department, such as the War Department, the State Department, the Labor Department, Department of Justice, the Navy Department, or any of the other departments that may be assigned to a committee. That is all they are interested in. But the deficiency committee has to clear up and unite all the loose ends, all the deficiencies in appropriations for the current year or for previous years, and also in many instances make initial appropriations for new activities.

The bill before us for consideration today includes the legislative expenses of the House of Representatives, the expenses of the Government Printing Office, and the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, the expenses of the Architect of the Capitol, and 10 different departments of Government. In addition to that, in this bill we have to take care of 17 independent agencies, and it also includes payment of judgments and authorized claims, as well as expenditures covering relief, and also the expenses of the Social Security Act. This, it will be agreed, is no small job, and I may say that for practically 2½ months the committee met each day and gave their careful, open consideration to every item submitted to it without the slightest basis for animus or partisanship. Every item was considered on its merit.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard a lot of criticism about work-relief matters. The distinguished gentleman from New York who just preceded me, also a member of the committee, cited instances in some of the other States where slight irregularities had occurred. Mr. Hopkins was frank enough to say to the committee that he did not consider, nor did he claim, that his administration was perfect. We all know that any work of human endeavor is not perfect. We know that men in all works of life have occasionally fallen by the wayside. We have even heard of distinguished lawyers being indicted, as well as other high professional men getting into trouble. Indeed, we would reach a millennium if that time had come when no more mistakes were made in any important function of life.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. Recognizing that frailties may be expected in these particular cases, what about the universal slogan, "Don't bite the hand that feeds you." What about that? Is that political?

Mr. BOYLAN. That may be the gentleman's slogan. That is not the authorized slogan containing the stamp and seal of the relief department.

Mr. GIFFORD. No. It is not an indictable offense.

Mr. BOYLAN. Of course, the gentleman may have used that slogan on the wild and stormy shores of Cape Cod, perhaps, during the winter season.

Mr. GIFFORD. May I ask the gentleman if he proposes to use this W. P. A. money and treat it as a party measure and he himself make use of that slogan, "Don't bite the hand that feeds you"?

Mr. BOYLAN. I may say to the gentleman that I do not propose to use the slogan. I may further inform him that my influence with the W. P. A. has been of little or no moment. Why, I have not even been able to get a job for a mechanic in New York unless the man was on the relief rolls. I had many cases of skilled mechanics who did not want the odium of relief on them and who sought work; after complaining to Harry Hopkins and Colonel Westbrook, his assistant, I was not able to put one of them to work. I do not know how the gentleman fared on Cape Cod.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman speak to the ethics of the subject?

Mr. MAVERICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MAVERICK. If the gentleman had a Massachusetts Republican move into his district, would he not try to get him a job in the W. P. A.?

Mr. BOYLAN. The first thing I would do would get him a job; then I know he would be grateful to me.

Mr. GIFFORD. I should like to have the gentleman explain the ethics of that slogan.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman manufactured the slogan and he ought to know the philosophy of the ethics behind it. The gentleman springs it upon me unsuspectingly. I have not had time to digest it to see what the relative importance of one word to another is.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. I should like to have the gentleman from New York define the character of ethics embodied in this sort of a situation which exists in my own county. If you want a job, you have to renounce your Republicanism and register as a Democrat. That has been proven in countless cases. What kind of a slogan does the gentleman call that?

Mr. BOYLAN. I will answer the gentleman by saying that he exerted every possible effort to bring a Federal penitentiary into his own neighborhood, and he succeeded in having it located and erected in the city of Lewisburg. Did he do that for any purpose? He did not do it to put Democrats to work.

Mr. FOCHT. No; many of the inmates of that penitentiary come from New York City, and some of them are Democrats, too.

Mr. BOYLAN. But they are not paid salaries. They are suffering there in durance vile, but your boys are getting paid to take care of and to watch them. Your townsmen are being paid for food and supplies and the gentleman's town has grown in population at least 1,500 since the Federal penitentiary was located there.

Mr. FOCHT. It has fallen off very much, and no one in the town is employed at the penitentiary. The employees are mostly Democrats from out West and down South. I may say that I did not want the penitentiary there in the first place. The gentleman from New York was on the committee investigating prisons, he being very anxious to have additional ones erected suggested this site.

Mr. BOYLAN. No, indeed. The gentleman is in error and misquotes me. I am very fond of the gentleman, and I know he would not willingly misquote me.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. RICH. I believe if the gentleman made a visit to the Lewisburg Penitentiary and saw this institution he would realize that the people of the country would almost clamor to get into that place because of the beauty and grandeur of the institution.

Mr. BOYLAN. It is very funny that people should clamor to get into it, while all those who are in it are clamoring to get out. [Laughter.]

All this has to do merely with the ethics of the slogan referred to. What I want to discuss principally is the Social Security Act.

As you know, under the provisions of this measure, the Federal Government provides financial assistance to the States to help dependent children, to extend old-age assistance to men and women who reach the age of 65, to establish a Nation-wide system of financial and other assistance to the blind, to initiate services for the health of mothers and children, especially in rural areas, to establish and maintain adequate public-health services, to promote medical and surgical corrective service and care for crippled children, to promote local child-welfare services, especially in rural areas, and to expand vocational rehabilitation of the physically disabled.

I think there is nothing that we have accomplished in the Congress that we can be as proud of as the passage by the Congress of the Social Security Act last August.

In this appropriation we are providing practically the first big moneys to put this social-security service in operation. The only stigma on our country is the fact we have been a little late and a little slow in adopting this splendid, humanitarian service, but, as I have said, if you have accomplished nothing else in your congressional career, you can, at least, be proud and happy over having voted and appropriated funds for this splendid humanitarian service. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SEGER].

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that this bill is going to pass, but I hope before final enactment it will contain a provision for local administration of relief and local distribution of relief funds. I want to make some observation of what is going on in my own State.

I have observed that since the States and local agencies took over relief in recent days, scores, yes, hundreds of names have been stricken off relief rolls as plain frauds. I have in mind one New Jersey city where several hundred names were erased within 3 days after local police made a house-to-house canvass, and it has also been reported to me that in many instances people have failed to call for checks awaiting them, and the obvious inference is that they fear the facts concerning their true financial status are known by local authorities. It has been discovered that many of these relief folks had substantial bank accounts, and their only explanation of their fraud was "We thought we would get in on the money while it lasted and the taking was good." In these cities the overseers of the poor or the poormasters have been doing practically nothing. Yet they are the men who know better than anyone else the needs of the people in their respective cities and towns. Many are under tenure of office; they cannot be removed. They have been drawing from $500 to $5,000 yearly, and about all they could do was sit idly by and wonder when it was all going to stop. I know one poormaster who for more than 2 years was given the job of stamping relief tickets. His valuable information about the real needs of applicants was never asked for, never used in any way. Wanton waste has resulted because of lack of this information. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT].

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and to include therein certain statements from a prominent Missouri citizen.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a letter which should interest every Member of this House. It is dated Marshall, Mo., March 26, 1936, and is as follows:

Representative DEWEY SHORT,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: I am enclosing a copy of a letter I recently wrote Matt Murray, State W. P. A. director. As President Roosevelt has asked Congress to turn over to Mr. Hopkins $3,000,000,000 to spend as he pleases, I am presuming you would be interested in my personal experiences as a contractor with W. P. A. This letter to Murray is long-winded, but I was anxious to be specific and not deal in generalities. In this letter I attempted to show:

1. The red tape and delays I have encountered in order to secure labor—the fallacy of not utilizing the efficient N. R. S. organization more fully.

2. The labor scale is all out of line with prevailing wages in this area, with the result that men on W. P. A. work do not wish to work on private contract work, farms, or P. W. A. and State highway work.

3. Ninety-five percent of W. P. A. employees are picked for political reasons rather than fitness for the job, and that three of the supervisors on one project, in Saline County, are running for political office.

4. Wives of well-to-do men are placed in charge of sewing circles, whereas there are plenty of efficient destitute women available for the work while wives of politicians are employed.

5. Inefficiency of work done and the poor class of work performed.

6. By permitting men to mess around on W. P. A. jobs has spoiled even the good workers and made loafers out of them.

7. With a million dollars of construction work going on in Saline County and contractors short of labor, yet four W. P. A. jobs are going full blast in this county.

8. W. P. A. certainly does not increase the morale of the men.

9. W. P. A. is poor politics, for it only provides for three and one-half million men and disregards another 7,000,000 men who are crying for work, but who are not on relief, and they are sore as hell.

I have quarries in Mercer, Daviess, Randolph, Johnson, St. Charles, Saline, Howard, and Cooper Counties and a material yard in Cole County, on the Missouri River, for my floating equipment, and am heavily interested in the largest quarry in Jackson County, and I have just recently made a trip around these counties, and the consensus of opinion of the residents to whom I talked about W. P. A. was one of utter disgust.

As a lifelong Democrat, how in the name of the Lord can I be expected to support an administration or a Congress that can produce no better plan for men on relief or the unemployed than one to blindly turn over to Hopkins and his crowd of theoretical star-gazers $3,000,000,000 of the people's money to continue what is obviously a mess. What about the one-hundred-odd million Americans who are not on relief but are working every day and will have to pay the bill?

I hope this hasn't bored you, and I am sorry I seem to be so long-winded.

Yours very truly,

R. NEWTON MCDOWELL, INC.,
R. NEWTON MCDOWELL, President.

P. S.—Cannot Congress, on its own initiative, evolve a plan better than the present set-up?

(Copies to all Members of Congress from Missouri.)

Mr. Chairman, the opinions expressed in this communication were not uttered by a Republican but were spoken by a lifelong Democrat who comes from the heart and hotbed of Missouri Democracy—Marshall in Saline County. He employs over 1,000 men and has an annual pay roll running into the millions of dollars; he is an outstanding citizen and a heavy taxpayer. Here we have a man honest enough, if you please, and patriotic enough to speak his mind freely. Like General Hagood, he is fearless.

My limited time will not allow me to cite one instance after another, not only in my district, but all over my State, as in other States of the Union, of the gross incompetency, the rank inefficiency, and, in many instances, the downright dishonesty in the administration of so-called relief, but which, in reality, is nothing more than an ignoble attempt to bribe the American electorate with the taxpayers' money. What perfidy! Such nefarious practice!

The Seventy-third Congress turned over to the President of the United States $3,300,000,000. The first session of this Congress last year again, supinely and cowardly, surrendered the purse strings for which we ourselves are responsible to the Executive and gave him the enormous, stupendous, and appalling sum of $4,880,000,000 which he and his cohorts might spend at any time on any kind of project which they themselves in their infallible and omnipotent wisdom might deem necessary.

Oh, it is interesting to sit over here and hear Members on the other side get up, as they have done for the last few weeks, telling us the depression is ended, that the emergency is over, and that prosperity has returned to the American people, but now they come in asking for $1,500,000,000 more, notwithstanding that almost $2,000,000,000 already given to the Executive remain unexpended.

We all know how it is going to be used. Why, down in my home town they not only threatened to take the people off of relief if they did not vote the Democratic ticket, but on the morning of the last election they hauled in voters at the expense of the taxpayers, and even violated the election laws by taking these people into the polling booths, seeing they voted the Democratic ticket, then handing them relief slips, and we had to have bloody fist fights before we put an end to this damnable and inexcusable practice. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. SHORT. I thank my good friend from New York for his boundless generosity. [Laughter and applause.]

I was out in St. Louis a few days ago when the American Workers Union, an organization of the unemployed, had a 47-hour vigil in the city hall. Here is a clipping from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. They made this statement:

> We protest against the police going about investigating families who have reported need for immediate food, intimid ting families who are members of our organization and those who have reported their need to us. We protest emphatically against the police questioning these families in regard to their political affiliations.

I charge, and I charge deliberately, that those who sit in the seats of the mighty today are deliberately prolonging this depression while holding the club of hunger over the heads of destitute, helpless people, while certain plotters and usurpers are attempting to superimpose upon the American people, in their bewildered and confused state of mind, a system of government that spells destruction to democracy and will rob the people of this country of their cherished freedom. [Applause.]

The letter to Mr. M. S. Murray, referred to by Mr. SHORT, is as follows:

MARCH 16, 1936.

Mr. M. S. MURRAY,
State Administrator, W. P. A.,
Jefferson City, Mo.

MY DEAR MATT: Mr. Raymond Moley, a close friend of President Roosevelt, recently stated in an editorial in his magazine, Today, in substance, "That the chief liability the Democratic Party would have to carry in the coming campaign would be the waste and extravagant spending in the present relief set-up, etc."

I have nearly a million dollars of W. P. A. contracts in Saline and Howard Counties and have been operating our crushed-stone plant all winter in Cooper County and, as a result of my work, I have had a close-up of the W. P. A. workings in those counties and have become quite disgusted with the whole scheme of the W. P. A., with its waste and inefficiency, that I am going to give you a few reasons, based on my own personal contacts and observations, just why Mr. Moley is justified in his statement regarding the W. P. A.

The papers daily carry columns about the unemployed. However, since November 10 I have been short of labor, and today I am short about 100 men. In order to secure men I must forward a requisition to your labor office in Jefferson City, although the National Reemployment Service have a very efficient office in Saline County which has been functioning for several years. This seems like an unnecessary procedure. Your labor office then notifies the N. R. S. office in the county in which I am working to furnish me with relief labor. You have two representatives in Saline County working out of the Sedalia office, and these men are supposed to inform the N. R. S. representative what men he may take off of a given W. P. A. job, and this is what has actually happened.

Men have been assigned to our work who live 25 miles from our job, with no means of transportation, and also a certain number have been physically unfit for hard work and have been rejected by a local physician employed by us to examine all of our employees. Some men have been too old and a number have been 17 or 18 years old—too light for our work. So we wind up with probably a third of a crew. Then it is necessary to file another requisition for labor through your Jefferson City office and go all over the same route. I discovered that the foreman on these W. P. A. jobs would release the poorest labor they had, which, of course, is human nature, but it causes us to fire a good many of them and then take the abuse that we are hard on the men, etc., which is decidedly not true, as we are getting only about 75 percent efficiency from the W. P. A. men transferred to our work after cutting out the weak ones.

The labor scale is all out of line. Under our contract we are to pay 30 cents per hour for common labor working a maximum of 130 hours per month, so if a man suffers no lost time on account of bad weather or for any other reason he may only earn in a month $39 on our job, while the W. P. A. pays him $35 per month for 3 or 4 days' work per week, irrespective of weather, shut-downs, etc. But, quite important, if he works for a contractor, he has to do a fair day's work or get fired; and on W. P. A. work—well, as one darky expressed it to me when I asked him what he was doing, he replied, "I am leaning on a pick out at a W. P. A. quarry near Marshall."

Farm labor in Saline County (one of the richest farm sections in the State) pays $1 to $1.50 per day (with no food or shelter furnished), and private construction will pay from $2 to $2.50 per day top. So no man will quit a W. P. A. job in that section for the jobs I have mentioned unless forced to do so.

I had a number of colored workers from Slater assigned to one of my jobs, and these men had been working on the W. P. A. job at Arrow Rock Park. One day, when I was at my job north of Gilliam, I was told by our superintendent that six of our best darkies had quit on their own volition, and I later found they had been put back to work on the W. P. A. job at Arrow Rock Park, and, God knows, they were not needed there, as the W. P. A. had 125 men messing around the park when 10 good workers could have accomplished the same results. If men may walk off my jobs or loaf to such an extent we will be compelled to discharge them and these men know they will be put back on W. P. A. work, it then becomes a farce for us to attempt to secure men through the W. P. A. But this is important—one of the foremen on this job is a member of the city council at Slater and is reported to control the colored vote of that city. Two other foremen are running for some city office, and the superintendent of the project is running for a county office. Now, all of these men are good fellows and I have nothing personally against them, but how on earth can politicians supervising these jobs, attempting to curry favor with the men in order to secure votes, be very hard-boiled about either making them work or forcing them to go on other projects against their wishes. It is just not in the cards, and the whole set-up, as I see it, is wrong, and from my knowledge of your personnel about 95 percent of your employees have been picked for political considerations rather than fitness for the job.

I know of one woman in Saline County, whose husband is one of the highest salaried men in the community, who was placed at the head of a sewing class for the sole reason that her husband controls some votes. There surely must be plenty of destitute women perfectly capable of handling a sewing class. Yet you are running a relief organization.

The Marshall special road district have a crew of men working at a W. P. A. quarry, and the plant consists of one small jaw crusher operated by a tractor. It has no secondary crusher or any screening facilities. The stone produced ranges from 3 inches in size down, with a very limited amount of fines, and would not meet the specifications of any road builder. In fact, the size stone they are producing will in time do more harm to the motorist than the mud road. The same is true of the plant operated by the county court in Saline County, and equally it is true of the quarries operated by the Franklin and Glasgow special road districts in Howard County, all operated with W. P. A. labor. The latter two quarries were placing on the road in zero weather the stone they produced. You know too much about building roads for me to explain what will happen to these roads; and for efficiency, by way of comparison, I am producing in my portable stone plants (specification material) four times the tonnage produced in the W. P. A. quarries and employing one-fourth the amount of labor. A further comparison of W. P. A. labor and private labor may be seen at my quarry at Blackwater, in Cooper County. At one end of my quarry my own men are working and at the other end of the quarry I am permitting the W. P. A. to place 30 men breaking rock. I receive a consideration of 50 cents per ton and furnish all the tools, equipment, etc., for permitting these men to work in the quarry. The W. P. A. workers remind me of a slow-motion picture show.

After men loaf along on a W. P. A. job for months and then are assigned to a private-contract job they get an awful jolt when they are expected to do a day's work, and cry "slave driver" at the contractor. Last week five truck owners quit one of my jobs on which they were being paid the regulation wage as set up by the highway department, to wit, 5 cents per yard-mile haul plus 30 cents per hour to the driver. I asked one of these owners why he was quitting, and his reply was that he had an opportunity to go on a W. P. A. job at $1.10 per hour and loaf along and burn about 2 gallons of gas per day. And so it goes. I could write pages and pages of similar circumstances, but you probably know all about it, and I am not blaming you in the slightest. Your own reputation is too well established, and I know you are not the father of the idea, but it is this sort of things that heaps criticism on the W. P. A.

As a contractor I may be prejudiced against this sort of work, but irrespective of any bias on my part, here are a few facts:

There is right now about $1,000,000 of contract work going on in Saline County that is actually today short of labor, yet there are four W. P. A. jobs to my knowledge in operation in the county. In addition, there is a 7-mile stretch of State highway road (called Van Meter Park Road) that was let last November, but a work order has not been issued to start this project for the reason, given by the Bureau of Public Roads, that sufficient relief labor is not available. As I see it, there should not be any men in Saline County working on a W. P. A. job with a million dollars of construction work in progress, and I presume this same condition exists in many other counties. What a waste of the people's money! Further, looking at it from a cold-blooded political viewpoint, it is poor politics for this reason: I understand there are 3,200 men registered in Saline County out of a job, looking for work, and there are 600 men on relief. The men not on relief are not permitted to work on any Public Works Administration job or on a State highway job until all the relief labor is exhausted. I have had literally hundreds of these unemployed men this past winter appear at my jobs crying for work, but we were compelled to tell them they would have to get on relief to be sure of a job. These men are as sore as hell, and certainly any new plan should give equal opportunity to the man who has moved heaven and earth to remain off of relief.

The prattle put out that this work-relief plan increases the morale of men in lieu of placing them on a dole is all wrong, in my opinion. I fail to see where it increases their respect for their Government when they observe the waste and inefficiency that is permitted. Further, on any work I have, on which I am not restricted as to labor, I do not want any "ex" W. P. A. workers, as in most cases it has ruined the good workers and made loafers out of them.

Four winters ago I worked about a thousand men straight through the winter, working four 5-hour shifts, on work similar to what I am doing now in Saline County, and I always had men waiting in line for work and I was not at any time short of men, and, further, these men turned out just about 25 percent more work than I am securing from my present crews, but that was before the days of the W. P. A. Now I am constantly short of labor, and what I have is nothing to write home about.

How much better it would be to give a billion dollars to the Public Works Administration for worth-while projects handled by contractors in a businesslike manner and men who could not be taken care of in this work could be maintained on a dole under State supervision; and further I would immediately disband the whole W. P. A. program. However, to talk about disbanding the W. P. A. I feel is like barking at the moon, as apparently even in the face of many of his close advisers, who feel about the W. P. A. as I do, the President will continue it. It seems Mr. Hopkins, in the President's eyes, is infallible when it comes to working out a plan to employ men, even though I am told Mr. Hopkins never met a pay roll in his life. I do not question for a minute Mr. Hopkin's sincerity or honesty of purpose, but he seems to forget that in addition to the 3,500,000 men on relief that there are at least another 7,000,000 men not on relief crying for work. What about them?

As I have said, my experience with the latter class is that they are as sore as hell. Further, to listen to Mr. Hopkins you would be led to believe the only class that required attention are those on relief, as he apparently has no consideration for the hundred million Americans that are still working every day and have to foot the bill for his extravagance and, in my opinion, wasteful method of relief.

I have been a Democrat all my life and in my small way a contributor to campaign funds, but it will be powerfully hard for me to reconcile myself to vote to continue an administration that has no better way of solving the unemployment and relief problem than a continuation of the W. P. A.

I am afraid, Matt, that in years to come when you are being complimented about all the worth-while things you have done in an efficient manner in your lifetime and someone mentions the year you headed the Missouri W. P. A., you will be the first one to say "Just skip that year—I did not organize that fool idea; I just attempted to help my friends out of a bad mess."

With best wishes, I am

Cordially,

R. NEWTON MCDOWELL, INC.,
——— ———, President.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH].

THE LAST STRUGGLE OF THE "HYPOCRATS" FOR THE RELIEF VOTE ON THE EVE OF ELECTION—POLITICAL TRICKERY CORRUPTS THIS NECESSARY EMERGENCY RELIEF MEASURE

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration is officially labeled, "The first deficiency appropriation bill for 1936." This bill and copies of the hearings just became available at noon yesterday. As stated by the gentleman from Virginia, acting chairman of the committee in charge of the bill, we are expected to read, within 24 hours, more than 2,000 pages of testimony which includes the 100 pages of this bill. It is characteristic of this administration to give us the bill almost on the day that debate upon it opens. The opposition is never allowed to prepare appropriate amendments. Even a cursory glance, however, shows this bill to be the last struggle of the "hypocrats" for the relief vote on the eve of election.

No one will deny that this bill contains many provisions which have the approval of virtually the entire membership of this body, Republicans and Democrats alike. It clearly carries appropriations for many worth-while pursuits of the Federal Government. At each session of Congress we pass one, two, or perhaps three deficiency appropriation bills, and ordinarily a deficiency measure would be passed without much controversy.

POLITICAL TRICKERY

It is quite apparent that the administration recognizes that this pending bill contains provisions which all of us more or less enthusiastically endorse. However, the President and his advisors have seen to it that one of the most questionable appropriations we would be called upon to make is incorporated into and made a part of an otherwise acceptable measure. I think the attention of the country should be called to this political trickery.

As you read through this bill you finally come to these words:

To continue to provide relief and work relief on useful projects in the United States and its Territories and possessions by the Works Progress Administration, $1,425,000,000, to remain available until June 30, 1937.

Is it not a fair question for me to ask why this appropriation to the Works Progress Administration of approximately $1,500,000,000 was made a part of the first deficiency appropriation bill? Is it not a fair question for me to ask why this particular appropriation was not brought in here as a separate bill to be considered on its own merits?

One does not have to search long for the answer. It is because of the criticism which has been directed at the Works Progress Administration for waste and politics. It is because you do not wish to bring the W. P. A. squarely under the spotlight of public discussion. It is as if you thought that the President's request for one billion five hundred million could not stand by itself, but that, instead, you had to support it by including the appropriation in a group of other items.

It is political trickery, but you may be sure that the public understands this procedure. The country also understands the many other deceptive methods which have been employed by this administration in its utter disregard for the principles of our Government and its efforts to perpetuate its own existence.

ANOTHER BLANK-CHECK APPROPRIATION

Once again you are asking the Congress of the United States to make a blank-check appropriation, and once again I must raise my voice in opposition to this procedure. Approximately 1 year ago, when the four billion eight hundred and eighty million appropriation bill was before this body, I took occasion to call attention to the fact that we were not discharging our duty to the people we represent in appropriating such a vast sum of money without at least stipulating how it should be spent. The plea was without avail.

POLITICAL INTERESTS FURTHERED AT EXPENSE OF HUMAN SUFFERING

You made that blank-check appropriation, and you and I know that the money was literally wasted. You and I know that it has been used, at the expense of human suffering and want, to further political interests. It has been used to influence votes and to provide high-salaried administrative positions for the building up of a Nation-wide political machine.

There are virtually no limitations as to how this money can be spent. From the language of this bill it appears that an attempt is made to have us believe that we are earmarking the funds. Ten general classes of projects are listed, and the only stipulation is the maximum amount which can be spent for each general class.

For example, it will be noted that there is that class of projects entitled "white-collar projects, $90,000,000." Then there is "women's projects, $90,000,000." Next comes "miscellaneous works projects, $75,000,000." Who knows what type of projects such terminology covers? Moreover, I call attention to the fact that the bill does not provide that the stipulated amounts be spent for each class. That would be too binding for this administration. On the contrary, the bill merely states that the amount for each class shall not exceed the amount stipulated. In other words, nothing can be spent for a particular class of projects, or perhaps $100.

I think every one of us realize, although, no doubt, the members of the majority will not admit it, that the language employed is simply a camouflage to meet the criticism that this is a blank-check appropriation. It is, indeed, unique, but certainly not clever enough to deceive the people of my district, who will be paying these bills with increased taxation.

THE PEOPLE WILL DEMAND AN ACCOUNTING

They will ask me what part of this one billion five hundred million will be allotted to the Resettlement Administration under Dr. Rexford Guy Tugwell. I will have to tell them frankly that their question cannot be answered. I shall have to tell them that the New Deal does not believe that the taxpayers should inquire as to how their money is spent. According to the New Dealers, that is not the true function of the taxpayer. His sole responsibility is to pay the bills, dream dreams, and not worry about the accumulation of debts.

TUGWELL'S UTOPIAN "DREAM VILLAGES" PATTERNED AFTER RUSSIA

When the question was asked of the Works Progress Administrator, Harry Hopkins, by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations as to whether any of the funds would be used by the Resettlement Administration, he appeared to avoid a definite answer. He did say that $90,000,000 would be under Resettlement. From the language of this bill there is every reason to believe that a much larger sum will be allocated to Dr. Tugwell to continue his utopian efforts after the pattern of Russia.

He is engaged in constructing "satellite towns", "dream villages", and brainstorm Russian homes. Some of these homes have been proposed for Lake County, which is in my district. As in the case of these projects for Lake County, upon examination of them you will find that there have been nothing but administrative delays after delays in carrying them out, all at the expense of the Government, and with hardship to the needy families who are supposed to be helped by the program.

TUGWELLIAN PHILOSOPHY DEMANDS GOVERNMENT CONTROL AND REGIMENTATION

I just recently completed reading the book written by Dr. Rexford G. Tugwell entitled "The Industrial Discipline and the Governmental Arts." No doubt many of you have read it; and, if so, I am sure you will agree with me that the whole philosophy advanced is that the Federal Government should assume control. He represents the American spokesman and actual practitioner of the communistic theory of government. We need not fear the May Day paraders and orators, but we have every cause to fear such men as Dr. Tugwell, one of the "brain trusters", who are in a position where they can put our people under communistic control and regimentation. I suggest that you read his books. While you are doing this, try to recall the measures enacted by the New Deal during the past 3 years. You will be startled at the number of them expressive of the Tugwellian philosophy of government.

There is no better illustration of the Tugwellian theory of regimentation and control than is found in the homestead projects themselves. The homesteaders contract away their souls to the Resettlement Administration. I suggest that you get copies of the contracts used by Tugwell for the homesteaders and these community projects.

THE HOMESTEAD CONTRACTS ARE AN INSULT TO FREE AMERICANS

I have in my office what is known as the temporary licensing agreement. It is listed as form RA–MA 12, revised January 15, 1936, and approved by the Administrator. Get one and read it. You will find that the licensee contracts that he "shall not" and "shall not", but, rather, he will "comply", "observe", "adopt", and "adhere."

I would, for example, call your special attention to the fact that under item 4 of this license the licensee contracts that he will "adopt and adhere to any cropping program and tillage practice stipulated by the licensor."

There is one particular item in these contracts which will be of special interest to you as Members of Congress. It represents an insult to us as representatives of the people duly elected to serve them. It is item 6 in the temporary licensing agreement of form RA–MA 12 I just mentioned, and it is item 8 in the form used for the community projects.

I shall read this provision to you:

6. Noneligibility to benefits: No Member of or Delegate to Congress or Resident Commissioner shall be permitted to any share or part of this license or to any benefit that may arise thereupon.

There is not a Member sitting here today who would want any share in any of the benefits, but the fact that Dr. Tugwell will include such a provision in these contracts is an insult to the honesty and integrity of the Congress. I personally resent such a provision, and I know that you do also.

What do you imagine is the impression conveyed by Dr. Tugwell concerning Members of Congress through this provision of these contracts to the 500,000 or more people he calls "worthy and promising Resettlement clients"? He indirectly tells them in these contracts that their Representatives not only have nothing to do with the administration but, moreover, are not to be trusted. He thereby subtly plants the seeds of communism in the minds of the people whom we represent.

Thus even this bill is typically expressive of the Tugwellian communistic philosophy of government. The measure as it now reads leaves to a Congressman and his colleagues only the simple function of turning over to Dr. Tugwell and his colleagues this vast sum of money without restrictions.

THE RESETTLEMENT ADMINISTRATION UTTERLY ABANDONS TRUE PRINCIPLES OF OUR AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

Nothing I can say more clearly indicates the attitude of Dr. Tugwell toward the Congress of the United States, toward the Representatives of the people duly elected by them, than this insulting provision in these homestead contracts. And we have no assurance from the language of this bill before us that we are not appropriating money which will be ultimately given to him to continue his communistic endeavors, with utter abandon for the principles of government which every true American holds sacred.

SEVENTEEN THOUSAND AND FIFTY-FIVE RESETTLEMENT EMPLOYEES

When the Director of the Budget, Daniel W. Bell, was before the House Ways and Means Committee, he was called upon to submit information relative to the Resettlement Administration. The hearings show that the average number of people during this year on the pay roll of that Administration is 12,478. On April 1 of this year the Tugwell Resettlement had 17,055 employees.

The record of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee on the Revenue Act of 1936 shows that from May 4, 1935, to March 23 of this year the sum of $278,347,171.29 has been allocated to Dr. Tugwell's administration. The hearings also show (p. 705) that of this amount $31,950,000 or more than 10 percent, has been for administrative expenses.

THE POLITICIANS' HAVEN

These employees are not selected according to the rules and regulations of the Civil Service Commission. They have not been chosen because of their executive efficiency and ability. You and I know that the Resettlement Administration, perhaps more than any other, has been the politicians' haven. Party loyalty is the measure by which the employees are selected. It has been a place where Postmaster General James A. Farley, the campaign general of the New Deal, could place adherents to the New Deal on the public pay roll and thereby build up a vast political machine.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that there is one of us here who is not well aware of the need for relief for our people. I do not believe that there is one of us who is opposed to making appropriations which will afford the suffering people the necessary assistance. People who are without employment through no fault of their own should be given assistance until they have been able to find a permanent position.

MOST OF THIS APPROPRIATION WILL NEVER REACH THE NEEDY

But, Mr. Chairman, a great percentage of this money does not go to help the needy. The unemployed man receiving this assistance receives on the average $50 per month; in some localities less and in others a little more. To employ one man for a year under the W. P. A. costs on the average of $972, of which $600 is for the year's wages of the self-respecting man. Three hundred and seventy-two dollars go for materials and supervision.

PITTSBURGH DEMOCRATIC OFFICIAL CITES WASTE

Let me read to you the statement made by the director of public works of the city of Pittsburgh, Leslie M. Johnston, before the Ways and Means Committee in connection with the tax bill recently passed by this House. He is a Democrat and cannot be said therefore to be talking simply for political purposes. He said:

I am here to tell you that 50 percent of that is sheer waste, and I know what I am talking about, because I have the handling of it * * *.

Later he explained that the "politicians of Pennsylvania" got the money supposed to be used to relieve human suffering in that city. He said:

As it is done now, you have a W. P. A. set-up in Pittsburgh consisting of hundreds of men at high salaries. You have another W. P. A. set-up in Harrisburg of hundreds of men with high salaries. You have Mr. Hopkins' set-up in Washington with thousands of men at high salaries. We say that is absolutely and totally unnecessary * * *. I am telling you quite firmly that 50 percent of that money is absolute sheer waste, and I can prove that statement. That is not a wild statement.

Those are the words of one of the Democratic officials of the great city of Pittsburgh. Those are the words of a man who is familiar with construction projects. He is the city's director of public works.

GENERAL HAGOOD ASSAILS W. P. A. "STAGE" MONEY

Everyone who has been associated with the relief program, as conducted by this administration, who has the courage to state fully and frankly his opinion of it has emphatically stated that the money is wasted. I just remind you that Maj. Gen. Johnson Hagood dared to appear before the Committee on Appropriations and say what he thought of the use of funds by the W. P. A. He called it "stage money, because you can pass it around but you cannot get anything out of it in the end." I quote from his testimony:

As to relief funds and other funds, I am not familiar with the various pockets in which Uncle Sam keeps his money. I understand that there is Budget money, which is very hard to get; there is P. W. A. money, which is not so hard to get; and then there is a vast quantity of W. P. A. money, which is very easy to get for trifling projects but almost impossible to get for anything worth while.

Neither Director of Public Works Leslie M. Johnston, of the city of Pittsburgh, nor Maj. Gen. Johnson Hagood, who had been in the service of the United States Army for over 20 years, had any reason to make the statements they did except that they wished this Congress to know the truth. As a matter of fact, because he told the truth, Major General Hagood was relieved of his command. It was only because this administration could not stand the adverse public reaction to his dismissal without just cause that he was sent to serve as commander of the Sixth Corps Area. It vindicated him personally.

Major General Hagood is a man of convictions. He has since resigned and returned to private life. He has done what so many others have done who became a part of this administration but found that it was following a program which would ultimately lead us to chaos.

This appropriation may read "to provide relief", but the unemployed know and the taxpayers know that if we were to be accurate we would change that language to read, "to provide funds for political patronage and for the purpose of influencing elections."

SOUTHERN STATES CONTRIBUTE PRACTICALLY NOTHING TO RELIEF

If you examine the figures for the distribution of funds according to States, it will be clearly seen that some of the States have provided a large percentage of the money for relief purposes but other States have contributed practically nothing. The figures show that my home State of Illinois has given 24.8 percent of the funds used in that State from January to September 1935. Fifteen States, on the other hand, have contributed 10 percent or less. They are West Virginia, Virginia, South Dakota, Nevada, Wyoming, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, Arkansas, North Carolina, New Mexico, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina. We in Illinois are not only helping to take care of our own needy but as a large tax-paying State we are contributing to the care of the needy in the Democratic States of the South and West.

It is not that we do not feel that we are all a part of one great country, and it is not that we are not willing to contribute for the help of other parts of the country. But we wish to be treated fairly. We demand that other States likewise be compelled to make some effort for the proper care of their needy, and I am supporting an amendment which will be later offered to that end.

THE RELIEF ADMINISTRATION IS ROTTED BY POLITICAL THIEVERY

Politics play a part in the distribution of funds to the States. Politics play a part in the selection of projects. Politics play a part in the selection of the administrative personnel and there are innumerable instances during this administration where political capital has been made of human misery and suffering. Time and again the newspapers of Illinois have pointed out where attempts have been made to influence the votes of those who have the misfortune to have to depend on relief work for their bread and butter. When any administration, whether it is Republican or Democratic, makes political capital of human misery and suffering, I say to you that it is contemptible.

THE "HYPOCRATS" CAPITALIZE ON HUMAN SUFFERING

I say to you that this bill with no congressional restrictions, unless amended, further entrenches the existing dictatorship. It enables the present administration, from the date of its passage until the election in November, to dangle before the voters on relief and sponsors of projects an inviting bait secured from the already overburdened taxpayer. Capitalizing on human hardship is the program of those in power who, because of such practices, will be known in history as the "hypocrats." They surely cannot be Democrats as we have known them.

RELIEF SHOULD BE ADMINISTERED BY LOCAL NONPARTISAN BOARDS

Mr. Chairman, I believe in adequate appropriations to take care of our needy, but I demand that this use of relief for political purposes stop. I demand that we stop this wasteful expenditure of money for useless projects and for providing high-salaried jobs. This can be accomplished if the Federal Government would turn the administration of relief funds over to nonpartisan boards selected by the Governors of the individual States, whose duty it would be to see that the money is spent for worth-while projects and that it is used solely to help the needy rather than to help any one political party carry an election. There is absolutely no necessity for these high administrative costs simply to provide political jobs at the expense of the unemployed and at the expense of an already overtaxed public.

It is our obligation as Representatives to see that a program is devised whereby the unemployed may be taken care of until they are absorbed by private enterprise. The most economical and most effective way of handling this problem is to permit each individual State, in cooperation with the local communities, to devise its own particular program. Each section of the country has its own needs and its own problems to be met. They are better equipped to determine what should be the nature of a program for meeting their peculiar circumstances and conditions than any administration here in Washington. Let them develop such a program of work relief, designed to afford employment and at the same time to carry out projects of a permanent and lasting value.

DISMISS THE THOUSANDS OF BUREAUCRATS

What valid objection can be made to the proposal that the administration of these funds be made by a nonpartisan board in each State, appointed by its Governor, with the Federal Government simply lending its cooperation by way of financial assistance. I would discharge the thousands and thousands of Federal employees here in Washington and scattered throughout the United States. I would dismiss thousands of these bureaucrats. They serve no useful purpose. They are merely a duplication of already existing administrative agencies in various States and communities which have had experience with many different kinds of projects.

At the last session of Congress you refused to assume this responsibility. You simply appropriated four billion eight hundred and eighty million, with an abandon disturbing to every citizen, and vested in the President and his appointees full authority to spend it as they saw fit. Today they are asking us to give them another one billion five hundred million.

REAL PERMANENT RELIEF WILL COME ONLY THROUGH REVIVAL OF BUSINESS

In considering this problem of unemployment, let us not lose sight of the fact that while we have spent these billions in a so-called "prime the pump" effort, there are still approximately 11,000,000 people unemployed in the United States. This is about the same number of unemployed as when the New Deal came into power. At its best a public-works or work-relief program can only be a temporary expedient. Our real problem is to pursue a constructive course of action to revive business so that these unemployed may find places in private enterprise. No self-respecting American wishes to spend his life on work-relief projects. Our people want permanent jobs. They want the opportunity to make their contribution to the development of this great country, to be able to provide more than mere subsistence for their families.

INCREASING FEDERAL DEFICIT

This administration has been in power for over 3 years. It has had full control of both Houses of Congress, and every imaginable power has been given the President of the United States, making him a virtual dictator. Yet the unemployment and relief problem still remains. As a result of it all, we have nothing more than a public debt of approximately thirty-two billion, and if we add to this Federal guaranties and other obligations it amounts to a debt of almost thirty-nine billion, which will take generations to pay.

How are we paying off this public debt? We are not even attempting to, but on the contrary, for the present fiscal year to date we have been running behind in the amount of two billion six hundred and eighty-five million.

As I stated in one of my speeches at the last session of Congress in opposition to the Guffey coal bill, which the President asked us to pass regardless of its constitutionality, the choice which the people now have to make is between the New Deal and their birthright of a free democratic government. It is a choice between a birthright and a mess of pottage, a choice between "life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness" and political dictation from Washington. It is a choice between returning to the principles of government which have evolved throughout the years and which have proved sufficiently flexible to meet any emergency, or a continuation of New Deal experimentation with confusion, debts, taxes, inflation, and pernicious denial of personal liberties which we cherish.

Mr. Chairman, it will take more than the six billion three hundred and eighty million appropriated during the last 2 years solely for so-called relief purposes to compel our people to give up their birthright for a continuation of the New Deal program. I am firmly convinced that our country is awakened to the fact that the fundamental premise upon which this Government was established is that the "Government is the agent of the people" and not, according to the apparent New Deal philosophy, that the people are the agents of the Government. Our people have been taught, and rightly so, that their Government is to serve them. They are not to be made servants of it.

NEED FOR CONFIDENCE

How is it possible for business to revive and for those on relief to find positions in private enterprise when confidence is lacking? As I stated before on the floor of this House, so long as this New Deal experimentation exists there cannot be a revival in business. Simply stated, the program, with its undefined objectives as indicated by this bill, unless amended, and wasteful expenditures, has tended to destroy rather than foster confidence, which is the basis of our economic activity.

Futurity and confidence are distinctive factors of business. One does not borrow unless he is confident he can repay. One does not buy unless he is confident he can pay for his purchases, nor does one sell unless he has confidence in the buyer's capacity to pay. One does not invest unless he is confident of a return on his investment.

When the element of confidence is missing, trade reaches low levels. We lack confidence to buy, to sell, to borrow, to loan, or to invest. Under the New Deal we cannot be certain as to the future and, more specifically, we cannot be certain as to future values.

Our people want to work and not subsist year in and year out on the relief rolls. By no magic is it possible to have employees without employers, and let us not lose sight of the fact that when we make blank-check appropriations like this, when we allow this waste to continue, and when people are forced to become mere political puppets because of their misfortune, we destroy every bit of confidence in the future. No one knows what to expect. Business remains still. Unemployment continues and the relief problem remains with us. The problem will remain as long as these "hypocrats" continue in power. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, referring to some remarks made by the eloquent gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] about the arguments being put up on this side of the House for the administration, I want to observe that the enormous vote that is being rolled up for President Roosevelt in big Republican States, exceeding the sum of the votes for all other slates and candidates, would indicate that the arguments being made on this side of the House are, if not wasted, at least not necessary.

It reminds me of a noted murder case that I participated in, in which a battery of us lawyers, after arguing to the jury for 4 days for an acquittal, found out that the jurors had held a meeting in advance of the arguments and had unanimously come to the conclusion that the defendants were not guilty. [Laughter.]

But I did not rise for this purpose. Yesterday two gentlemen, one on either side of the aisle, sharply criticized and condemned the Works Progress Administration for squandering money in a way which they said actually demoralized the recipients, and they offered as proof the horrible example, work going on on First Street, east of the Capitol Plaza, and in front of the Supreme Court Building and the Library of Congress, where they said there was a large number of men loafing on the job and sleeping on their shovels. The gentlemen urged us not to take their word but to go and see for ourselves.

I had occasion to pass that way this morning, and I not only looked but inquired, and I found that by far the greater part of this work that was going on is the laying of a new streetcar track by the Rapid Transit Co., the street railway company of this city. There were a large number of men on this work. I know both by experience and observation that when men work for a private corporation they do not soldier on the job.

Now, the other work is two small sewer connections that the District of Columbia is putting in, on which the W. P. A. is paying two-thirds and the District one-third of the cost. Only about 20 men were engaged on these jobs, and they were working. This is usually the result when you take up and investigate these complaints, you find that generally the most of it is without foundation. But in this case I am going to follow the example of the critics and advise that you gentlemen go over and see for yourselves what is going on in front of the Capitol Grounds and see whether you can corroborate what I say and find out where the truth lies. You may get an object lesson in the difference between looking and seeing.

I shall insert at this point the colloquy between the two gentlemen who so sweepingly condemn W. P. A. and all its works and who cite in support of their indictment what they they think they saw. It is taken from the RECORD of May 7, page 6849.

While I am on this subject I may say that I have found in the RECORD a statement by the gentleman who furnished the bulk of the above misinformation that a public golf course, accomplished as a W. P. A. project in my home city, is located on the city dumping ground. Since I live adjacent to this golf course, my word may be taken for the fact that it is located on the level prairie commanding beautiful mountain ranges, including famous Pikes Peak, all of which region I have the honor to represent. I find this a most opportune time to correct the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the Works Progress Administration is doing an enormous task creditably, and that a whole lot of this so-called boondoggling is the only possible way in which you can reach all elements of our population.

Artisans and artists must live, as well as common laborers, and they should be employed in a way that will preserve touch with their skill and their artistry. I was struck recently by an article devoted to showing that great numbers of skilled workmen had lost their touch and fitness through long unemployment at their particular callings, and arguing that such men could not be rehabilitated by pick and shovel work and might become permanently disqualified for their former work even if opportunity offered. It is the same with musicians, painters, writers, actors, and many of the so-called white-collar professions and vocations. A rounded works program calls for a proportionate recognition of all classes of workers, and W. P. A. is undertaking to do this. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS].

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I think the position of the Republicans is quite clear, that we stand for relief. We do not propose to permit people to starve nor even to be hungry in this country, but we do take the attitude that the administration of relief should be divorced from partisan political control. I understand perfectly that under the doctrine of "to the victor belongs the spoils", the party in power has a perfect right to spend these funds, but when you insist that the money must be expended by a man who is in no sense a responsible constitutional official, a man who has never been voted for by the people, or even by the Senate in confirmation, then you subject yourselves to the very strong suspicion of a desire mainly for political control. We feel that this money should be paid in direct grants to the States, and that the States should be permitted to administer the funds, and I dare to say if you will make your allocations on that basis, we will take care of twice as many people in this country in saving them from want and destitution. People on the Democratic side are wont to prate about Jefferson and take his name so frequently in vain, extolling the virtues of his philosophy of decentralized government, yet, in practice, you indulge in policies which would make even the despised Hamilton repudiate you. We want relief, but we want the money to go to people who need it, not to those who administer it. Why do you insist on a great Federal set-up to administer this relief unless it is to make political capital from the sufferings of the people? The simple, plain, economical American way to handle relief would be for the Federal Government to make its contributions direct to the States, and then let the States, in their own sovereign power, administer the funds along with their own relief appropriations. We would have in that way a more economical administration, and more people would be taken care of, and you would not then be subjected to the very logical criticism that your main interest is political control and political power. If your interest is not partisanship and for the political advantage you can get in elections by the direct handling of relief funds through your extra-legal political bureaus, why do you insist, against all of your highly expressed principles, in setting up this great Federal bureaucracy?

Just why is there need to have this gigantic network of Federal bureaucrats to distribute relief to the needy? In every State there are already adequate State-wide and local agencies to administer relief. Why is it necessary to overlap and duplicate these local agencies by a Federal domination unless there is an ulterior purpose? Certainly the present system of being overrun by hordes of petty Federal bureaucrats has not resulted in a more economical use of relief funds. Certainly these Federal agencies are no more competent to direct relief activities than the local officials; in fact, it is obvious that they cannot know local needs nearly so well as the local officials.

Certainly there is no ordinary explanation of this new Democratic Party policy of Federal superstate governments. No; the explanation has nothing to do with relief of ameliorating sufferings of the people. The old Democratic solution would have been the plain, simple, direct method of making money grants to the several States as the Federal Government's contribution to this problem. What we are witnessing is a crude, brutal attempt to capitalize the tragedy of a depression to set up an iron-handed political machine aimed at perpetuation in office by a combination of public bribery through the use of Federal funds and the ruthless strangling of any and all opposition by the way the funds are distributed which amounts to nothing less than official blackmail.

I call upon the party of State rights to put their principles into practice and return local control to the States and local units.

There is no better place to start than upon the administration of relief funds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, it is impossible for me to present my views on relief in 4 minutes. However, I take this opportunity to point out certain salient features, and they are these: First of all, we still have over 12,000,000 unemployed. Despite the so-called recovery in finance, despite the so-called recovery in production, we still have over 12,000,000 unemployed. Last year when we appropriated $4,800,000,000 we were dealing with 12,000,000 unemployed. We found that amount inadequate. This year, for the same problem, to deal with the same condition, we are appropriating only $1,425,000,000. This, to my mind, constitutes a serious retreat on the part of the administration before the reactionaries who are expressing the view that relief appropriations should be cut down. The only courageous policy to be followed at this time is to increase this appropriation, so as to provide adequate funds in order to maintain the unemployed in a state of health and decency.

Instead we find that the beat, beat, beat of retreat on the part of the administration is being reechoed in the empty stomachs of the unemployed. Seven hundred thousand men are being removed from W. P. A. and more will have been discharged by June 30 of this year. What is going to happen to those 700,000 men? Are you going to have them depend on private industry? Are you going to throw these 700,000 unemployed on the mercies of the so-called private industry? Are you going to throw them on the mercies of substandard wages or are you going to be courageous enough to stand up in front of the reactionaries and adopt a realistic and sane policy of adequate appropriation for the unemployed? I know that it may be expedient to compromise in the face of the onslaughts of the chambers of commerce and other representatives of entrenched wealth—I know that it may be politically wise to do so, but at the same time you are doing so at the expense of the unemployed. Not only do you discharge 700,000 men, but you refuse to take on those who have become in need after November 1935, and in December 1935 you discontinued funds for direct relief, so that today there are no Federal funds available or being used for Federal direct relief, and the result is that millions of men, women, and children in the richest country in the world are today living on starvation budgets, actually slowly starving to death. On the one hand you propose a most inadequate appropriation of $1,425,000,000, on the other hand we hear the demand that we cut down these appropriations. Mr. Chairman, I say that we must face the people realistically. We must increase the appropriation so as to care for all of the unemployed. Let me say that you cannot afford to crucify the unemployed on the cross of political expediency.

You cannot afford to compromise with the chambers of commerce and the Liberty League. You started in the right direction. Finish the job. Do not retreat. The unemployed of this Nation are looking to you for adequate appropriations to give the unemployed of this Nation a decent living during their period of unemployment. Reactionaries attack the unemployed because they ask for relief. Why should they not ask for relief? Why are they not entitled to relief? Is it the fault of the unemployed that they are unemployed? The unemployed of America want work; they do not want relief. If they do not get any work, it is not their fault. Therefore, it is our primary responsibility to provide for them. Why punish them, since their unemployment is due to no fault of theirs? It is the fault of an economic system which permits want in a land of plenty. Such an economic system must be overhauled and eventually will be overhauled by the American people themselves, through their Representatives in Congress.

In conclusion, I make this appeal to both sides of the aisle. Remember, you must face the unemployed in November. Remember, they are appealing to you today. They will appeal to you tomorrow and they will continue their appeal. Increase these appropriations and do not decrease them. Appropriate sufficiently for the unemployed of these United States. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, at this point I desire to extend my own remarks on the Tennessee Valley Authority.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the people of my State and of my congressional district are very greatly and vitally interested in the appropriation carried in this bill for the Tennessee Valley Authority for the coming fiscal year of 1937. The sum of $41,117,816 is available in this bill for flood control and navigation at Wilson Dam and Reservoir, Norris Dam and Reservoir, Wheeler Dam, Pickwick Landing Dam, Hiwassee, Guntersville, and McReynolds Dams. All these projects are worthy and will be most helpful in flood control and navigation. Funds are made available also for surveys and investigations for other main river dams and tributaries to the amount of $32,000,000.

For the electricity program over $5,000,000 is appropriated. For fertilizer and agricultural development, $4,484,000. All these items are meritorious. I regret to see that the Budget estimate of $43,000,000 for the T. V. A. has been reduced to $39,900,000.

The development of the Tennessee River has been of inestimable value to the people of our State. Cheaper electricity is now made possible to all the people. The "yardstick" is working. New electric lines are being constructed in many counties in my congressional district in middle Tennessee to take advantage of the T. V. A. rate. Farm homes are for the first time being furnished with electric current in many sections of my district. This wonderful convenience and benefaction has created new interest in farm values and farm life and given an impetus to the movement of "back to the farm." This is important in the development of the resources of our people and of our common country. The young people will no longer move to the towns and cities to have the convenience of the white light. They will find this now available on the farm in many sections of middle Tennessee where it was not before possible to have it. This convenience has come as a result of the New Deal.

I recently introduced a bill in the House to so amend the T. V. A. Act as to include the Cumberland River and its tributaries within the provisions of said T. V. A. Act, and thus make possible the development of the Cumberland and Caney Fork Rivers. This amendment should and, I hope, will be soon favorably recommended for passage by the Military Affairs Committee of the House. It has been passed by the Senate. The bill was introduced by Senator LOGAN, of Kentucky. I have assurance that the proposed amendment will be given a full and careful hearing at the next session of Congress, when and after the present development at Muscle Shoals and Norris have been more nearly completed, and when figures can then be had upon the earning power of the present projects.

I wish it were possible to have my amendment adopted at this session of Congress, so that the present appropriation bill might provide sufficient funds for the development of the Cumberland River Valley, and so that work might begin on the Cumberland and Caney Fork Rivers, and thus make possible a development in middle Tennessee similar to the ones now going on in east Tennessee. But I realize that it takes time for projects of this great magnitude to be developed. Rome was not built in a day. Neither will the present generation witness a full development of the potential power sites in our country, but no finer opportunities are afforded for the erection of power dams than those afforded in the Cumberland River Valley and the valleys of the Caney Fork. These two great rivers traverse some of the finest farming lands in the United States. All that the people now need in these sections to bring about an unprecedented era of prosperity and improvement is to be afforded cheaper electricity and the opportunities which follow its development. I do not doubt but that the forward steps being taken by this Congress will be adopted and followed by the next. The people will not be denied the right to the use of the rivers, which are the common property of all the people. They will utilize them. It only requires time for sentiment to crystallize and the people to become aroused to the fact that they have in the past been too long profiteered upon by the utilities and power companies.

These companies have sinned away their day of grace. They have enjoyed protection all too long through paid lobbyists who have represented them in the legislative halls. They must now see the handwriting on the wall. If not, it is because they are blind to their own surroundings. Unless they adjust and lower their rates and charges for electric current they will be faced by an aroused public, and their days are, and should be, numbered. Some have already realized the necessity for cheaper rates and have lowered them. There is ample room for still greater reductions. It was only after the T. V. A. was a reality and on the scene in my State that any reduction in electric charges was made. The rural communities were ignored altogether so far as electric service was concerned until the building of the T. V. A. lines. More power to this great Government agency! It is a benefaction to all the people. It has made truly a new empire in the section where its activities have been greatest.

No one dares dispute the record of achievement. The public has suffered long and has been most tolerant. All agree that the Tennessee Valley Authority has added untold millions in material wealth to the sections where they are operating. The values added to the convenience, health, and happiness of our people cannot be estimated in dollars and cents. The reduced rates on electricity alone to the people of Tennessee will equal the amount expended on the T. V. A. development. Cheaper fertilizers will also be made available to our farmers. The improvement in the soil and the added blessings coming cannot be appraised.

Let us continue in this new field of endeavor. Let us develop all sections of our common country. Let us no longer neglect the South, but give it an equal opportunity with the rest of America. We have suffered in the past materially because of discriminations in tariff schedules and lack of sufficient appropriations to develop our natural resources. Let us use the talents given us by a kindly Providence and make and build a greater Tennessee and a greater America.

I hope my colleagues in the House will cooperate and help to pass at the next session of Congress the bill for the development of the Cumberland River Valley Authority. The passage of this measure will afford as great, if not greater, possibilities for the people than the development in which we are all so greatly interested now going on at Norris in east Tennessee. Middle Tennessee is more thickly populated and has a more productive soil than does east Tennessee, taken as a whole. Let us continue in this good work. Let no backward steps be taken, no retreat sounded, but ever a victorious march to build a better and more fit place in which to live, not only for the present but for all future generations.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHANLEY].

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Chairman, for 25 years the British Empire has been attempting to solve the unemployment problem, and yet it has not yet obtained the answer. Our struggle with this all-pervading perplexity has just begun. Before we take the next step let us ponder carefully and dispassionately the previous efforts. We need more than strong adjectives and invectives to solve this twentieth century gordian knot. For the information of the House I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks and include therein some thoughts on the problem as handled by the British.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I think those in charge of this business of relief in Washington have done a good job and many of those who are criticizing are just a little sore because they are not doing the job themselves.

It makes a great deal of difference in the minds of some people who or what party is doing a job as to whether it is good or bad. Harry Hopkins and those who have labored with him have had a stupendous task. Regardless of all criticism that has been leveled at him and his organization, I think he has done a splendid job in the administration of the duties committed to him. His administration with the money that Congress has appropriated has brought food, raiment, and shelter to numberless people who would have gone hungry and been destitute of practically every necessity of life. Not only in the feeding and clothing of the hungry has the Works Progress Administration served the country but in the one item of building thousands of miles of farm-to-market roads it has in a great part justified its existence. This program has lifted thousands of farmers out of the mud and put them on all-weather roads so that they can market their produce at all seasons of the year and, added to that, make farm life easier and more pleasant.

Out of funds already appropriated, more than a half billion dollars has been set aside for roads. I, therefore, take great pleasure in supporting this bill to carry on these and other objectives that are being attained under this administration. Not only in these things but in others that I will mention has the administration of President Roosevelt reached out and touched and helped the plain citizen and the heretofore forgotten man.

The agricultural program of this administration has, in my opinion, done more for agriculture than all other administrations heretofore piled into one. When I speak of the agricultural program I cannot but mention my friend and colleague, MARVIN JONES, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, who from his position was the proper man to sponsor agricultural legislation, and to say that it has been a pleasure as well as a privilege to me to follow him and support him in all of his measures to bring about a betterment of agricultural conditions throughout the length and breadth of the land. We have but to look at the plight of agriculture on March 1, 1933, and the prices received then and the prices received now by the farmer to see at a glance what this program has meant to the farmers. Take a few examples; cotton, for instance, on March 1, 1933, was selling at an average of 5.90 cents per pound and on January 1, 1936, at 11.35 cents per pound, an advance of 92 percent; wheat, on March 1, 1933, 48 cents per bushel, on January 1, 1936, 101½ cents per bushel, an advance of 111 percent; corn was on March 1, 1933, 24.12 cents per bushel, on January 1, 1936, 60.87 cents per bushel, an advance of 152 percent. Dairy products, cattle, and hogs have had a similar increase. The average for sweetpotatoes in 1932 was 40 cents per bushel and in 1935 65 cents per bushel; hogs in 1932 selling for 3.40 cents per pound and in 1935, 7.30 cents per pound; beef cattle in 1932, 3.30 cents per pound and in 1935, 5 cents per pound; sheep in 1932, 2.35 cents per pound and in 1935, 4 cents per pound; chickens in 1932, 9 cents per pound, and in 1935, 13 cents per pound; butter from the farm in 1932, 19 cents per pound, and in 1935, 27 cents per pound.

Take the country as a whole, the yearly average prices of all groups of farm products increased 66 percent from 1932 to 1935. Take the State of Texas alone, and see what the figures are. Cash receipts from the sale of principal farm products in Texas in 1932 were $280,713,000, and in 1935 these same crops sold for $442,310,000, including $68,527,000 in rental and benefit payments. This is an increase of approximately 58 percent. It took some of our city friends a long time to become convinced that the problem of the farmer was their problem also. When the bottom fell out of farm prices in 1930, 1931, and 1932, factories began to close, unemployment increased in every city and town in the United States, for the simple reason that the farmers had no buying power. It has been my contention for years, and is now, that if you give the 35,000,000 people on the farms of America a buying power every portion of the country will be reasonably prosperous and labor will be employed, factories will be opened, business will be sound, and banks will be safe. The great hope, therefore, for the country is for agriculture, through those engaged in agriculture, to make the cost of production and have a surplus with which to buy the things that they need. To retain these vast benefits, not only for agriculture but for every enterprise and every business in the land, the fight must be kept up and the administration headed by President Roosevelt and backed by a Congress that will support him should be continued in office to see that the gains that we have made are not lost, but that further gains are made until we have a country in which to live in which there is fair play and justice meted out to all sections and to all classes. When the impartial history of these times is written and the writers become sane and not partisan, President Roosevelt will stand forth as the outstanding, forward-looking, wise statesman of the age.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I hope that all have now made our speeches against the bill and that we will get busy and help pass the bill. I want to ask my brethren on the other side of the aisle and my colleagues on this side of the aisle to be as indulgent with the committee as possible in order that we may be about our business and perhaps be this afternoon able to go over until Monday.

I ask that the Clerk read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1936, and June 30, 1937, and for other purposes, namely:

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McLEAN: On page 2, line 1, after the word "years", strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, it is my policy to look with favor on all bills for carrying on the activities of the Government reported by the Committee on Appropriations. The committee is composed of men who have been so long in service as Members of the House that they have become experts in governmental affairs and are so familiar with the needs of the Government that the probable appropriations can be anticipated far in advance, and their judgment can be relied upon to such an extent that under ordinary circumstances with a limited amount of study it is possible to support their recommendations.

The pending bill is an exception to this rule. It carries appropriations amounting to $2,363,601,165.11. This amount is distributed over a number of propositions, any one of which is worthy of separate legislation and independent consideration, but all being included in the one measure makes it impossible to discriminate, and a Member must vote for all or none. In such a situation one must decide whether the items he approves are sufficient to justify disregard of items of which he disapproves. The item of $1,425,000,000 proposed for the Works Progress Administration and $246,000,000 for emergency conservation work are of so much importance and involve principles of such magnitude that they ought not to be tied into this bill, and should be separately considered on their own merits. Likewise, the items, amounting to $187,800,000 and $270,831,960, or a total of $458,631,860, for financing the social-security program involve principles entirely different from the above, and are of so much importance that they, too, should have separate consideration and a separate vote on their merits. Those items which are essentially for deficiencies necessary to be appropriated to meet requirements of the Government departments are all that should be included in this bill.

If one approves of the so-called relief items and disapproves of the construction and alteration of public buildings in the District of Columbia or the appropriation for the T. V. A., he must forego his objections in favor of the public-works appropriation. As the situation now stands, all other items in the bill will have to be subordinated to the importance of the appropriation for the public-works programs. Like the debris of a tornado, they will be carried along in the vortex of the big wind, which will blow $1,450,000,000 into departmental control without limitation or restriction.

What I have said is also true of the appropriation for the Tennessee Valley Authority. This is not a deficiency appropriation. It is the appropriation for their activities for the year 1937. The principle upon which this appropriation is based is far different from that of the social-security legislation or the appropriations for public works. To involve all of these matters may easily lead to confusion and hasty consideration, which is bound to result in waste and unnecessary expenditures.

In order to vote for this measure one should be satisfied with the wisdom and sufficiency of all of its items. The report of the committee in explanation of the items covers 52 closely printed pages. The hearings constitute two volumes—part 1 covering 1,408 pages, and part 2, pertaining entirely to emergency relief works of the P. W. A., covering 495 pages. The bill itself covers 99 pages, and an intelligent understanding requires reference to many other documents, and we are expected to attend faithfully the sessions of the House. None of the data was made available to Members until 12 o'clock yesterday, and we are asked to vote intelligently on the measure before the close of today, giving slightly more than 48 hours to study and understand what we are doing.

There is also another consideration that makes it difficult, and it is not going too far to say impossible, to vote intelligently on this measure. This ordinary appropriation bill disregards the fact that many of the appropriations are not to carry out projects authorized by Congress, and which have had the consideration of legislative committees, but the bill itself authorizes the project for which the appropriation is made. This practice is unfair to other committees of the House. When the Committee on Appropriations, in addition to the duties for which it was constituted, takes it upon itself to frame legislation which establishes policies, creates agencies, and confers powers, the legislative committees of the House are deprived of the functions which they were created to perform.

The committee by its report admits the irregularity of this procedure. As a preface to explaining 25 legislative items it states as follows:

The legislative provisions not heretofore enacted in connection with any other appropriation bill are recommended.

To make the matter more difficult the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations are held behind closed doors, and Members of the House were unwelcome guests. There is no reason why the situation concerning this bill should exist. Many of the items have been ready for presentation to the House for several days while we have been waiting for this bill to be presented, and much time has expired during which such items could have had mature deliberation. Instead, they were held in committee to be tacked onto this important measure and carried through by the momentum of the importance of the larger items.

There are many items in this bill of which I approve. There are others of which I very strongly disapprove. There is ample time to divide the several matters and they should be divided to give to each the consideration it deserves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For services in compiling, arranging for the printer, reading proof, indexing testimony, stenography and typewriting, supervision of the work, and expenses incurred in the contested-election cases of the Seventy-fourth Congress, as authorized by the act entitled "An act relating to contested elections", approved March 2, 1887 (U. S. C., title 2, secs. 201–226), $750.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, when we reach page 22 of this bill I will offer the following amendment:

On page 22 strike out lines 9 to 17, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The rates of pay for persons engaged upon any project under the foregoing appropriation shall be not less than the prevailing rates of pay for work of a similar nature as determined by the Works Progress Administration, and in the employment of such persons upon such projects, preference shall be given to unemployed citizens of the United States listed by the United States Employment Service, or any agency designated by it, and residing in the community within which such project is carried on."

I simply wanted to call this to the attention of the House at this time so that the Members will know what that amendment is when we reach page 22.

I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pro-forma amendment.

The pro-forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

EMPLOYEES' COMPENSATION COMMISSION

Employees' Compensation Fund, Emergency Relief: For administrative expenses and the payment of compensation in connection with the administration of the benefits authorized by section 2 of the act entitled "Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935", approved April 8, 1935 (49 Stat. 115–119), $6,000,000 of the special fund set up on the books of the Treasury pursuant to the provisions of the said act shall be available for expenditure during the fiscal year 1937.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky: Page 5, line 8, strike out the word "emergency" and the word "work."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. We have passed that paragraph long ago. The Clerk is reading now on page 7 of the bill.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. It is in the same paragraph.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman said page 5.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Page 6. We are now on page 7 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia press the point of order?

Mr. WOODRUM. I am compelled to do it, Mr. Chairman, if we ever intend to get through with this bill.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, it is in that same paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MCCORMACK). The Chair is ready to rule. The paragraph to which the gentleman has offered the amendment has been read and passed. For that reason the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: Page 6, line 18, after the word "fund", strike out the words "Emergency Relief."

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I am not, of course, in the confidence of the Democratic Members of the House. I do not know whether they propose to try to earmark the appropriations or some of them and place them under the Public Works Administration. If they propose to do so, or if any single member on the Democratic side proposes to offer an amendment, there is at least one vote on the Republican side that can be counted on. With me it is merely a matter of principle. I am opposed to granting large sums of money to the President, whether he be a Republican or a Democrat, or to any individual. I believe it is a betrayal of our representative and constitutional form of government. I believe the control of the purse strings to be the main reason for the existence of Congress, and that when the Members of Congress, in defiance of the Constitution and practically of their oath of office, surrender the control of the purse strings, they are betraying their own legislative powers. Already there are rumors in the country that the House of Representatives should be abolished.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York is not addressing himself to his pro-forma amendment. We have been liberal in debate and have not confined it to the bill, as the original agreement limiting debate contemplated; and I do not think gentlemen on either side of the aisle should undertake to make partisan political speeches at this time, and if I can stop it I am going to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

The section under consideration relates to the Employees' Compensation Commission.

The gentleman from New York will proceed in order.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I have said about all I wanted to say on the subject, and my views in reference to it are fairly well known. I doubt if I could change the minds of many Members of Congress anyway.

I want to vote for the bill; I want to vote for emergency relief; I want to vote for the Social Security Act and the compensation provided in this paragraph; but it is very difficult for me to vote for it when it involves a departure from a definite fundamental principle of government.

So far as emergency relief is concerned, I have just come back from the State of West Virginia, where I spoke last night and the night before. That State, due to relief money, may very likely go Democratic. [Applause.] Politics is the whole purpose of this bill. The bill makes a political football of relief and plays politics with human misery.

A distinguished Democratic Senator not making this statement in the Senate but in the State of West Virginia rocked that State by saying that this emergency relief, W. P. A. Administration, was nothing but a political machine, that the money was corruptly spent and thrown away. It was not a Republican speaking, it was a Democratic Senator elected by the Democratic voters of the State of West Virginia who made this bitter attack on the waste and misuse of public funds for relief purposes in his own State.

There is an additional reason I am opposed to this program. I believe also that you are creating a gigantic political machine at the expense of the taxpayers' money under guise of relief. This ought to be sufficient reason for most of us to vote against it. Mr. Chairman, I hope some Democratic Member will offer an amendment to earmark the funds for the Public Works Administration. He will have considerable support on our side. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS

For an additional amount for scientific research, special investigations, and technical reports in the field of aeronautics, including the same objects specified under this head in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1936, $1,367,000, to continue available until June 30, 1937, of which amount there may be expended not to exceed $1,100,000 for the construction and equipment of an additional wind tunnel, and not to exceed $267,000 for increasing the length of the present seaplane model testing tank and providing necessary additional equipment therefor.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, a particular responsibility, in connection with the relief of the unemployed, rests upon the Federal Government where governmental action has directly contributed to aggravating the problem. In such an instance Congress is not permitted to shield itself behind generalities and commonly accepted principles. Where unemployment comes about as the result of a law passed by Congress, the highest duty is laid upon the Government to afford relief to the suffering workers. Especially is this the case where the law involves interference with the normal activities of a business enterprise.

I refer, as a particular instance, to the Guffey coal bill. It has had effect in my district to reduce the activities of the mines and to increase the sufferings of the unemployed. Men who had jobs before the Guffey coal bill was passed now find themselves out of work as the direct result of its operations. I could name several mines in my district which have been forced to shut down because of this law. It has worked out very much as I believed it was designed to work, to wit, it has had a harmful effect on the high-cost mines.

Many of my friends were surprised by the violent and abusive criticism heaped upon me by a group of so-called labor leaders in radio speeches on last Thursday night over station WBRC, Birmingham. My friends knew that I was an old friend of the men who labor, that I had long been a believer in the organization of labor and had supported organized labor in many of its efforts, so that they could not understand why I should be now abused and vilified by this group. Some of them perhaps were tempted to say, "I knew it would come about; I told HUDDLESTON long ago that labor had no gratitude and that no matter how faithful he might be, labor would turn against him." I defend labor against this charge. Those who spoke over the radio were not from the rank and file of labor, they were merely labor politicians who manage to live off other men's labor without doing any labor themselves. Their voice is not the voice of the rank and file of the men who do the honest toil.

There are, of course, all kinds of labor leaders; some good, some bad, just as in other groups we find among them some honest men and some who are crooks; some are loyal to the cause, others always look out for number one; some are devoted servants of the rank and file, others sell them out every chance they get. These parasites of labor are called "labor skates", and it its not fair to condemn all labor because an occasional unworthy man may be found among them.

My service to organized labor has been on the basis of principle. I am sympathetic with all men who toil. I believe in organized labor as the bulwark of all working men whether organized or unorganized. In serving labor, I have been no abject slave. I have done what I thought was right. It has so happened that in the vast majority of cases I have been able to go conscientiously along with labor's program. In a few instances I have had convictions which did not permit me to do so.

In the list of my votes which these labor speakers criticized were votes on the social-security bill, the holding-company bill, and the Guffey coal bill. Of these the interest of labor was opposed to the passage of the holding-company bill as it meant fewer jobs and a reduction in employment. Probably, except for my efforts, the streetcar employees of my home city would now find themselves working for a court receiver if they had any work at all. The security bill was not a labor bill. In some respects it was antilabor. It lays a tax up to 3 percent upon the wages of employees. You will yet hear a lot of complaint about this measure before we are done with it.

On the Guffey bill I plead guilty. It was a so-called labor measure. I voted against it. In doing so I incurred the enmity of John Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers, and his order for my destruction was sent down to his handy man, Mr. Mitch, president of the Alabama United Mine Workers district, who was the leading speaker against me over radio. I knew that I would have trouble with Lewis because of my vote on the Guffey bill, but I could not allow my political interests to interfere with my duty to my own coal miners and to the other people in my district who are concerned with the mining industry. I could not betray my district to save my own skin. The Guffey bill, as I shall explain later, was aimed directly in this district and was intended to destroy its mining industry.

Lewis is an able man, but ruthless and tyrannical. He is now making war on craft unionism and threatens to disrupt the American Federation of Labor. If Lewis has his way all craft unions will be put out of business.

Lewis proclaims to the world that the trouble with the mining industry is that we have too many miners and too many mines and that the welfare of the industry requires that all high-cost mines be shut down and the industry concentrated into the rich coal fields of Kentucky, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and the other States of the central territory. This means that the industry in the lean coal fields, such as Alabama, Arkansas, Oklahoma, and elsewhere, will be destroyed. If Lewis has his way, the production of Alabama coal will be reduced to merely supplying the local demand. This is what he is driving for.

It is possible that Lewis is right and that if the coal business is concentrated in the rich fields, they could be better organized, wages placed on a higher basis, and everybody concerned with it benefited. This might be best for the industry as a whole, but it would be ruinous to our Alabama coal industry. It would mean starvation to thousands of families there who live off the coal business. It would strike a fatal blow to Birmingham, my home city. I would be a traitor, indeed, if, knowing this as I did, I had supported the Guffey bill.

This bill was drawn by Lewis' attorney. He had it introduced and secured its approval by the administration. Then he sent his henchmen out to get pledges of support from their Congressmen. Mr. Mitch came to my office and insisted that I support the bill. I did not discuss it with him, as I knew it was useless to do so. I made him no promises. He threatened that there would be a strike if the bill was not passed, but this did not affect my view. I knew what this bill was and what it was intended to do. Of course, he was disappointed. He went out of my office and has been uttering dire threats and criticism against me ever since. When I voted against the bill I knew that my doom was sealed so far as Mitch and Lewis were concerned. His Thursday night speech was merely carrying out the orders given Mitch by Lewis.

When the mine workers reorganized in Alabama in 1933 Mitch was sent down here by Lewis to take charge. He had been for years a hanger-on and handy man for Lewis. He had been living off the humble mine workers, but it had been a long time since he had done a stroke of honest labor. He was about as much of a miner as I am.

Lewis sent Mitch down here to take charge. We had our old faithful miners' officials here, such as Joe Clemo and Will Harrison, but Lewis sent down his own hired man to represent him. Lewis is in charge of this U. M. W. district. Mitch merely does what Lewis tells him to do. If he should fail for a single day to obey his orders, Mitch would go hiking back to Indiana, where he came from. In only a technical sense is Mitch a citizen of Alabama. Up until a few weeks ago he was not a voter in this State. He was just a carpetbagger from Indiana giving orders to our coal diggers.

Many do not know it, but the fact is that our mine workers' district is governed by a dictator. The miners are allowed no voice in governing themselves. They are ordered to strike without any vote. Then they are ordered to go back whenever Mitch and his boss Lewis want them to go back to work. They have nothing to say on either wages or conditions. Mitch is the Hitler of the Alabama mining district, and no criticism of him or question of his authority is tolerated. The oldest and most loyal member of the mine workers in Alabama was kicked out of the union because he dared to criticize the autocratic way in which they are ruled.

Mr. Mitch was unused to power in Indiana. When he got down to Alabama he suddenly found himself a big man and it went to his head. What is the matter with him is that he is a dictator through the power of the predominating numbers of his mine workers. And there hangs the tale of Alabama labor politics which I am relating.

Labor politicians are also of all sorts and kinds. Some of them are trying to get political positions, others are seeking preferment in the labor movement. Of course, some are honest and unselfish men. Among those in Alabama who are looking for political and labor jobs, it is generally recognized and well known that they are out of luck unless they are able to stand in with Mr. Mitch. Mitch has become the labor dictator of Alabama through the power of the mine workers. They are so numerous that they have a controlling influence in labor bodies. By making a few shrewd trades Mitch has a majority at such meetings. Any labor leader who does not kow-tow to Mitch is cut off from preferment in the organizations and from any chance to promote his own interests. This is known to every well-informed labor man in the Birmingham district.

By the means I have described Mitch was able to control the recent convention of the Alabama State Federation of Labor. He attended the convention backed with his followers. It was either knuckle under to Mitch and go along with him or no labor politician could hope for anything. Mitch had himself elected as State president. He had others elected to other offices, and all of them have got to do what Mitch says or get out. It is small wonder that Mitch has their help in carrying out Lewis' orders to destroy me. This is the explanation of the criticism that they make against me.

If the Supreme Court does not strike down the Guffey bill, our poor old coal miners in due time will find out what has been done to them. They have been betrayed by one who had sworn to protect their interests. This mining district is being run not in the interest of the men who work here but in the interest of John Lewis and in the interest of the rich central fields. The time will come when this will be fully disclosed. I am willing to wait for that time in order to receive the approval which our coal miners ought now to feel for me. I am speaking now as a matter of duty, not for any political benefit. I do not want to stir up any strife in the miners' unions, but it is my duty to tell these men, hundreds of whom are my personal friends, that their interests are being betrayed by those sworn to protect them who have turned traitor to them. I am not one of these. I have been faithful.

I will not allow Mr. Mitch and his buccaneers to seize the good ship of labor in Alabama without telling the crew that he is driving them onto the rocks. Under Mitch leadership the State federation is bound for ruin. If he has his way, the labor movement in Alabama will receive the hardest blow that it has ever sustained.

I was not the aggressor in this scrap. Mitch started in on me first. He deserves to be exposed. The laboring people of Alabama, and particularly those connected with the mining industry, should send this Indiana carpetbagger back to his own home. We have got sense enough to run our own business. We call on Mr. Lewis: "Take your dictator back; our miners want the right to run their own affairs and to control their own business."

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to detain the House unnecessarily, but under this particular section of the bill, National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, I do want to call the attention of the Members to the importance of the work of this organization. The information they have should be made available to all Members of the House at all times. This bureau collects world-wide information on the status of all aviation matters. I believe you will agree with me that it is very important that we annually provide definite information in the way of charts such as I placed in the RECORD 2 years ago, showing definitely the exact status of all war planes and engines in the world, and their comparative strength. This bureau because of its set-up can definitely furnish this information and should furnish it to some agency such as the Congressional Library where this information may be carefully checked and be available to all Members of Congress. I have introduced legislation of this kind, and at this point, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and make this bill a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

H. R. 12629

A bill to provide the Congress with information on the state of development of the aerial war craft of the United States in comparison with that of other nations

Be it enacted, etc., That the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics shall be required to prepare annually and deposit in the Library of Congress, the first week in January, 100 copies of a confidential report for the use of the Military and Naval Affairs Committees, furnishing essential data with ready-reference charts and tables comparing the specifications, performance, and other military qualifications of the war craft of the United States with those of the other leading air powers of the world. The sources, both public and confidential, of such information shall be cited so fully and specifically that the Library of Congress can readily check or verify all the data of said report.

In preparing this annual report the advisory committee may use its own secret files, and shall have the cooperation of the United States Air Service and the use of their secret files. The Library of Congress shall keep its copies of the report confidential in locked cases, except insofar as made public by Congress, and shall promptly check the statements of the report against information available in its own collections, and shall file copies of such check in ready form for use with the report itself.

Mr. STACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 3, line 16, to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to return to page 3, line 16, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I certainly do not want to be discourteous to any of my colleagues, but it is going to be absolutely impossible to go forward with this program if we turn back. I am awfully sorry, but I shall have to object.

Mr. STACK. This message came to me from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY], who asked me to offer this amendment, but the message came too late. In fairness to him and to the people interested, I think the gentleman ought to make an exception.

Mr. WOODRUM. I should like to make an exception, but there are many Members who want to turn back. One of our colleagues on the other side wanted to turn back just a while ago, and I was forced to object.

Mr. STACK. I am not asking for an additional appropriation.

Mr. WOODRUM. I appreciate that, and I think all the Members ought to be treated alike. I objected to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, and I am forced to object to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STACK].

Mr. STACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the amendment I was about to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The amendment referred to follows:

Page 3, line 16, after the comma, insert the following names: V. G. Andrews, Michael Kostick, and Walter C. Stewart, messengers on night and day duty during the second session of the Seventy-Fourth Congress, $500 each; in all the sum of $3,500, to be paid from the appropriation for printing and binding for Congress for the fiscal year 1936.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, I have made some study of this bill, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, the appropriation bill we have under consideration, among other things, appropriates the money necessary for unemployment relief for the next fiscal year in the sum of $1,425,000,000.

Every taxpayer in the United States is interested in how this money is to be expended.

To provide a means to take care of unemployed labor in the country, the present administration has created two organizations—the Public Works Administration, extending to every State and, I may say, every community in the Nation; the other, the Works Progress Administration, which is a reorganization of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration. The Public Works Administration was the Government agency created to finance permanent public-works projects on a sound and economical basis, constituting an organization of efficient and trained technical personnel. Branches in every State have been set up, commonly referred to as the P. W. A. The record of the P. W. A. in providing the means for economical construction of permanent and valuable public-works projects throughout the Nation is too well known for me to go into details here. Under the plan of this Administration any projects undertaken will be financed to insure completion.

It appears that the Works Progress Administration was created to take up the slack in unemployment, and was designed and intended primarily to create jobs for the unemployed, and to relieve an emergency in unemployment throughout the country.

In studying the provisions of this bill we find that no funds are appropriated for the Public Works Administration, although we know that projects totaling over $700,000,000 have been examined and approved by the Public Works Administration on which work can be started as soon as the necessary funds are appropriated. It is also well known that in connection with hundreds of these projects communities throughout the country have approved bond issues with the expectation of doing their share only to find now that the Public Works Administration is unable to proceed because of lack of funds. While no money is provided to finance this great constructive program of essential projects, all funds appropriated in this bill for unemployment relief are to be handed over to the W. P. A., a temporary emergency organization.

The money is to be spent on many projects which are of little permanent value, a considerable number of which will not be completed. Mr. Chairman, I believe we have met the emergency situation in unemployment, and the time has come when any funds spent to relieve unemployment should finance the construction of permanent projects on a sound and economic basis. For this reason I am in favor of dividing the proposed appropriation of $1,425,000,000 in this bill and setting aside $700,000,000 for the Public Works Administration to finance the projects that have been and will be approved under the plans and direction of this organization, leaving the remainder of the appropriation for the W. P. A. to carry out the plan for which it was created; that is, to take up slack unemployment and relieve any emergency.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to vote for such an amendment.

The pro-forma amendments were withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Printing and binding: For an additional amount for printing and binding, Smithsonian Institution, including the same objects specified under this head in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1936, fiscal year 1936, $12,000, to remain available until June 30, 1937.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I recently made a public statement in which I stated I heartily approved of proper relief for the needy and advocated its management and distribution through State agencies rather than through regimentation and bureaucracy here in Washington. I stand on that principle now. I think the bill before us, continuing the bungling, bureaucratic, boondoggling methods in the present distribution of aid, is entirely wrong. It is wrong from the standpoint of waste, extravagance, and graft and from the standpoint of results. If anyone can claim that the Hopkins' method of relief expenditure and waste of large sums of money is anything but a dismal failure, I should like to hear it. Why continue it?

Mr. Chairman, according to the Treasury's own figures, Congress has already appropriated nearly eighteen billions for recovery and relief, yet we still have 11,000,000 unemployed and 20,000,000 on relief. The necessity for relief continues unabated, which proves conclusively that the administration has failed to solve the problem, or even make any improvement.

We have nothing to show for the billions that have been squandered except the size of the national debt, which will have been piled up to the unprecedented total of thirty-four billions by next July. This colossal debt will have to be paid by present and future generations, including the present beneficiaries of the relief program. After the additional billion and a half dollars provided by this bill have been spent we will still have the unemployment and relief problem with us.

The worst feature of the present relief set-up is that nearly half the funds are used up in overhead and waste and never get to those in need. The only thing it has done is to set up a fine political machine; and I am opposed to using either public funds for this purpose or telling those in need that they must apply to the political machinery of the present administration in order to get relief. That is entirely wrong in principle, as well as being a waste and extravagance, so far as the money of the people is concerned.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot see why as great a committee as we know the Appropriations Committee is should bring in a bill here involving $2,364,000,000 without giving the House an opportunity to see it inside of 24 hours before it is brought up on the floor, and then brag in the report, as they do, that it is $23,859,000 less than the Budget estimate. It seems to me that $23,000,000 in savings is really worth while; but, on the other hand, when you figure it is only 1 percent of the tremendous aggregate involved in this bill, it is a very minor matter to call to the attention of the Members of the House and the country.

I am absolutely opposed to the conditions under which the Democratic Party today is offering this bill to the country. As I have said, I am in favor of relief for the needy, and always have been, but I wish it were possible to vote on this matter on the basis of Federal and State cooperation, with the distribution of funds through State agencies. Let us do away with this bureaucratic form of government, this waste and extravagance, and set up common-sense business principles in connection with the use of the taxpayers' money.

The only real solution of the unemployment problem will come through increased private employment, but the policies of the present administration have all tended to harrass business and prevent or discourage expansion and reemployment. At the same time, the reckless spending that is going on and the loose fiscal policy that is being pursued each generate fear and create uncertainty as to the future. Some day the Treasury's ability to borrow money with which to carry on the administration's reckless and wasteful expenditures will cease. There will not be any chance of obtaining further loans, and when that time comes chaos will follow.

If the administration would put recovery ahead of reform, and would adopt definite and sound monetary and fiscal policies, business would undoubtedly take great strides forward, and the necessity for relief would largely disappear. In the meantime, however, if the administration of relief expenditures were transferred to the States, with the Federal Government contributing thereto, there is no doubt but that a great saving in the cost could be effected and that those in need would be better and more adequately cared for.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro-forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "The Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933", approved May 18, 1933 (U. S. C., title 16, ch. 12a), as amended by the act approved August 31, 1935 (49 Stat. 1075–1081), including the continued construction of Norris Dam, Wheeler Dam, Pickwick Landing Dam, Guntersville Dam, and Chickamauga Dam (hereafter to be known as McReynolds Dam), and the beginning of construction on a dam on the Hiwassee River, a tributary of the Tennessee River, at or near Fowler Bend, and the continuation of preliminary investigations as to the appropriate location and type of a dam on the lower Tennessee River, and the acquisition of necessary land, the clearing of such land, relocation of highways, and the construction or purchase of transmission lines and other facilities, and all other necessary works authorized by such acts, and for printing and binding, law books, books of reference, newspapers, periodicals, purchase, maintenance, and operation of passenger-carrying vehicles, rents in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and all necessary salaries and expenses connected with the organization, operation, and investigations of the Tennessee Valley Authority, fiscal year 1937, $39,900,000: Provided, That this appropriation and any unexpended balance on June 30, 1936, in the "Tennessee Valley Authority Fund, 1936", and the receipts of the Tennessee Valley Authority from all sources during the fiscal year 1937 (except as limited by sec. 26 of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, as amended), shall be covered into and accounted for as one fund to be known as the "Tennessee Valley Authority Fund, 1937", to remain available until June 30, 1937, and to be available for the payment of obligations chargeable against the "Tennessee Valley Authority Fund, 1936."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 19, line 4, after the word "Dam", the parenthesis, and the comma, strike out the words "and the beginning of construction on a dam on the Hiwassee River, a tributary of the Tennessee River, at or near Fowler Bend"; and line 18, page 19, strike out the sign and figures "$39,900,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$35,562,772."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this is an opportunity to save $4,337,000 and not appropriate any money for the beginning of the Hiwassee Dam. The Tennessee Valley Authority was authorized by an appropriation which was carried last year to begin construction of this dam. They did not begin construction of the dam, but decided among themselves that they would like to begin the construction of a dam known as the Fontana Dam, by which they could go to the Aluminum Co. of America and pay $3,000,000 for a piece of property that I understand changed hands a little while ago for $250,000.

Mr. Chairman, they came to the committee and asked the committee to change the language so that, instead of building the Hiwassee Dam, they could build the Fontana Dam and go into that matter, but the committee did not give them this privilege. The committee did insert the language I am trying to strike out here, which permitted them to go ahead with the Hiwassee Dam.

The major items of flood control there are the so-called Norris Dam up the Clinch River, the Chickamauga Dam, which is above Chattanooga, and the Guntersville Dam below. It does not seem to me that this dam on the Hiwassee River, a branch stream, which will cost nearly $20,000,000, should be proceeded with. It is not necessary from a power standpoint or a flood-control standpoint, and it is absolutely ridiculous to go into the proposition. Why not erect the dams that are already started and not build any more until we know more about how this is going to work out and see just what kind of thing it is that is in front of us.

I hope the Committee will adopt this amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I listened with interest to my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] stating that the Tennessee Valley Authority proposed to pay the owners of the Fontana site $3,000,000 for this site. That is not correct. The proposition was to allow them $3,000,000 worth of electric energy. They were to pay for the site with the electrical energy to the extent of $3,000,000 at the established rate.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Is it the gentleman's idea that the $3,000,000 of electrical energy is not worth anything?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is my idea it is not the same as $3,000,000 in cash; but this is aside from the question here.

This Congress at the last session made an appropriation of $1,000,000 to commence the construction of Hiwassee Dam. The Hiwassee Dam was investigated both by the Appropriations Committee of the House and the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, and these two committees came to the conclusion that it is essential to the flood-prevention work in this area. It will ultimately produce power, but there is no intention of putting in extensive power machinery at that dam at the time of construction. It is essential for flood prevention and it is essential for navigation. Therefore, the committee thinks this provision should be left in the bill.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I wish to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that this is another increase for T. V. A. You have been asked to increase the appropriations for dams for the T. V. A. for the last 2 years. Where are you going to get the money? [Laughter and applause.] You will find that the dams that you are now authorizing will only rise up to damn you in the future, and it is time you stopped damming this country. Let me show you that you are doing it. I read on page 19, lines 1 to 4:

> Including the continued construction of Norris Dam, Wheeler Dam, Pickwick Landing Dam, Guntersville Dam, and Chickamauga Dam.

Do you not think it is time to get the Government out of all kinds of business that interferes with its citizens? Stop Russianism, communism, and socialism.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not often take the time of the House, but there is one thing in this provision of the bill that, in my judgment, is so well deserved that I could not spare this opportunity of calling attention to it.

In lines 3 and 4, on page 19, the name of the Chickamauga Dam is to be changed to McReynolds Dam.

Perhaps no Member of Congress is more familiar with the record of Judge McREYNOLDS with regard to the Tennessee River than I am. Ever since he has been a Member of the Congress he has constantly appeared before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors from time to time in behalf of some provision with regard to the Tennessee River. He has shown more familiarity with it than any other man of my knowledge who is a Member of this body, and perhaps no one except the engineers of the War Department is more familiar with every phase of the Tennessee River, from its head to its mouth, than Judge SAM D. McREYNOLDS, of Tennessee. I am heartily in favor of this honor which, it seems, is about to be conferred upon him. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. McSWAIN. As chairman of the legislative committee, the gentleman recognizes the great importance of preserving the rights of legislative committees, does he not?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. McSWAIN. And the gentleman recognizes that this is legislation. I have an amendment that will deal with the situation at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 51, noes 102.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 19, in line 2, after the words "Pickwick Landing Dam", insert the following: "hereafter to be known as 'Rankin Dam.'"

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. I wonder if the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee is going to protect the committee.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I realize that it is legislation on an appropriation bill, and I submit it to the Chair for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. It is very clear that it is legislation on an appropriation bill, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 19, line 2, after the words "Pickwick Landing Dam", insert the following: "(known as 'Rankin Dam')."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment that it is legislation on an appropriation bill. It is evidently an attempt to change the name and call it "Rankin Dam." It is in the teeth of legislation that has been attempted time and time again. There are bills before the Committee on Military Affairs to change the name of this dam to "Rankin Dam."

Mr. KNUTSON. I should like to ask the gentleman if it is not customary to wait until the man is dead before they name a dam for him?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes; it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will permit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is not legislation. It is language merely descriptive, and such amendments have been repeatedly held not to be legislation.

I recall two decisions on this point. They were made by one of the greatest parliamentarians who has served in the House, James R. Mann, of Illinois.

The first was made in 1905 when an amendment was offered, I think, to the Naval bill.

The language provided that ships or armament should be of "native manufacture." The proposition was defended, as I recollect, by Mr. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania. At any rate the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, held that those words were merely descriptive and that it was not legislation.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield with pleasure to the distinguished leader on the other side of the House.

Mr. SNELL. If the words are merely descriptive, why will they have the effect of changing the name of the dam?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. They do not change the name of the dam. It is not proposed to change the name of the dam.

Mr. SNELL. But is not that the intention? I call it legislation. Is not that the intention of the amendment?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman from New York, being one of the ablest parliamentarians in the House, knows that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole may not speculate as to the intention of an amendment. He must predicate his decision on the amendment before him in the language in which it is written. He cannot go back of what is on the face of it to surmise what is the purpose of a Member in offering an amendment. This amendment merely further describes the Pickwick Landing Dam; it does not propose a change in the name; it merely adds the descriptive language "known as the Rankin Dam."

Mr. SNELL. What is the purpose of offering that amendment at this time and at this place if it is not to change the name of the dam?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. As I have said, the purpose of the proponent is not a question before the Chairman of the Committee. However, a careful reading of the amendment indicates that it is offered for the purpose of clarifying the provision in the bill and more definitely describing the dam, to which the appropriation applies, and therefore is not subject to a point of order. Words merely descriptive are not legislation.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. PETTENGILL. If a bill were introduced and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs to change the description of the existing dam to some other description, would that be properly referred to a legislative committee?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Of course, no such bill is before us. The suggestion cannot have the slightest application to the point at issue.

Mr. Chairman, the same question came up again in 1908. It is reported, as I recall, in section 8524 of the old supplement to the precedents, and by a coincidence, Mr. Mann was again Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. In passing on the question, Mr. Mann again held that words merely descriptive were not legislation. That is the rule of the House. Words merely descriptive cannot be construed as legislation. The question then arises, Is this amendment merely descriptive? I am certain anyone who reads it will find it impossible to place any other construction on it.

The additional language makes more definite, more accurate, more specific the particular dam to be provided for. It merely further describes it. The dam is located adjacent to Mr. RANKIN's district. Mr. RANKIN has had more to do with it than any other Member of Congress. He has been more closely identified with it and has rendered greater service in the enactment of this class of legislation than any other Member of the House, and it is only natural that we should know of it and speak of it as the Rankin Dam, and to make certain there will be no question about it in the consideration of this piece of legislation we further describe it here as the Rankin Dam.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I am glad to yield to my friend from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I say to the gentleman from Missouri that Pickwick Landing is really not the name of the dam anyway. That is descriptive also. The dam was first authorized in the river and harbor appropriation bill of 1930, to be located at Pickwick Landing, but the dam has never been constructed. It is now under construction, but it has no name in fact.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have the gentleman from Texas bear out my contention. That is all the more reason why this amendment should be held in order and this language added to the bill. The chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors testifies to the need of it. He says that the Pickwick Landing Dam is not the name of it. It is doubly necessary therefore to designate it by a name about which there can be no doubt, a name everyone will recognize and understand—the Rankin Dam.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. First let me answer the question of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McSWAIN. But the gentleman from Texas is in error.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I shall yield to the gentleman in time. I am very fond of the gentleman from South Carolina. He and I are both of Irish extraction. But I am certain he would not want me to be discourteous to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors by failing to answer his inquiry. He says that is not the name of it. Then we must be specific, we must be certain there can be no misunderstanding as to exactly what dam we are legislating on; and so to be certain that there may be no misapprehension, we add the descriptive words "Rankin Dam."

I cite the chairman to section 3864 in Hinds' Precedents and section 1445 in the supplement. In both those sections he will observe it is held that words merely descriptive do not constitute legislation.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Most assuredly.

Mr. McSWAIN. To correct the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD], for whom I have the greatest reverence and respect, I refer the gentleman and the Chair to the act of May 18, 1933, setting up the Tennessee Valley Authority, where in section 4, subsection (d), it is specifically stated that such dams and reservoirs in the Tennessee Valley and its tributaries as in conjunction with the Wilson Dam, the Norris Dam, the Pickwick Landing Dam, and so forth, so that it was named by the Congress and approved by the President on May 18, 1933, 3 years after the act referred to by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is a question between the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN]. [Laughter.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman from Texas states the dam has no name and the gentleman from South Carolina insists that it has. In any event, that is not the question before the House. But in view of the uncertainty between the two gentlemen, who should know more about it than anybody else, let us avoid any possible controversy as to its identity and insert language that everyone will understand and approve. Mr. Chairman, the amendment does not propose to change the name. It merely adds descriptive language more definitely describing it. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that words merely descriptive are not legislation, and under the law of the House the amendment is in order.

Mr. SNELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule, but the Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. I have no desire to take the time of the House if the Chair is prepared to rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. The only question I wanted to raise is this: I have no contention with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] relative to descriptive words; but everyone knows—and the gentleman admitted in the argument which he had with the gentleman from Texas—that this is for the purpose of naming it the Rankin Dam. As far as I am concerned, I would just as soon have that name as any other, but those are not descriptive words as presented in this amendment, and everybody in the House knows it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCORMACK). The Chair is prepared to rule. The Chair entirely agrees with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], with reference to the use of descriptive words. Therefore, the question in the mind of the present occupant of the chair is whether the amendment is descriptive or whether it constitutes legislation. Without regard to whether or not it brings about a change in the name of the dam from "Pickwick Landing Dam" to "Rankin Dam", it is the opinion of the Chair, with profound respect for the opinion of the gentleman from Missouri, one of the outstanding parliamentarians of all time, that the amendment does not constitute descriptive language; that it constitutes legislation. It is an addition to the language used in this bill. The Chair would rule the same whether or not the legislation referred to by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] contained the words "Pickwick Landing Dam" or not, because that name is included in the bill now before the House.

Profoundly respecting the views of the gentleman from Missouri, and with considerable hesitation in disagreeing with him, it is the opinion of the Chair that the point of order is well taken, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McSWAIN: Page 19, line 3, after the word "dam", strike out the parenthesis and the words "hereafter to be known as McReynolds Dam", and the parenthesis following said words.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE. Is this offered as a point of order or as an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is offered as an amendment by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman from South Carolina does not raise a point of order, then?

Mr. McSWAIN. I could not raise a point of order. All points of order were waived.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina has offered an amendment which has been reported by the Clerk, and the gentleman is now recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment from a strict sense of duty, as chairman of the legislative committee having charge of this matter. From what you have heard here you have already seen just where we will get if we start naming dams for Members of this Congress while they are still living. You see plainly where we will get. I will explain just why it is that, although there are several bills pending before the committee that has jurisdiction, as has been held by the Chairman [Mr. McCORMACK], this cannot be done. There is one bill, offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE], to name the Pickwick Landing Dam the John E. Rankin Dam. There is one by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHANDLER] to name it the Senator McKellar Dam. There is another one by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. McGEHEE] to name it the Percy Quin Dam; and there is another one pending, offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STARNES] to name the Guntersville Dam the Franklin D. Roosevelt Dam.

The committee has not considered any of those bills. We have had to explain to the gentlemen who have been urging the consideration of those bills the situation we got into the last time. What was it? The last time, when the T. V. A. amendments were before this House, on motion by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS], this House unanimously adopted an amendment to name Pickwick Landing Dam the "Percy Quin Dam." Percy Quin was formerly chairman of this Committee on Military Affairs and literally gave his life on the 4th of February 1932, fighting the Power Trust and fighting the Fertilizer Trust to keep them from getting possession of this great natural resource down there. When the bill went to the Senate and went to conference, what were we met with? We were told by the Senate conferees that, even though it was named for a dead man, a former chairman of the committee which had jurisdiction of the matter, a man who gave his life as an evidence of his devotion to the cause of agriculture and adequate fertilizer from that great resource, yet if we started this kind of thing and let it go through, it would produce heartburnings among others that they had not been thus honored. It would cause trouble, and they said, "We, the Senate conferees, beg you, the House conferees, not to insist upon this amendment, although the House has unanimously agreed to it."

Now, we agree to that, but we first had an agreement with the Senate conferees. The men who will probably be in charge of any legislation of this sort in the future agreed to this effect, that they would notify the directors of the T. V. A. that no more dams should be named by them for anybody, dead or alive, and that hereafter the committees of the Houses having jurisdiction of these matters would recommend to the Houses to name dams only for dead people. That is why we have not considered your bills, you the authors of these several bills referred to; we have stuck to that agreement.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Would it be possible during the expansion of this T. V. A. to build enough dams so that every deserving Democrat could have his name on a dam? [Laughter.]

Mr. McSWAIN. I had hoped that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who was active in regard to the legislation before this House on T. V. A. a year ago, every one of whose amendments I supported, and to whom I reported as to the progress of the conference—I had hoped that he would see the wisdom of respecting the legislative committee here and would not oppose this amendment. I am asking him now if he will not agree, because do we not all see where it is going to lead? If you let this stay in, then JOHN RANKIN and all his friends will be sore because they have been cut out.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 5 minutes after the gentleman from South Carolina concludes his statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield for the purpose of submitting this unanimous-consent request?

Mr. WOODRUM. It is merely to expedite the consideration of the bill.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 5 minutes after the gentleman from South Carolina has concluded his statement. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield.

Mr. MAVERICK. Was a noted battle fought there?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes; the Battle of Chickamauga was fought upon the high ground just above there, and it is a historical name that will stay in history for all time. Tens of thousands of men took part in that desperate battle. It is a name that should stand and be kept in memory forever.

Now, I love my friend from Tennessee, and I have honored him; I have paid tribute on this floor to the part he has taken. The RECORD will show that I have spoken for him; but if we start this, Mr. Chairman, I will tell you where we are going to end: When it gets to the Senate there will be a scramble to strike out the House name and put in the name of some Senator. We had better be careful. We had better name it the Andrew Jackson Dam or the Andrew Johnson Dam, or the James K. Polk Dam—after men from Tennessee who became Presidents of the United States.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Is it not a fact that the Norris Dam was named after a living Senator—Senator NORRIS?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes; and Senator NORRIS agreed it should stop right there. He expressed regret it had been done. He was one of the Senate conferees.

Mr. WHITE. I would agree to that, too, had I been in his place.

Mr. McSWAIN. He did not start it. He regretted it, and I believe he was as sincere in that as in anything else he ever said.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment may close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment may close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, this is a controversial amendment. I object.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. First, gentlemen, let us cool down. We are spending about half an hour over the mere name of a dam in a bill that carries $2,365,000,000. It looks to me like foolishness, and we should stop. That is why we want this debate closed.

First, I want to vindicate the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS] from initiating the naming of this dam for himself. It was not initiated by him; he had nothing to do with initiating it. In fact, the bill follows what now is the name of the dam down there in his district. They had a great gathering down there when it was known this dam was to be constructed, a barbecue, or whatever you want to call it. They were his constituents; his people; Tennesseans. A motion was made and unanimously carried that the dam be named "McReynolds Dam."

The committee adopted the name which had been suggested by the people who live where the dam is being constructed.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. Can the gentleman inform the Members of the House that there was nobody in that vast crowd that sponsored the naming of this dam who was friendly to the gentleman?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Of course, his friends sponsored the name down there. Now, one word as to what the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] and his colleague in the Senate decided to do. They do not want to name anything for a living man. Do we have to die and go to that great unknown in order to receive a little honor and recognition at the hands of our Government? I am one of those who believe in giving flowers to the living as well as to the dead.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. McREYNOLDS has made a splendid Congressman. He has devoted his life work to getting this dam started. I think it would be very befitting to name it after him.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. Regardless of the merits of the individual service that any of these gentlemen may render in the House, does the gentleman think it is good policy to name these public projects that happen to be in a certain Congressman's district after that Congressman?

Mr. BUCHANAN. If it is in the Congressman's district and he has devoted his life and energies to it, and made sacrifices for it, I have no objection to that procedure, and I think it would be a just and honest tribute to pay to the Congresman. God knows, we get few tributes otherwise.

Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say. My friend from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] says this is legislation on an appropriation bill, but remember this does not come within the ruling of the Chair. The Pickwick Dam was named in the law that created the Tennessee Valley Authority. The Chickamauga Dam is not. We have followed Mr. McREYNOLDS' own constituents in the naming of this dam.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up the full time allotted me under the rules of the House. It is well known by the Members that I have rarely taken the floor upon controversial questions because, as a matter of fact, presiding over the House as I do, I have always felt that insofar as possible I should maintain a nonpartisan attitude. But this dam is located in my own State. I know something of the work that the distinguished Congressman from the Third District of Tennessee has done with reference to the establishment of this dam. I therefore feel that I should be excused if I take this opportunity to express my own personal opinion and my own personal hope with reference to the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I know what Judge McREYNOLDS has done with reference to the establishment of this dam. I know, and I choose my words when I make this statement, that if it had not been for Judge McREYNOLDS there would be no dam there at the present time. It might have come in the future. It was due to his earnest insistance and his knowledge of the necessities of the situation that the dam was located there and is now in process of construction. I think this is a merited tribute to pay to the gentleman, and I think it is a deserving honor to call it McReynolds Dam in recognition of his work. [Applause.]

The people down in his district who are familiar with his work, who are familiar with what he has done, desire this dam to be named the McReynolds Dam in recognition of his faithful service as their Congressman. I think the same might properly be said of the entire State of Tennessee.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be defeated. I cannot agree with those who say that because Judge McREYNOLDS is living this dam should not be named for him. Congress can take care of those things in the future. Congress can distinguish in the future with reference to the naming of dams or any other Government activities in the Nation. I think this is a case where his colleagues who respect and admire him have the opportunity not only to do him honor, but to do him justice by the rejection of this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McLEAN) there were—ayes 40, noes 110.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PEARSON: On page 19, line 8, after the word "river", insert the words "and the beginning of construction of a dam on the lower Tennessee River."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. PEARSON. Will the gentleman withhold his point of order?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, if adopted, will provide for the beginning of construction during the next fiscal year of a necessary dam on the Tennessee River.

The amendment, if adopted, will not increase the amount of appropriation carried in the bill, nor will it increase the expenditures ultimately expected to be made by the Tennessee Valley Authority if Congress continues to approve the plan as outlined by that Authority. It simply carries a specific authorization for the beginning of construction of a dam on the lower Tennessee River during the year 1937 instead of 1939. It happens to be a dam which the directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority have already definitely approved and one which they say will be necessary in order to complete a unified system of transportation on the river.

Under the committee report and under the provisions carried in this bill, there has been allocated for exploring and for preliminary investigations for a dam on the lower Tennessee River the sum of $650,000. You will find this in the committee report when, as a matter of fact, the directors of the Authority, in their report rendered to this Congress on April 1, definitely state that the dam is to be located at a point near Gilbertsville, Ky. So any investigating or any exploring to the extent of over one-half million dollars is absolutely unnecessary, uncalled for, and would be a useless expenditure of that sum of money.

I am offering this amendment in good faith, and I am not offering it for the purpose of obtaining a dam in my district. As a matter of fact, this dam, according to present plans, is to be located in the district of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREGORY], but not far removed from my district.

Mr. Chairman, the Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority are preparing and planning to build a dam across the Tennessee and the Ohio Rivers at Paducah, at an expenditure of $200,000,000, if the Congress should approve it; and in the event a dam is constructed on the lower Tennessee at or near Gilbertsville, or at Aurora, as originally planned, it will cost $60,000,000 to construct it, and for this Congress to authorize its immediate construction will mean a saving to the taxpayers of this country in the amount of $140,000,000 unless the plans of the Directors of the Authority go awry.

I am not objecting to the Ohio River being developed when and if it becomes necessary, but I say it is the duty of the Congress to require the Tennessee Valley Authority to complete the program for which it was created—and that is, the full development of the Tennessee River—and not permit it to branch out in exploiting other rivers until this program has been completed.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if we can get a unanimous-consent agreement to close debate on this amendment in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman understands there is a reservation of a point of order pending?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Certainly.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I would be pleased to withhold, but I would like to have 3 or 4 minutes to make some observations, and if I could have this time in opposition to the pending amendment I shall withhold my own amendment.

Mr. WOODRUM. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes following the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, who has just been granted an additional 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take the additional 5 minutes, but I want to make this further observation.

One week ago yesterday the two Senators from Kentucky and the two Senators from my own State and the Representative from Kentucky [Mr. GREGORY] and myself had a conference with the President of the United States with reference to the amendment to which I am now addressing myself, and the President expressed his approval of the amendment which I am offering, stating that he had no desire or disposition to agree to anything which would upset the balanced plan of procedure as outlined by the directors of the Authority, but that this dam on the lower Tennessee had to be completed before the projects outlined by the Authority would ever be worth anything and that he personally acquiesced in the beginning of immediate construction of a dam on the lower Tennessee and would have no objection to increasing the allocation of $650,000, as shown in the committee's report, to $1,000,000 for the purpose of using the appropriation in actual construction work on this dam.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEARSON. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Is it not a fact that the construction of this dam is necessary to link the Tennessee with the Ohio for navigation?

Mr. PEARSON. The money heretofore spent on the Tennessee River will never be of any value to the people from Pickwick Landing Dam to Paducah, Ky., until this dam is completed. It is about 264 miles from Paducah to Pickwick Landing Dam, and the construction of a dam at Gilbertsville, Ky., or Aurora, will guarantee a 9-foot uniform channel in the river from the dam site to Pickwick Landing Dam, and without it no transportation facilities will ever be available on that section of the river, and without this the people that far removed from Pickwick Landing Dam no doubt will be deprived of the privileges of cheap power.

Mr. Chairman, I am not asking for a dam simply because I think it would be advantageous to me to have it in this section but I am trying to get it in order to unify the program which this Congress has authorized the Tennessee Valley Authority to carry out and to forestall the Authority in its evident desire and ambition to embrace the Ohio, the Tennessee, and perhaps other rivers, and undertaking to put over an impracticable, extremely expensive, and indefensible program. I had hoped the committee would accept my amendment, and in any event I trust it will be approved by the committee.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York insist upon his point of order?

Mr. TABER. I do, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. TABER. That it is legislation on an appropriation bill and is an item not authorized by law.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from New York to withhold his point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to have some information from the gentleman from Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Tennessee point out to the Chair any existing law which authorizes the construction contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. PEARSON. The act which created the Tennessee Valley Authority provided for the construction of necessary dams on the river to carry out the projects stated therein—that is, for national defense and navigation.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, in order to make my point of order clear, let me say that this is beyond the scope of the Tennessee Valley Authority. The word "necessary" requires the fact to be established in ruling upon the language.

It was stated by the Tennessee Valley Authority in the hearings that this Gilbertville proposition involved a dam and a canal—a large dam in the Ohio which would cover operation of both the Cumberland and the Ohio as well as the Tennessee. This Tennessee Valley Authority relates only to the dams entirely within their authority covering the Tennessee only. This goes beyond the scope of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. HILL of Alabama rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I do. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is clearly in order. I call the Chair's attention to section 2, subsection (j), of Public Law 412, Seventy-fourth Congress, which is the amendatory act of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

In setting out the power of the Tennessee Valley Authority to build dams, it says:

> Shall have power to construct such dams and reservoirs in the Tennessee River and its tributaries as in conjunction with the Wilson Dam, the Norris Dam, the Wheeler Dam, the Pickwick Landing Dam, now under construction, will produce a 9-foot channel in said river and maintain the water supply from Knoxville to its mouth and best serve to promote navigation in the Tennessee River and its tributaries and control the distribution of its waters in the Tennessee and Mississippi Rivers drainage basin.

I think under the language there can be no question but that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee is in order. The language authorizes construction of any and all dams that may be needed for flood control and navigation of the Tennessee River. All dams from Knoxville to the mouth of the river are authorized. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is undoubtedly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PEARSON] inserts, after the word "river", line 8, page 19, the words "and the beginning of construction on a dam on the lower Tennessee River." The question as it appears to the Chair is whether or not there is any existing law which authorizes the construction of such a dam. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] has referred to Public, No. 412, of the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, which the Chair reads—and, by the way, it is an amendment to the original Tennessee Valley Act:

> SEC. 2. That subdivision (j) of said section 4 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:
>
> "(j) Shall have power to construct such dams and reservoirs in the Tennessee River and its tributaries, as in conjunction with Wilson Dam, and Norris, Wheeler, and Pickwick Landing Dams, now under construction, will provide a 9-foot channel in the said river and maintain a water supply for the same from Knoxville to its mouth, and will best serve to promote navigation on the Tennessee River and its tributaries and control destructive flood waters in the Tennessee and Mississippi River drainage basins; and shall have power to acquire or construct power-houses, power structures, transmission lines, navigation projects, and incidental works in the Tennessee River and its tributaries, and to unite the various power installations into one or more systems by transmission lines. The directors of the Authority are hereby directed to report to Congress their recommendations not later than April 1, 1936, for the unified development of the Tennessee River system."

In the opinion of the Chair, the language just read constitutes an authorization for the appropriation, and the Chair overrules the point of order and holds the amendment to be in order.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The purpose of my observation at this time is to draw attention to the fact that, in my judgment at least, the Tennessee Valley Authority is not worthy of the confidence of Congress. There is a provision of law which requires that its accounts shall be examined by the Comptroller General of the United States. That is not being done.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, with all due deference, I am bound to say that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment under consideration. I do not think it is fair to take up the time definitely allotted for the consideration of this amendment by making a general speech on the subject of the T. V. A.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey will proceed in order.

Mr. McLEAN. No further appropriations should be made for any dams until the Tennessee Valley Authority submits its accounts to the Comptroller General and they are examined by him, so that the report required may be made to Congress. It was the intention of Congress that the accounts of the Tennessee Valley Authority should be controlled through examination of the Comptroller General of the United States, but they have contrived to deny the Comptroller General of any supervision, and there is now no way of ascertaining how the funds allocated to this organization are used, except from such information as they themselves care to disseminate, and the reports which the law provides should be made for the information of Congress have not been made this year and will not be made in the future unless Congress takes appropriate action. The Tennessee Valley Authority in the first year and a half of its existence had spent over $110,000,000 and had obligated the Government far in excess of that amount. In a recent report they forecast expenditures of more than $379,000,000, and this estimate is made with reservations, which plainly indicate a far greater cost. The law creating the Tennessee Valley Authority intended that it should be in part a self-sustaining undertaking. To date there is no record of any receipts having come to the Government as a result of the operation, and the directors have so enlarged their activities that they are now overlapping and duplicating the work of many Government departments.

By admission of the Authority, completed work and work now under way call for expenditures of $339,000,000. This does not include all revenue received from the sale of electric power generated and sold at Muscle Shoals since June 1933 and used by the Authority; nor does it include the cost of 34 conservation camps and an army of P. W. A. workers put at the disposal of the Authority in that area; nor does it include large sums from other sources allocated and used for various activities only indirectly connected with dam building, flood control, and national defense. Until its nature, sequence, and ultimate cost are determined, no further appropriation should be made for this undertaking. The unexpended balance of the appropriations should be used to arrive at a logical and sensible plan.

At the last session of Congress the charge was made that the Tennessee Valley Authority was proceeding with its extravagant spending without a logical, prearranged program, and contrary to the orderly procedure arranged by Congress. Its directors were unable to advise Congress of their intentions or what the ultimate cost was going to be, and Congress directed that a report covering these matters be made prior to April 1, 1936. This report was submitted 1 day before it was due, and supports the contention that the mandate of the original act as to future development has been ignored; that at best the plans of the Authority are vague and indefinite. I quote from this report:

> In the period of less than 9 months allowed by the act for the preparation of this report, in addition to planning and superintending the construction of dams for which appropriations have been made by Congress, a very large amount of work has been done at numerous other sites in the preparation of this report. A large staff has been engaged in field surveys, in making borings, and in the preparation of comparative plans and estimates at the various sites. The estimates here given are preliminary and are made without full information as to such factors as foundation conditions, the amount of highway and railway relocation necessary, the cost of land, and the amount of reservoir clearing required.

That quotation ought to prove that the Tennessee Valley Authority had no program as charged, that it has no program now, and that no one can tell what the ultimate cost to the Government is going to be because the Authority itself does not know.

Mr. BUCHANAN arose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BUCHANAN. To oppose the amendment. How much time remains on the amendment, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. There are 8 minutes remaining.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire that my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. GREGORY] I shall have some time, and if it is agreeable, I shall be very glad to divide the remaining time with him and ask the Chair to notify me at the end of 4 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Chair will conform to the unanimous-consent request of the gentleman from Texas.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I think the commencement of the construction of this dam comes too early. I do not think a proper investigation has been made. This subject was under consideration in the last Congress and money was given them for further research and $650,000 more is carried in this bill for investigations and surveys relating to it. The dam will cost, according to the estimate, $60,000,000. What is the picture? It is close to the Cumberland River and the Ohio River. The T. V. A. board envisions that ultimately also a dam will be put across the Ohio at the mouth of the Cumberland and then a canal will be dug 2½ miles to connect the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers. That cost would be $150,000,000. Mr. Chairman, it is too large a project, involving too much money, without further investigation. I am not condemning the project. We may authorize it next year or the year after, but I do not think we ought to enter into any project involving the expenditure of $60,000,000 and this further possible $150,000,000 until we know what the ultimate cost will be.

The Tennessee Valley Authority with this proposition is extending its jurisdiction outside of the Tennessee Valley into another State, over another river, the Ohio River, and it is plain that they will get assistance from the Army Engineers. I think we should have enough of an investigation to know what we are doing or to what extent we are involving the National Government. That is my position.

One other thing. The purpose and practically the only purpose of the dam on the lower Tennessee River is to get a 9-foot channel from the mouth to Knoxville. With the completion of the dams now under way, we will have a 7-foot channel, but the Aurora Dam or the Gilbertsville Dam is necessary for a 9-foot channel. Let us complete some of these other dams first. They say they are going to get large revenue from the sale of electric energy. Let us develop this T. V. A. project reasonably and not try to rush every part of it at one time. [Applause.]

Mr. GREGORY. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that my time will not permit me to go into this situation as I should like to do.

The chairman of the committee has reported that this dam somewhere in the lower Tennessee Valley is necessary in order to carry out the original project. That is admitted by all people. I want to know why in the name of common sense the most essential dam in the whole project shall be left out while they are going up on nonnavigable streams, up in the mountains of eastern Tennessee, Alabama, North Carolina, and various other places. I think probably they are necessary for the conservation and the holding back of floodwaters down there, but I take the opposite view from the chairman of the committee. The first thing we should do is build the most important dam and see what it will do. Then when an opportunity is presented and we find necessity for it, we can build these other dams on the tributaries up in the mountains.

I am like the gentleman from Tennessee. I am not bothered about what the name of this dam shall be at all. If you will put it down there, we will be satisfied with the dam and we will not expect the Tennessee Valley Authority to teach us about thoroughbred cattle or anything like that. We are not trying to dam the Ohio River or the Cumberland River or any other river; but I do think it is a sensible proposition, if they are going to build a dam on the lower Tennessee River, to take into consideration the future. If dams are to be built upon the Ohio or the Cumberland or any other rivers in that vicinity, they certainly ought to be built so as to be of some value to such future development as may be necessary. But there is no opposition here now to do anything on the Ohio or the Cumberland or any other river. The proposition is plainly to start the building of a dam on the lower Tennessee River, which all agree is essential. It has been so regarded by the Tennessee Valley Authority. It has been so regarded by the Army engineers in the report of 1930 on the rivers and harbors act.

There is no reason in the world why we should not have this two or three hundred thousand additional money given to us in order that the construction of this dam may be started this year. We feel that the folks in western Kentucky and western Tennessee are entitled to some of the distribution of this fund. It is an absolute necessity for the unified control of the Tennessee River to make it navigable. As it is now, building these dams as they are now building them, you have a series of nice little lakes up in the mountains of eastern Tennessee, but by the building of this dam here you will create a great navigable stream, and the others can be built as opportunity is presented.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREGORY] has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PEARSON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PEARSON) there were ayes 32 and noes 69.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHORT: On page 20, line 4, after the figures "1936", insert: "Provided, That each Democratic Member of the House shall have named after him some public work costing not less than $10,000,000."

[Laughter.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, while I think there is much merit in the amendment, yet I am forced to make a point of order against the amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman withhold his point of order for half a minute?

Mr. WOODRUM. I must insist on an immediate ruling on the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 30 seconds.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

To continue to provide relief, and work relief on useful projects, in the United States and its territories and possessions, by the Works Progress Administration, $1,425,000,000, to remain available until June 30, 1937 (except as herein otherwise authorized): Provided, That this appropriation shall be available for the following classes of public projects, Federal and non-Federal, and the amounts to be used for each class shall not, except as hereinafter provided, exceed the respective amounts stated, namely: (a) Highways, roads, and streets, $413,250,000; (b) public buildings, $156,750,000; (c) parks and other recreational facilities, including buildings therein, $156,750,000; (d) public utilities, including sewer systems, water supply and purification, airports, and other transportation facilities, $171,000,000; (e) flood control and other conservation, $128,250,000; (f) white-collar projects, $85,500,000; (g) women's projects, $85,500,000; (h) miscellaneous work projects, $71,250,000; (i) National Youth Administration, $71,250,000; and (j) rural rehabilitation and relief to farmers, $85,500,000: Provided further, That the amount specified for any of the foregoing classes may be increased by not to exceed 15 percent thereof by transfer of an amount or amounts from any other class or classes in order to effectuate the purposes of the foregoing appropriation.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. WOODRUM: On page 22, line 8, after the word "appropriation", insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That the lists of employable persons for work in the continental United States under the Works Progress Administration shall not knowingly contain the name of any alien illegally within the limits of the continental United States. It shall be the duty of the Works Progress Administrator or the United States Employment Service or both to make every reasonable effort, consistent with prompt employment of the destitute unemployed who are not of the class hereinbefore mentioned, to ascertain whether such lists contain the names of any such aliens and where disclosed they shall not be employed, and if employed and their status as such alien is disclosed, they shall thereupon be discharged."

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is clearly legislation on an appropriation bill. Further, it creates additional duties for the Executive.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to be heard?

Mr. WOODRUM. I submit the matter to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I submit the matter, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GREEN. The amendment is clearly in order, because the Congress certainly has the power to direct in what manner an appropriation shall be paid. This amendment restricts its payment to American citizens unemployed. The purpose of the bill is for the relief of the unemployed. Surely it is germane and is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that before the Chair rules the amendment may again be read in a slow and distinct manner, so that every Member of the House can understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard briefly. I call attention especially to the language, "It shall be the duty of the Works Progress Administration." This language merely sets up additional duties to be performed by the Executive, and clearly is legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] makes a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia. When the bill was called up in the House, unanimous consent was sought and obtained that all points of order against the bill and the legislation contained in the bill be waived. The pending amendment, however, includes the following language:

> It shall be the duty of the Works Progress Administration or the United States Employment Service—

The Chair quotes so much of the paragraph under consideration as appears to the Chair to relate to the pending amendment—> to continue to provide relief, and work relief on useful projects, in the United States and its Territories and possessions, by the Works Progress Administration.

The pending amendment also refers to the United States Employment Service.

For the reason that the amendment includes another governmental agency, the Chair does not think the amendment germane, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: On page 21, line 10, strike out the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following:
> "That for the purpose of providing direct relief in the United States, its Territories, and possessions, and the District of Columbia, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $1,425,000,000; and there is hereby reappropriated for the same purpose all unobligated and unexpended balances with the exception of allotments to the Civilian Conservation Corps of the amounts appropriated by the acts approved June 16, 1933, February 15, 1934, June 14, 1934, and April 8, 1935, and to remain available until June 30, 1937, to be allocated and disbursed by the President to the States, Territories, and possessions, and the District of Columbia for relief according to their respective needs: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be allocated or paid to any State, Territory or possession, or the District of Columbia, or subdivision thereof, which shall not contribute an amount equal to at least 25 percent of the total proposed expenditures, both local and Federal, and shall not administer such activities by and through a nonpartisan board."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment. There has been a good deal of confusion around my table and I was not able to hear it read. Does the gentleman have a copy of the amendment?

Mr. TABER. Yes; I sent it to the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this bill as it stands is not a relief bill; it is a bill to continue the waste of the people's money through the W. P. A. and not meet the problems of relief, but to continue political jobs. It does not meet the problem of relief. If the funds that were appropriated for relief can be allocated and disbursed to the States by the President in accordance with their needs, the States, if they make a reasonable contribution toward those disbursements, will have incentive enough to see that these disbursements are made in an intelligent and economical manner and we shall begin to solve our relief problem.

Frankly, I do not believe we need to use as much money as is provided here for this purpose, but I feel that the majority of this House thinks so, and I want to put it on a basis that might start the country in the right direction. I am therefore to that extent surrendering my own ideas as to amount. I hope this amendment will be adopted and that we will start along in the right direction. I believe in relief, but I do not and cannot vote for ridiculous expenditures for ridiculous projects and for a waste of the money for political operations. I hope this amendment will be adopted. This amendment, if adopted, will make this a real relief bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia insist upon his point of order?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not care to insist on it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York brings up the direct question of whether this Congress in its closing days is going to abandon all of the efforts at a recovery program insofar as it relates to work relief?

Are we going to withdraw all of that and undertake to set up some new system not described and not planned, but just anything that might be directly regarded as a repudiation of what has been done?

Mr. Chairman, for several days we have heard gentlemen on that side of the aisle get up and condemn the relief program, yet almost in the next breath they intimate they expect to vote for the bill.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. I did not make that statement. I said I would not vote for it.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman said he would not, but many of his colleagues who found fault with it have said they would vote for it.

What does this mean? It means what a gentleman very wisely said the other day, and he was not a Member of the Congress. He said that no matter who does a job of this kind, there will be great mistakes made and great frailties in it. May I say that a gentleman is an optimist, indeed, who thinks if you take the administration of this fund away from the Federal Government and send it back to the 48 States that you will get the so-called politics out of it. You cannot do that. It can never be done. An editorial comment in one of the newspapers in the last day or two very wisely said that while there may be some merit in having State administration of relief, yet the sending back to the States for administration money that they had no responsibility for raising subjects the matter to greater abuses than exist under the present system.

No one claims the administration of this matter is perfect or approximates perfection, but it is a good, honest job, and nobody on the floor of the House has been able to point out where it has not been honestly administered. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there is no use taking the time of the House or of the country in a further discussion of this matter. We have made our positions clear. The various Members have taken their positions, and they are going to have abundant opportunity to take a position on the record when the time comes for a final vote on this bill. I therefore hope that the amendment will be defeated.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were ayes 33, noes 103.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. WOODRUM: On page 22, line 8, after the word "appropriation", insert a colon and the following proviso:

"Provided further, That the lists of employable persons for work in the continental United States, under the Works Progress Administration shall not knowingly contain the name of any alien illegally within the limits of the continental United States. It shall be the duty of the Works Progress Administrator to make every reasonable effort consistent with prompt employment of the destitute unemployed who are not of the class hereinbefore mentioned to ascertain whether such lists contain the names of any such aliens and where disclosed they shall not be employed, and if employed and their status as such alien is disclosed, they shall thereupon be discharged."

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order, but before giving the reason for the point of order I wish to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yesterday, when all points of order were waived, the points of order so waived were only to the bill; am I correct?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair, and the Chair will proceed upon such understanding.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order this is legislation upon an appropriation bill. Further, the words "it shall be the duty", and so forth, create additional duties for the Executive to perform, which in and of itself is legislation. It sets forth what the Executive shall do. Consequently, since we are creating new legislation by creating additional duties for the Executive, this is clearly legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. Chairman, for the reasons just stated I submit my point of order should be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to be heard?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes. Of course, the provision in the bill providing for the Works Progress Administration is legislation. Points of order against that were waived.

This language merely relates directly to the duties of the Works Progress Administration and defines them. The Chair will observe the words "Federal Employment Service" which the Chair found objectionable in the other amendment have been stricken out.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, if I may reply, while the Chair sustained my point of order for a different reason the other time, that does not necessarily mean the Chair passed on all of the reasons that I advanced in my point of order to the gentleman's previous amendment. In this amendment there is clearly set forth legislation. We are setting up additional duties for the Works Progress Administration and this being an appropriation bill we cannot set up those duties because in doing so we are legislating.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule, but the Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Virginia would omit the word "knowingly" and if he would omit the latter part of the amendment, the rest of it would be clearly impervious to a point of order and would accomplish exactly what he seeks to do. If the ruling of the Chair should be adverse, making it necessary, I hope the gentleman will omit those parts that may be held objectionable so that we may pass the proper part of the amendment.

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say to the gentleman from Texas that the gentleman from Virginia thinks the amendment is in proper shape now.

Mr. BLANTON. It may be, and I hope it is, and that the Chair will overrule the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MCCORMACK). The Chair is ready to rule.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO], makes the point of order that the proposed amendment is legislation on an appropriation bill. It is very clear and apparent to the Chair that under ordinary circumstances the statement of the gentleman would be convincing and binding. There is no quesion in the mind of the Chair but what it is legislation on an appropriation bill. However, this appropriation bill is somewhat different from other appropriation bills which are reported, in that all points of order against legislation reported out by the Committee on Appropriations have been waived. Certain legislation being in the bill and being properly before the committee with points of order against the same waived, it is proper to offer any amendment which is germane to the legislative features of the bill.

The bill provides "to continue to provide relief and work relief on useful projects, in the United States and its Territories and possessions by the Works Progress Administration."

It seems to the Chair that the Works Progress Administration could prescribe such a rule under the powers conferred upon it by the language of the bill. If this is so, it follows that the Committee of the Whole can prescribe what shall follow in the administration of the law with respect to the subject matter of the pending amendment.

The pending amendment is different from the one first proposed in that the pending amendment does not include another Government activity, but confines its operation entirely to the Works Progress Administration.

It appears to the Chair that the amendment in its present form is germane and the Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHENER. Do I understand the Chair to hold that because all points of order are waived against all provisions in the bill that the bill, by reason of that fact, is not subject to the rules of the House as applied to ordinary appropriation bills?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I submit that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MICHENER. Then I do not know what you could ask the Chair that would be a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair realizes the parliamentary situation, but the gentleman's inquiry is such a natural and pertinent one to make that the Chair would be very pleased to answer it in order that there may not be any misunderstanding.

The Chair, of course, rules on each particular amendment as presented. The Chair is simply ruling on this amendment as it appears to the Chair. The Chair does not undertake to state just what the limits are as to amendments that may be offered and the Chair, naturally, would not make any statement that would preclude the Chair from considering each amendment on its merits.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, in offering the pending amendment I want to give credit where I think credit is honestly and fairly due. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON], a member of the committee, has been very much interested in this matter, and I think I do not violate any confidences of the committee when I say that in the committee the gentleman offered an amendment having for its fundamental purposes practically what is arrived at by the pending amendment.

I do not know whether it is the intention of the gentleman from New York to present his amendment in any other form or to discuss it, but if he does not I may say this about the amendment he probably would have offered if I had not offered this one.

There were two objections to the gentleman's amendment. First, that it was a limitation on all the appropriations in the bill. It did not apply to Work Progress Administration only, but applied to the entire bill, a very drastic provision that in the minds of many of the administrative officers would have set up at once an inquiry of every person employed under any appropriation in this entire bill, directly by the Government or by Government contractors, as to whether or not they were lawful American citizens.

Mr. BACON. Not lawful American citizens, because I did include aliens legally here.

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; I accept the gentleman's correction. The amendment which has been offered goes as far, I believe, as you can go without setting up terrific administrative duties.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Does the gentleman's amendment apply to all aliens?

Mr. WOODRUM. All aliens who are here now illegally.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. But that does not exclude from the provisions of his amendment those aliens who, while illegally in this country, are not subject to deportation?

Mr. WOODRUM. No.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. So such aliens are also deprived of the benefits under the bill?

Mr. WOODRUM. All aliens here illegally now are restricted merely from receiving work relief; that is, if there is one job to be given out and there are two men to get it, and one is an alien who is in the United States illegally and the other is an American citizen, the answer, I think, should be obvious.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. How does the gentleman propose to determine what aliens are here legally and what aliens are here illegally? There may be a registration of all aliens; is that correct?

Mr. WOODRUM. Not at all. This puts the duty on the administrative officers to exercise the best care they can consistent to determine who they are, consistent with prompt employment of the destitute unemployed.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Under that language the executive officer may prevent any alien from receiving relief.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose he did, it would be good, sound legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. We feel that the amendment is a wholesome amendment to this bill and its operation, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 8, insert after the word "appropriation" the following: "Provided, That no person shall be eligible for any benefit permitted under this appropriation who is not a citizen of the United States at the time of the approval of this act, or who does not possess a valid declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States at the time of the approval of this act."

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that the committee amendment does not go far enough. It does not reach to the bottom of this vital question. The committee amendment only forbids those who are illegally residents in this country from participating under the terms of this appropriation. This committee amendment is superfluous and unnecessary, because the law already provides that illegally entered aliens should be deported, whether they are public charges or not, and I suggest the enforcement of the law. If the alien is deportable, he should be deported until the law is changed.

I want to call attention to the fact that in the border States there is free ingress and egress between this country and Canada, Mexico, and the Latin American countries.

During the harvest season of crops in those border States these people come into this country and labor in competition with American citizens. After the crops are harvested they remain here and get on the relief rolls and remain on the relief rolls. They are perennial burdens on the relief rolls.

I am reliably informed that in one part of my district 40 percent of those on relief are aliens. They are not illegally here; they came here legally, but they have become a public burden.

Until we settle this question we are not going to settle the relief problem. We should cease providing for these aliens until we take care of our own people.

I know of no civilized country which would provide relief for aliens in the way that we are doing by giving them equal rights when they do not deserve it. The least an alien could do, if he is sincere, is apply for his first papers—which is all my substitute amendment requires.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STUBBS. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. How do these people come into the country, legally or illegally?

Mr. STUBBS. They come into this country legally.

Mr. DONDERO. But they remain here illegally after the work is done.

Mr. STUBBS. Not necessarily. For instance, under the present law, Mexicans and Canadians, in fact all people of the Western Hemisphere, can enter on a nonquota basis. This means that, provided they comply with the other provisions of the law, they are not subject to any limit in numbers. People of other hemispheres can only come here at the rate of so many each year, but the people of the Western Hemisphere can come in any number. They can stay for all of their lives if they so choose without taking one step toward becoming a citizen. Mexicans, for instance, come here in droves during the seasonal harvests, and after the work is done they simply go on relief. Because they have always been relief clients, they were not barred by rulings which decreed that applicants for relief would be eligible for relief provided they were on the relief rolls prior to May 1, 1935—or whatever the date was set around that time as the deadline. The W. P. A. had to set a deadline because there were too many applicants for the amount of money at hand, but the ruling barred many of our own citizens who spent their insurance money, sold their homes or other property, and hung on to their respectability as long as they could, and when they were forced to apply for relief, they found they had applied too late. It is a sad situation and needs correction.

Many worthy citizens of this country cannot participate under the terms of this proposed appropriation or under the current appropriation, because aliens are consuming a great part of our relief funds. It seems to me that the time has come when Congress should take notice of the alien question. I have one bill now pending before the Committee on Labor, dealing with the alien employment proposition, and that committee is kind enough to give me a hearing on the bill in a few days, but now is the time for us to stop feeding these aliens out of the moneys of the taxpayers of this country.

Almost every major nation of the world, except the United States, has laws or departmental regulations which give citizens preference over noncitizens in the matter of private and public works and in relief. Other nations, when they find a noncitizen on their dole or relief rolls, promptly ship the noncitizen back to his own country. They estimate, and correctly so, that it is cheaper to send a noncitizen back home than to support him for an indefinite period of time.

No one knows, apparently, how many aliens are on relief. Administrator Hopkins has conducted almost every type of census under the sun, but he consistently has declined to cooperate with me in the matter of determining how many aliens are on relief. Of course, it would be a big job to check the number of aliens on relief, but what of it—he is hard pressed to find jobs for white-collar people, and I believe such an alien relief census would be helpful to those of us who make the laws. I have brought this subject to the attention of the W. P. A. on numerous occasions, and found little cooperation. I also have asked the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of Labor to cooperate in a move to determine how many aliens are holding jobs in private industry, but for some reason they view the suggestion with little interest. I am wondering if they realize that public opinion is being aroused to the point where wholesale deportations of aliens is being suggested in some quarters.

Recently, while testifying before a committee, the eminent and capable Daniel W. MacCormack, Commissioner of the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, pointed out that he has noted an increase of 66 percent in the number of aliens who have applied for their first papers and an increase of 33 percent in the number of those who have applied for their second or final papers. He ascribed this general rush to acquire citizenship to several reasons, most of them mercenary. He said that aliens are barred from city and State relief, and they want to participate—although the Federal Government does not bar them except in rare instances. He also pointed out that they are barred from some forms of public employment and that some private employers do not employ aliens who cannot show proof that they have applied for their first papers. Aliens also are barred from social-security benefits. Another reason for their flocking to become citizens lies in the fact that Congress recently reduced the naturalization fee from $10 to $5; and, he added for good measure, that aliens are becoming fearful of public opinion which might result in wholesale deportations. Commissioner MacCormack, in my opinion, properly classified these delinquent would-be citizens. The reason they want to become citizens is a mercenary one. Many of them, he said, lived here for many years and took no steps to become citizens until it appeared that their pocketbooks would be affected.

I certainly do not desire to deprive anyone of the opportunity to earn a livelihood nor to receive relief; but, when there are not enough jobs to go around or not enough relief money for all, I can see no reason why we should not give preference to those who are citizens or who have taken the first steps to become citizens.

I therefore ask that you accept my substitute amendment to protect the taxpayers and citizens of the United States from carrying the almost unbearable burden of relief—a burden heavily weighted with uninvited and unnecessary aliens.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Several Members rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize for the next 10 minutes, unless the time is otherwise limited, two Members to speak in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] for 5 minutes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I think we should consider this matter dispassionately and calmly. I believe we should not permit any feeling to enter into the matter. As a matter of fact our views on immigration may differ, but I submit that the proper place and time to consider restriction of immigration or dealing with aliens is in legislation coming from the Committee on Immigration, and such an important question should be settled only by orderly procedure. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia because it would leave all aliens on relief, subject to persecution by relief administrators. If the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. STUBBS] were adopted, hundreds of thousands, or maybe a few thousand—I do not know how many aliens—would be deprived of the benefits of the bill. What would then happen? You cannot deport them. You have no right to. They are not cattle. You cannot apply the same laws to private industry. You cannot legislate to compel private industry to exclude aliens, so that these relief workers who are not citizens, thrown off the relief rolls, must accept work at any kind of wage, no matter how low, so that these aliens who are trying to become Americans, who are trying to live up to the American standard of living, will be forced to acccept work at low wages in private industry. You are simply making more victims for exploiting employers. You are therefore creating more wage slaves.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. No. My time is limited. Further, why do you refuse to give aliens relief? These people are here legally; they are trying to become American citizens. Not only do you hurt him but how about his native-born children? They are American citizens. Starve the alien father and you starve his American children.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. No; not now, my time is limited. When you declared war you appealed to aliens and citizens alike to go to war to fight for the United States, and thousands and thousands of aliens went, many from my district, and yet you are now trying to deprive them of relief. No restriction was placed against them when you needed men to fight and die, they went to war, and I know the widows of many of those who went. Those widows today are aliens, and you are going to deprive them of relief?

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. How about Grover Cleveland Bergdoll?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. He did not live in my district, and as a matter of fact Mr. Bergdoll was a wealthy citizen of this country, living in the city of Philadelphia. The aliens gave proof of their love for this country with their toil and with their blood.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Yes; night before last on the flag pole in front of the Supreme Court Building.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. How does the gentleman know that it was an alien who did that?

Mr. Chairman, I submit that these ambiguous, veiled charges are most unfair. I do not think they are American. I do not think we are acting in the spirit of Americans. All of our ancestors were aliens. Would you have wanted this kind of an amendment to apply to them? Would you have wanted restrictions placed on your forefathers when they came to this country? My friends, these aliens are here legally. They are seeking to live peacefully, they are patriotic at heart, they love America, they want to build America. Give them a chance to live, do not force them to starve or work at starvation wages. Force them into sweatshops, make them wage slaves, throw them at the mercy of exploiters, and you will not only starve them, but you will thereby tear down the wage structure of even the American workers.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yes.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, I represent a district adjoining the gentleman's district. I am speaking about the same sort of conditions that he has spoken about. I want to ask him whether or not this would affect aliens who had declared valid intention to become citizens.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yes; this last amendment.

Mr. CURLEY. Not at all.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The substitute amendment says "any person who is an alien as of the date of the enactment of this law."

Mr. CURLEY. Then I shall introduce an amendment to take care of that situation.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Why wait until then? It is now that we are dealing with this amendment. Why not defeat this amendment? Is the gentleman in favor of discriminating against aliens?

Mr. CURLEY. I will debate with the gentleman at that time about the conditions in his district and mine.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I shall debate the gentleman on this issue any time; even in his own district, too.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BLANTON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. BLANTON. I desire to speak in favor of the Stubbs' amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot recognize the gentleman for that purpose at this time.

Is there any Member in opposition to either of these amendments who desires to be heard?

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I am in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I oppose the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] is recognized for 5 minutes in opposition to the pending amendment.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we should discuss this matter and decide upon it dispassionately, fairly, and justly. I have no selfish interest in trying to protect the rights of any aliens who may be in this country. There are no members of my family, as far as I know, who are aliens, in this country. My district does not contain any unusually large number of aliens. I have not been approached by anyone who opposes this type of legislation, but the matter appeals to me purely and simply from the standpoint of human justice. We in this country have, either through force and effect of our laws or through laxity in the enforcement of our laws, permitted aliens to enter and remain in this country. Whether or not those aliens are here legally or illegally does not alter the situation; does not change the fact that they are human beings, just as human as any man or woman upon this floor.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Not just now. If they are here illegally and subject to deportation under our laws they should be deported. If they are here in violation of our law they are subject to deportation; but are we going to deprive human beings who are here, whom we permit to stay here, and whom we do not force out of our country, of the only means they have of obtaining bread and meat? That is not human. That is not consistent with the basic principles of this country of ours. That does not seem to be the way our forefathers would have us, in this day, treat human beings who, for economic or other reasons, have chosen to come here. So long as we have permitted them to come here and permit them to remain here, we should not deprive them of the only opportunity they have to keep body and soul together.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Not at this time.

There is no private or public agency other than W. P. A. that will give those people an opportunity to make a living. Who will take care of them? Shall they starve? Will we let them die for want of food? Is that the American way of handling the situation? If we do not want aliens in our country we should further restrict immigration and deport those who are here illegally, but if we do not exercise our right to keep aliens out of the country and to remove undesirable aliens, then we should not allow those human beings to starve.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. WOOD. Does the gentleman favor employing aliens who are here illegally in preference to citizens, when we know that there are yet millions of citizens who, as the gentleman says, are starving?

Mr. BOILEAU. I get the gentleman's point. I will say that we in this great deliberative body should not say that human beings who are in this country, either legally or illegally, should not have an opportunity to eat. If we need to appropriate more money, let us do so, but we should not take such an un-Christian and un-American attitude as is expressed by this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BLANTON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BLANTON. There is pending an amendment and a substitute to the amendment. I move to strike out the last word of the substitute amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the Woodrum amendment, if that is the best we can pass, but as a better proposition I am in favor first of the Stubbs substitute, because I think it is a better amendment than that offered by the gentleman from Virginia. I think the Woodrum amendment is somewhat complicated and may not prove to be very effective.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] is very much agitated and concerned about possible injustice in this bill to aliens. The question that most concerns me is justice to American citizens first. [Applause.]

The gentleman from New York said he was afraid that this amendment might cause a general registration of aliens. I only wish it would. I wish this Congress would wake up and pass a law—not years hence, but now—that would require every alien in the United States to register. [Applause.] Then we would put unlawful aliens out of here and give the jobs they are now holding to unemployed Americans.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] said that we could not prove that it was aliens who came here on these Capitol Grounds in the nighttime, and, as an affront to our Government and to show contempt for all law and order, raised the Communist red flag of Soviet Russia over the United States Supreme Court Building the other night. The proposition proves itself. Where is there an American who be so despicable as would do that? Is there an American who would raise the red Communist flag over his Supreme Court? If there is, we ought to hang him. [Applause.]

Oh, they say some funny Harvard University students did it. If they had been caught in the act, they would have been shot by the guard. If any Harvard University students did do it, I call on Harvard, a great university, not to rest or sleep until it finds out what infamous scoundrels perpetrated such an atrocious act, and expel them permanently from that university. Nothing less than that will clear the good name of Harvard University. And the student body ought to apply a wet rope to such culprits for 2 hours. They do not deserve to affiliate with a decent school in the United States, and an imperative duty rests upon Harvard University to properly punish them, and to purge itself of such Communists.

A MEMBER. Is not the Harvard flag crimson red?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but it is of the honest and loyal kind, for the crimson red of Harvard does not carry any subversive sickle on its symbol; it is a proper, respectable crimson red.

I hope we will pass either the amendment or the substitute.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I know the Members are interested in this subject, but they have expressed themselves on it pretty thoroughly.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. TABER. I would suggest that the gentleman modify his request to include substitutes and extend the time to 10 minutes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I modify my request.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment, substitute amendments, and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment, substitute amendments, and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment, substitute amendments, and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests in view of the fact that debate is limited to 10 minutes that Members have as much consideration as possible for others who desire to speak.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, and I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, most of those Members who have been recognized have spoken in opposition to the amendment. I think the Chair should recognize somebody who is in favor of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to recognize as many Members as possible and has tried to be as fair as possible in according recognition. Under the rules the Chair must alternate between those in favor of and those opposed to the amendment.

Mr. FULLER. I am for the amendment.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes have been utilized in favor of the amendment and 10 minutes in opposition to it.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think the Chairman understood the gentleman from Texas to say he was seeking recognition in opposition to the substitute amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, if I can get through in less than 5 minutes, I will do so to give some other Member a chance.

Mr. Chairman, we do not want to go off half-cocked and bow to what we conceive to be a public or popular clamor. Let us sit here like men who give consideration to such legislation, figure out the results of the amendment and act in accordance with the dictates of reason. What is before us? The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] offered an amendment to exclude all aliens who are illegally in the country from any benefits under this bill. This covers the situation and is as far as we ought to go.

In the first place less than 4 percent of the unemployed are aliens, whether they are here legally or illegally.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. STUBBS] provides as follows:

> No person shall be eligible for any benefit under this act who is not a citizen of the United States at the time this act is approved.

What is the effect of this? Every man now on the Works Progress rolls, or every man hereafter applying for work under this appropriation will have to be investigated as to citizenship, everyone. Think of it! The administrative expense will be terrific. The delay in getting people to work will be worse.

The second part of this amendment would exempt those who have declared their intention to become citizens.

Just think of the administrative cost. Between 2,000,000 and 2,500,000 people will have to be investigated as to citizenship.

Mr. FULLER. It does not say that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It does.

Mr. FULLER. The amendment reads "those aliens who are not American citizens by naturalization or who have not filed a declaration of intention to become American citizens."

Mr. BUCHANAN. The amendment reads: "No person who is not a citizen at the time of the approval of this act."

Mr. FULLER. Or who has not filed his intention.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Wait a minute. Who is not a citizen of the United States; how are you going to find out about citizenship?

Mr. FULLER. Through his questionnaire, of course.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If you are going to take his questionnaire, why is it not provided in the amendment and stop some of this expense of administration? Did the gentleman ever try to trace down the citizenship of some old fellow who came to his office and wanted to know whether or not he was a citizen?

Mr. FULLER. I certainly would know how to go about it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In the case of many aliens they have been here many years yet they have married and have children. Their wives may be citizens and their children are citizens but they themselves are not. Just think of it! Oh, gentlemen, be reasonable! Stand up like men, face the music and vote for what is right in the administration of this question.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Briefly.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. The gentleman has read the first part of the amendment. Will he not now be good enough to read the last part of the amendment?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes. If a man, of course, has already taken out his first papers, declared his intention to become a citizen, it does not apply to him.

Mr. DUNN of Mississippi. It is in the amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I know it is.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. Does the gentleman know of any country in the world outside of America that would put the burden on itself to feed other than its own citizens? The burden would be up to us to show that we were citizens of that country if we were going to be fed by it, and I think the same rule should be applied in the United States. I do not think we ought to feed aliens illegally in this country at all. I think we ought to cut them off the relief rolls.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, I do not cover so much territory.

Mr. McFARLANE. I do.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York, a member of the committee, for 3 minutes.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I am only going to take 3 minutes because I spoke on this proposal this morning in general debate. I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia because it is absolutely similar in purpose to the one I had intended to offer and which I did offer in committee.

There have been a lot of things said here that have nothing to do with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, which only applies to those aliens who are in this country illegally. Under our immigration laws those who came in illegally committed a felony when they came in, and that is all there is to the matter. This does not apply to the honest alien who is here legally with a valid document. Those we want to protect because they are potential American citizens, and that is the reason I am opposed to the substitute offered by the gentleman from California. I would not put a burden on those honest aliens who are here legally, and who are honestly trying to become American citizens.

Mr. Chairman, the substitute should be defeated, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia should be adopted. We do not want to replace American citizens on the relief rolls by illegal aliens who have under our own laws committed a felony when they entered the United States. They are subject to deportation and should be deported. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the pending amendments, both of which propose to favor American citizens over aliens in expending funds for relief, are of vital significance. Both the committee amendment offered by Mr. WOODRUM and the substitute offered by my good friend the able and distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. STUBBS] deal with the same subject. Either, in my judgment, will mean, if adopted, that at least 300,000 aliens, who are in this country illegally and who have no desire to become American citizens, but who are now on the relief rolls, will be taken off and replaced with 300,000 loyal but jobless American citizens.

Mr. Chairman, it is somewhat surprising to hear a Member of this body actually defend an alien who is here illegally and who has made no effort to ever become an American citizen. The gentleman from New York City [Mr. MARCANTONIO] appears to be very much exercised lest the Stubbs amendment or the amendment offered by the committee, if adopted, might cause a registration of all aliens in the United States. I wish it went that far, but I am sure it does not.

It is estimated that more than 5,000,000 aliens are now in the United States illegally. More than 300,000 of these have W. P. A. jobs that belong to loyal American citizens. Millions of others have jobs in private industry. These aliens ought to become American citizens or be deported. [Applause.]

May I add that I voted for a similar amendment when offered in the Appropriations Committee. I urged its adoption then. I urge the adoption of the Stubbs amendment now. It has real teeth in it. But if the Stubbs amendment should be defeated, then certainly there should be no objection to the amendment offered by the committee, which is a great step in the right direction. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, the bill before us, H. R. 12624, designated as a deficiency appropriation bill, carries $2,364,229,712.53. It covers money paid out and obligations incurred by various bureaus and departments without having been appropriated or authorized or directed by Congress, and to carry on various projects of the administration.

It is urged that this is necessary for the most part to take care of unemployment.

At the request of President Roosevelt, in June 1933 the Democrat "rubber stamp" Congress turned over to the President $3,300,000,000, with almost unlimited authority to take care of unemployment and bring about prosperity. It was then urged by the New Dealers that this sum would wipe out unemployment and restore prosperity. It was claimed at that time that there were 10,000,000 unemployed persons in this country and that those needing relief numbered approximately ten to fifteen million persons.

In January 1935 President Roosevelt claimed that unemployment and need of relief were still with us and urged Congress to give to him, with dictatorial powers, an additional $4,880,000,000 for unemployment and relief. We were assured by the Democratic leaders that this sum would certainly wipe out unemployment and restore prosperity and no further sum would be needed for these purposes.

To the amazement of the country, President Roosevelt recently sent a message to Congress in which he stated that there were approximately 5,300,000 families and unattached persons in need of some form of public relief. It is estimated that there are 4.3 persons to a relief family; therefore the President admitted that there are now over 20,000,000 persons needing relief.

Mr. Hopkins, the Relief Administrator, in his testimony this week before a congressional committee, claimed that there were more than 20,000,000 people in this country still needing relief.

William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, a good Democrat, issued a statement a few days ago in which he declared that there are over 12,000,000 unemployed workers in this country.

These three appropriations alone amount to more than ten and a half billion dollars. This is more than two and a half times the entire cost to this Government of fighting and winning the Civil War. Of course, this does not cover all that has been appropriated. The bill before us covers nearly two and a half billion dollars, but it is merely a deficiency bill. Our friend and colleague from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] in his speech to us a few minutes ago declared that the Seventy-fourth Congress, which began on January 3, 1935, has already appropriated and authorized the expenditure of more than $20,000,000,000—five times as much as the cost of the 4 years of the great Civil War, and this sum has been appropriated and authorized in less than 17 months. Our colleague, Mr. MAY, calls to the attention of his Democratic colleagues and the country that this wild orgy of spending must cease or our Nation will be facing bankruptcy.

The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, testified before a Senate committee the other day and pointed out that our Government was facing a deficit for the present fiscal year of approximately $6,000,000,000, and more than likely there would be a deficit in the next 14 months of $9,000,000,000. In other words, with the increase of a billion dollars annually of taxes under the Roosevelt administration, the Secretary of the Treasury asserts that under present plans of the administration our Government will expend within the next 14 months approximately $9,000,000,000 more than its revenues. I think it can be said without fear of successful contradiction that the Roosevelt administration, when the 4 years are up, will show a deficit of at least $16,000,000,000 and a national debt somewhere between thirty-five and forty billions of dollars. Many outstanding Democrats of the Nation as well as Republicans are becoming very much alarmed over this situation.

The New Deal administration justifies these extraordinary expenditures, deficits, and debts by saying that they were and are necessary to wipe out unemployment and restore prosperity. The question arises: Have the policies of the New Dealers accomplished either one of these purposes?

REPUBLICANS FAVOR NECESSARY AND ADEQUATE RELIEF

No Member of this House is more deeply or sincerely in favor of providing adequate relief for all of our citizens who need relief and cannot help themselves than I am. Every Republican in this House favors adequate relief for the needy. The Republicans do not object to the amount necessarily expended for the relief of the needy. We do strenuously object, however, to the manner in which relief has been handled and the New Deal proposes to handle it. We insist that the people of this Nation are entitled to have a dollar's worth of benefits for every dollar of tax money expended. The relief money should go to those who need relief. More than 300,000 new officeholders have been put on the backs of the American taxpayers, while unemployment has increased among the workers. This relief money has been used, however, to provide jobs for Democratic politicians and ward heelers. This administration, with the use of the relief money, has certainly cut down unemployment among the Democratic politicians. In some places authentic, authoritative reports indicate that more than 90 percent of the relief money has been used for so-called overhead expenses and only 10 percent disbursed to the needy.

This policy of using this relief money to build political machines, promote partisan politics, favoritism, and to club needy people into supporting candidates and a party against their will is one of the things condemned by the Republicans, by thousands of leading Democrats, and by the American people.

There are many items contained in this bill that are for worthy purposes and worthy causes. I certainly approve of the purposes for which much of this appropriation is intended.

POLITICS AND FAVORITISM

The Republican Party is doing everything humanly possible to amend this bill so as to divorce relief work and other relief from the blighting influence of partisan politics and favoritism. Mr. Hopkins was recently called before a committee of Congress, and, according to his own testimony, his relief organization throughout the Nation is honeycombed with fraud, favoritism, corruption, and politics. More than a thousand cases of fraud and theft have been uncovered by Federal agents, and there have been hundreds of convictions, according to the testimony of Mr. Hopkins. Political favoritism has raised its ugly head throughout the country. Relief money has been used to put on rackets, he admits. In my own State, according to the leading Democratic newspaper, relief agents in one county got away with $200,000. A large number of those charged with this fraud and graft have been indicted and convicted and given terms in the penitentiary. How many other counties in the United States have suffered likewise, nobody knows.

It is not necessary, however, for us to rely upon the testimony of Mr. Hopkins or Republican critics. Senator HOLT, Democrat of West Virginia, has in public addresses throughout West Virginia and in other places declared that the Relief Administration in West Virginia is reeking with fraud and politics. He cites many specific instances. He charges that the relief money is now being used in West Virginia to promote one Democratic faction against another Democratic faction. Similar statements have been made by the Democratic Governor of Colorado. Democratic Members of Congress have charged that in recent primaries the relief money was used against them and to support other Democratic candidates for Congress. In our election last year in Kentucky relief funds and other money appropriated for Federal projects were used to browbeat and intimidate the voters of Kentucky in aid of the Democratic candidates.

The Republican Party has just as much sympathy for the needy and is just as anxious that the hungry be fed and the needy be clothed and sheltered as any New Dealer. We do insist, however, that the money appropriated for relief go to those who need relief and not to a great army of New Deal politicians—that no partiality or favoritism be shown and that every needy American citizen be treated alike. We insist that if these policies were adhered to, the needy of this country could and would be cared for adequately and better than they have been, and that this would effect a saving to the taxpayers of from 25 to 50 percent.

PERMANENT AND NECESSARY PROJECTS

At the suggestion and invitation of the Government, last year the people in practically every county and various communities throughout the Nation submitted substantial projects for the purpose of putting in waterworks, sewer systems, building courthouses, municipal buildings, school buildings, streets, highways, and so forth. These were all needed, necessary, useful, and permanent public improvements. These projects were approved by the States and Federal Government, but so much of the $3,300,000,000 and of the $4,880,000,000 had been wasted on boondoggling and fantastic and useless schemes and projects that thousands of these real honest-to-goodness projects could not be built. Now, in preparing and submitting these permanent and necessary projects, the people of these various counties and communities consumed a great deal of valuable time and incurred a great deal of expense.

There is carried in this bill an item of $1,425,000,000 for so-called work relief. Mr. Ickes, Secretary of the Department of the Interior, desired a lot of this money to be earmarked for these permanent, substantial, useful, and necessary public projects, and I am informed that about 160 Democratic Members of the House and many of the Republicans favor approximately $700,000,000 of this money being earmarked for this purpose.

In my own congressional district, as in the congressional district of each and every Member, there are a great many of these permanent and useful projects, at Brodhead, Albany, Corbin, Pineville, Middlesboro, and other places, and there are such projects in practically every other county in Kentucky. I have been urged to favor the earmarking of this money, and I have pointed out to my constituents and to others throughout Kentucky that I strongly favored this program.

Let us not forget that we borrowed the money for this so-called work and direct relief and we are borrowing the money included in this bill for work relief. This debt, as well as the other billions of debts piled up by this administration, must be paid by our children and our children's children. May I appeal to the Democrats of this House that in the expenditure of this money it should be used for necessary and permanent improvements so that our children and our children's children, who will have to pay these debts for the most part in taxes worked out and sweated out by them, may see some of the benefits that they are enjoying by reason of the expenditure of this money, and in that way create respect for us rather than contempt. If we waste this money on boondoggling and other wild schemes which will result in no benefit to our children and our children's children, how can they entertain for us anything except contempt for burdening them with these enormous debts?

Now Mr. Hopkins desires all of this money, $1,425,000,000, turned over to him. He opposes its being earmarked. He is the fair-haired, spending, boondoggling boy of the administration. He never had any money or business of his own to spend and for that reason feels that he is peculiarly fitted to spend all these billions of the taxpayers' money. He is a real New Dealer. He favors "sock 'em with taxes" and turn all this money over to him without strings so that he may continue his policy of politics, favoritism, boondoggling, and partiality.

It is easy to see that if this $1,425,000,000 is turned over to Mr. Hopkins without strings he can spend it where, when, and on whatever projects that might meet his fancy. The President and others of the high command of the New Deal who are "hell-bent" on reelecting Roosevelt have taken the side of Hopkins, and they are using clubs on the Democrats who favor the earmarking of this money and spending it in a legitimate, helpful way to the people of this country. We Republicans intend to do all we can to amend this bill so as to take favoritism and politics out of it and have this money spent in a way that will help the people the most and at the same time give more work relief than under the plan proposed by the President and Hopkins. I am afraid, however, that this Democratic "rubber stamp" Congress will let Mr. Hopkins have his way.

Before the A. A. A. and kindred agencies were knocked out by the Supreme Court there was a great shower of checks sent to beneficiaries just before election time. Mr. Roosevelt and others of the high command of the New Deal know that if Mr. Hopkins is given a free hand with this money he will be able, with the other money that is still in his hands, to employ, under some scheme or other, millions of people in September and October and up to and including election day in November 1936. This is a bold and daring plan to finance the Democrats' campaign this year out of the United States Treasury. Many Democrats in the House and Senate and thousands of patriotic Democrat leaders throughout the Nation, who love their country more than they do this New Deal party, realize that this is wrong and will hurt rather than help the country. It will do exactly in the future what it has done in the past—retard recovery, increase unemployment, and increase the relief rolls. Moreover, it will go far to break down the moral fiber of the people of this Nation. It will discourage honest enterprise, promote corrupt politics, encourage waste and extravagance as well as profligacy. The American people one of these days will rise up in their might and smite those who would wreck this country to further their own selfish political ambitions.

As further evidence of the purposes of the New Deal crowd, the Republicans have attempted to get through an amendment to have these projects on which public funds are to be used to be passed upon by a nonpartisan board and the funds disbursed by these boards and to make it unlawful for anyone connected with the expenditure of this money to intimidate or attempt to bribe any voter with relief funds or to force them to vote one way or the other for candidates for Presidential electors, Senators, and Representatives; but the New Deal crowd in the House objected to this, would not permit any such protection to be thrown around the people's money, or to protect needy people who must have these jobs from being harassed and threatened and forced to vote against their honest convictions.

KENTUCKY, $369—NEVADA, $3,077

As further evidence of the favoritism practiced by Hopkins and other New Dealers to whom has been turned over these billions of dollars by a "rubber stamp" Congress, I invite you and the country to study the favoritism and partiality shown in the distribution of relief work and relief money among the States.

For instances, for the years 1933, 1934, and 1935, the Federal Government gave the average family in Nevada $3,077, but the average family in Kentucky received in 1933, 1934, and 1935 from the Federal Government only $369. In other words, the average family in Nevada received nearly nine times as much as the average family in Kentucky.

The average family in Nevada received the highest amount of any State in the Union, and Kentucky received the lowest.

The average family in Wyoming received for that period $1,619. This is over four times as much as Kentucky. The average family in Montana received $1,141 for that same period. The average family in New York received $968—nearly three times as much as the average family in Kentucky.

Nevada is a rural State with no large cities. Kentucky has some large cities and a large number of industrial centers where there is a great deal of unemployment, in the coal mines, and so forth. Why should Kentucky families have received the least of any State in the Union?

It is made possible under this cruel and un-American system of placing these large sums of money with dictatorial powers into the hands of one man. The sky is the limit for him to play politics and show favoritism and partiality.

Only a few weeks ago I sent more than 7,000 questionnaires to the people of my congressional district seeking information and their opinion on various matters. These questionnaires were sent to all classes of citizens, many of them on relief. They were sent to at least 10 persons in each voting precinct. Among these was this question: "In your opinion, are the Government money and jobs being used for political purposes?"

I received more than 5,000 responses, and, with the exception of less than a dozen, they made positive answer, "Yes."

In looking over the daily statement of the Treasury of the United States on yesterday, May 7, 1936, I observed that the Government's receipts amounted to a little over $10,000,000. Expenditures amounted to a little more than twenty-five millions. In this same questionnaire I asked these people if they favored a policy of continued deficits and debts, and without exception they answered "No." I also asked them if they favored Congress taking away from the Supreme Court the right to pass upon the constitutionality of the acts of Congress, and I was very much gratified that all answered positively in the negative, with the exception of some 10 or 12.

The people in my district favor, as I do, adequate relief for the needy, but they condemn, as I do, the attempt of the administration to play politics on the misery and distress of the American people and the waste of the public money; and likewise they condemn favoritism, partiality, and partisanship in the distribution of work-relief jobs and relief funds.

I hope that this measure may be so amended that those needing relief will receive it without regard to race, politics, creed, or color, and so that all American citizens who are in need may be treated alike.

THE GREAT PROBLEM—UNEMPLOYMENT

Although appropriations have grown larger and larger, and the deficits and national debt have increased by leaps and bounds, yet President Roosevelt; Mr. Hopkins, Relief Administrator; Miss Perkins, Secretary of Labor; and many other leading New Deal Democrats tell us that relief and unemployment are not temporary matters but are and will be permanent.

The question arises: Can the Nation continue long to expend billions of dollars more each year than it takes in in revenues, and borrow more and more money and at the same time see unemployment and relief rolls grow instead of diminish?

The reason advanced for the great deficits and increase in the national debt by the expenditure of these large sums of money was to cut out unemployment and relief. Undoubtedly there must be something wrong with the policies pursued, or unemployment and relief rolls would not increase. We have seen the number on relief nearly doubled since June 1933 and the number of unemployed workers has increased from 10,000,000 to 12,625,000, although the administration some months ago removed from work relief and direct relief 1,500,000 unemployables in this country.

Who are the unemployables? Most of them are heads of families, and this means some four to five million people who have been taken off relief and cast back upon the States, counties, cities, and communities for help. They are the blind, the disabled, the aged, and infirm. In other words, they are people who cannot work. Was it not a cruel policy for the Federal Government to deny relief to the blind, the crippled, the disabled, and to the aged needy? Most of them have worn themselves out in helping to build up this country.

Many of us believe that there are some sane, sensible policies which, if adopted and carried through, would in a large measure solve the problem of unemployment and greatly reduce the tax burden of the people of this country.

FOREIGN IMMIGRATION—RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS

It is generally agreed, while no one knows and the administration refuses to take the necessary steps to find out, that there are at least 7,000,000 alien adults in this country, and that about half of these alien adults came into this country illegally. They slipped in or were smuggled into our country in violation of law. Every alien coming into this country illegally or smuggled into this country commits a felony. The number of aliens being smuggled into our country is increasing every day. In the last 10 years it is believed by those who have made a careful study of the question that at least 500,000 alien seamen have deserted their ships on arriving in American ports and are now scattered about over this country. At least 2,000,000 Mexicans have come into our country in the last few years under the guise of working on the sugar-beet farms and in sugar-beet institutions and to work in other capacities. A large majority has remained in this country and a large majority of them are now depending upon relief. Other millions have come in over the Mexican border, the Canadian border, and on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

Most of these aliens are heads of families. Millions of them, with their families, are now on some form of relief, either Federal or local.

I have no feeling against anyone because such person is an alien. Millions of these aliens have been here for many years and have enjoyed the blessings and opportunities of this country, but have never thought enough of your country and mine to become citizens.

But is it not your duty as well as mine as Members of Congress to take care of our own citizens, native born and naturalized?

PROVIDE FOR OUR OWN HOUSEHOLD

The Holy Bible declares that—

He that provideth not for his own household has denied the faith and is worse than an infidel.

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, in order to carry out that policy for the United States I offer the following amendment to the bill:

No part of this appropriation shall be paid out on account of any wages, salaries, or other relief benefits to anyone who is not a citizen of the United States.

When Mr. Hopkins testified a few days ago before a congressional committee he stated that everybody was treated alike—citizens, aliens, aliens illegally entered, criminal aliens, and all. Our colleague, Mr. MARCANTONIO, of New York, urges that we should treat all alike, give the same character of treatment to aliens, whether they were smuggled into this country or are criminal aliens, the same as American citizens. He intimates that a Member of this House that would not subscribe to that doctrine was wanting in human kindness and Christian charity. I am sure that many other Members of this House, as well as myself, have as much of the milk of human kindness and Christian charity in our hearts as our colleague, Mr. MARCANTONIO. Does not the Holy Bible, as the guide of human conduct, urge that we must provide first for our own household? I conceive it my sworn duty to first look after the welfare of the household of the United States. No head of a family can justify his conduct in permitting strangers to slip into his house and take away the beds and food from his own family. Our first duty is to our own citizens.

Aliens are not under the same obligations to this country as our citizens. When the clouds of war gather we can call our citizens to the defense of our flag and our country, but we cannot compel and have never compelled aliens to defend it. During the World War it is said there were approximately 1,000,000 able-bodied young men within the draft age of the allied countries living in our country. They were not citizens of this country. We could not force them into our Army and Navy because they were aliens. The allied countries that we were helping in the war could not force them into their armies and navies because they were not over there. I was not a Member of Congress, but I have wondered why the American Congress permitted these aliens to remain in this country and at the same time voted to send our own boys by the millions to European battlefields and to the seven seas of the world at $1.10 per day to help save these allied countries. These same able-bodied young aliens, with other millions of aliens, remained in this country receiving on an average of approximately $10 per day for work as wages, and, of course, many of those who engaged in business and other pursuits made much larger sums. When our boys came back home they found the jobs they had left in hundreds of thousands of instances taken over by aliens, and a lot of them still have those jobs.

I have heretofore pointed out that William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, reports there are over 12,000,000 unemployed workers in America, and President Roosevelt and Mr. Hopkins state there are over 20,000,000 people needing relief, and among these are 1,500,000 unemployables (made up of the halt, the blind, the lame, and the aged needy). The Federal Government is denying to this 1,500,000 unemployables any relief. Millions of these aliens have been supported by work relief and direct relief and, unless something is done, will be supported out of this work relief. We are not providing jobs or relief for all of our American citizens who need relief. The Federal Government is not providing any relief for these 1,500,000 unemployables, a very large majority of whom are American citizens.

Let us bear in mind that these foreign countries are not providing work relief or direct relief to American citizens, except it might be in rare cases. It matters not how skillful a mechanic may be or how proficient any other American citizen may be able to do certain work, the laws of France, Switzerland, Italy, and many other countries prohibit the employment of such American citizens if any citizen of that particular country can do the work and desires to work. In other words, the jobs must go to citizens of those countries first. Ours is the only country that has become the dumping ground and garbage can and Santa Claus of the world.

Before we have finished with the World War, it will cost this country over $100,000,000,000. We loaned these foreign countries billions of dollars. They owe us $12,000,000,000. All of these countries, with the exception of little Finland, refuse to pay any part of the principal or interest on these honest debts. These same countries are spending billions of dollars to increase their navies and armies, and thereby threatening the peace of the world and our own national security. Congress, last year and this year, has appropriated $2,000,000,000 for national defense—the largest appropriations in peacetime in the history of this country. The administration claims this is necessary because of the large sums being expended by foreign governments in increasing their armies and navies. With all of these circumstances and facts before us, is there any good reason why this Nation should provide billions of relief for aliens who have never thought enough of this country to become citizens? If they desire the benefits of American citizenship they should become citizens, so that when war comes they could be called upon to defend the country that has fed and protected them.

This country should deport not only the smuggled in aliens, the criminal aliens, but all other aliens who are depending upon the United States Government for support. It would be much cheaper to furnish transportation to deport these aliens than it would to provide them support. If this should be done, it would reduce the number of our unemployed in this country by millions and, at the same time, reduce the number on Government relief by several millions. The President, Hopkins, and Miss Perkins say under the present setup unemployment and relief is permanent. A great army of unemployed is a menace to any country. This is the real big American problem, and we must face it and solve it. Literally millions of the defenders of this country, and the sons and daughters of our defenders, are walking the streets and highways seeking employment that they cannot find. Many of them are in dire need but are too proud to accept relief from the country that they or their fathers protected and defended.

Can any Member of this House take the position that we must continue through the years to deny employment to our defenders and their sons and daughters and, at the same time, require the overburdened taxpayers of this country to support millions of aliens?

Our Democratic colleague from California has offered an amendment similar to mine, and I earnestly hope that his amendment, or my amendment, giving these relief-work jobs to American citizens will be adopted.

REYNOLDS-STARNES AND KERR-COOLIDGE BILLS

This administration, instead of trying to reduce the number of aliens in this country, has been driving with boot and spur to put through the obnoxious Kerr-Coolidge bill that will break down our immigration laws and increase the number of aliens in this country and at the same time thwart deportation of several thousand criminal aliens. I am pleased to see, however, the American Legion, the D. A. V., the D. A. R., the Junior Order of American Mechanics, and literally hundreds of other patriotic organizations in this country, both civil and military, fighting this administration Kerr-Coolidge bill. The American Federation of Labor and other labor organizations have also denounced its provisions, because they say it would tend to break down our immigration laws and increase foreign immigration.

The administration is backing the Kerr-Coolidge bill because it is so closely identified with the large alien groups in this country. They are afraid they might lose votes in the great alien centers in New York City, Chicago, Boston, and other big cities. These great veteran, military, and patriotic organizations are doing what they can to get through the Reynolds-Starnes bill. I strongly favor this measure. It provides that every alien in this country shall be registered and fingerprinted, and a lot of them deported, and cut down the quotas of immigrants at least 90 percent, and apply the quota restrictions to the countries of the Western Hemisphere as well as the other countries of the world.

We have pointed out there are millions of aliens in this country illegally. Among these are thousands of gangsters and criminals, like Hauptman, who murdered the Lindbergh child. He was smuggled into this country. They smuggle them in over the Mexican and Canadian borders and through our long coast lines on the Atlantic and Pacific. A few days ago the Governor of Colorado declared martial law on the Mexican border to keep his State from being filled up with Mexicans. Other States are threatening to do the same thing. The only way to find out the aliens that are in this country illegally is to require all aliens to register. This administration is spending millions of dollars on the boondoggling project of sending people around to find out if the houses on the various streets of our cities are properly numbered. That is a local matter for the officers and the people living in those cities. If the manner in which the houses are numbered suits the people in those cities, why should the taxpayers' money be spent on this useless thing? It would serve a good purpose if we would spend some money to find out where the aliens, the gangsters, and the smuggled aliens are and how many there are. It is high time that we set about to clean up our own country and put our own house in order.

It has been well said that if we do not Americanize the alien he will alienize America. If other countries will not employ American workmen and provide relief for millions of needy Americans, why should we provide work and relief for citizens of those countries? Let us send them back to their own countries and let those countries take care of their own citizens, and perhaps then they will not have the money to increase their armies and navies and threaten our own peace as well as the peace of the world.

RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS

Other Republicans and Democrats in this House, as well as myself, have heretofore pointed out the harm that has been done to this country by the so-called reciprocal-trade agreements that this administration has put through with a great many of the nations of the world. This administration has broken down our immigration laws. They have refused to protect American citizens from the influx of foreign immigration. They have tried to further break it down by the passage of the Kerr-Coolidge bill and have refused to pass that great patriotic American measure, the Reynolds-Starnes anti-immigration bill. We have pointed out how the administration could cut down the unemployment and relief rolls by millions if a good strong American policy was adopted.

These reciprocal-trade agreements have broken down our tariff walls and have turned over American markets to foreign farmers, industries, and workers. The increase in imports of corn from foreign countries in 1935 increased 2,500 percent over 1934, the importation of pork products increased 3,200 percent in 1935 over 1934, the importation of beef products increased 6,000 percent in 1935 over 1934. There was brought into this country in 1935, 276,324,000 pounds of hides, 256,525,000 pounds of tallow, 158,758,000 pounds of carpet wool, countless millions of pounds of butter, and millions of dozens of eggs, and everything else produced on the farm. Our export of cotton in 1935 was reduced more than half of what it was in 1932. We exported 95,000,000 more bushels of wheat in 1932 than we did in 1935. We exported 530,000,000 more pounds of animal products in 1932 than in 1935. We collected more than a billion dollars of processing taxes, and paid them out to people to destroy cattle, hogs, pigs, cotton, corn, wheat, and so forth, and took 40,000,000 acres of productive land out of production. This included 10,000,000 acres of cotton. This put 500,000 cotton farmers, mostly tenants, in the South on relief, and this cut-out took away the jobs of several million American farmers, farm tenants, and farm workers, and put millions on relief.

The truth is and the record shows that it would require 50,000,000 acres of productive American farm land to produce all of the farm products that have been shipped into this country under the New Deal and to replace the cut-down in our exports on account of the New Deal farm policies. If these policies should be cut out, it would reduce the unemployment and relief by many millions. Japan in 1934 shipped in a very small amount of textile goods. In 1935 it had jumped to 30,000,000 yards, and what has been said of textiles in Japan has been duplicated in various articles from the industries of the various countries of the world.

If we protect American labor from aliens and protect the American farmers and industries by cutting out the dumping of foreign goods and foreign products into this country, we will cut off other millions from the unemployed and relief rolls. I am unwilling to believe that this great, rich, wonderful country of ours must in the future have a great permanent army of millions of unemployed and a great permanent army of millions on relief rolls. It has been charged over and over on the floor of the House and Senate and elsewhere that it is believed this administration desires to keep this depression going and the people in need and distress until after the November election and under that pretext use these billions of dollars to coerce the needy American voters to continue in power for another 4 years this administration.

ENCOURAGE AGRICULTURE AND INDUSTRY

No nation has had prosperity with scarcity. Let us encourage our farmers to produce, at least enough to supply the demands of our own country and protect our farmers from this enormous importation of farm products.

The Republican Party has always stood for high wages for our workers, high prices for our farmers, and a fair return for those who have their money invested in industry. If the farmers produce a surplus and the world market has a tendency to depress the price, let our country take care of that difference and uphold the price of farm products. This could be done with not more than $200,000,000. As it is, we are spending billions on the farm problem, and the farmers of foreign countries are furnishing us our supplies and our farm workers out of work and on relief. Let us keep our farmers busy, and they will be able to buy the products of our factories, mines, shops, and mills. We should encourage American industries.

This administration appears to be obsessed with the idea we must destroy American industry. If our farmers were busy and industries were busy, we would find millions of jobs open for our people. Our people do not want relief, they want jobs, good wages, and an opportunity to earn an honest living for themselves and their families. Let us encourage thrift, self-reliance, and economy. With the attitude of the present administration the average person with a few dollars is afraid to invest it in any productive enterprise. Let the Government get out of private business. Let the Government spend its work-relief money on honest-to-goodness necessary, permanent public projects—highways, streets, courthouses, school buildings, and so forth, and pay honest-to-goodness wages for the service.

I favor another amendment to this bill, and that is, that the Government be required to pay the prevailing wages that are paid for similar services in the community in which the work or services are rendered. In some places in my district needy people are required to walk as far as 9 miles to some boondoggling job that paid but a little over $1 per day, and then walk 9 miles back home. Eighteen miles is a very good day's work itself.

If sane policies had been adopted by this administration, we would have been out of the depression long ago. We honestly believe that the American people, when they have an opportunity, will elect a President and a Congress that stands for policies in this great rich country of ours that will reduce instead of increase the unemployment and relief rolls, and reduce instead of increase the great army of office-holders and the scores of bureaucratic agencies, that will reduce instead of increase the tax burden of the people, and that will cut out deficits, balance the Budget, and stop the growth of the national debt.

Mr. FULLER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] will restrict only the criminal aliens and, in my opinion, will not apply to aliens generally who are on the relief rolls. The amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. STUBBS] as a substitute provides that aliens who have not become American citizens and who have not filed their intention of becoming American citizens shall not be eligible for relief. In my opinion, the Stubbs amendment should be adopted. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO], in opposing this amendment, says there are a great many aliens in this country who want to become American citizens. If that is true, why have not they qualified, or at least filed their intention to become citizens? Those who cannot qualify and have not attempted to qualify are certainly not entitled to any relief under this measure.

In my opinion, there is not a country in the world that would take the taxpayers' money and give it out as a dole for relief for Americans. I have heard this bill referred to by the gentleman from Virginia as an unemployment program. The truth of the matter is the main relief part of this bill carries a billion and a half dollars and is nothing more or less than a dole. It is relief for those who are in distress. It is high time that we should do something to protect Americans who are in distress. We realize that this appropriation is small in comparison to what those on the relief really need in order to make a decent living. We also realize that we have to anticipate that this program cannot be carried on indefinitely, and there must be a stopping point somewhere. Why should we take American taxpayers' money, money out of the Federal Treasury, and use it for the purpose of feeding aliens who are in this country illegally? What we need is a rebirth and a realization that we should look after our home people first and more rigidly enforce our immigration laws. It is a well-known fact that the enforcement of immigration laws in this country in the past has been a joke.

I am convinced from arguments offered here on the floor of this House that there are many aliens in this country who are good citizens, some of whom have furnished soldiers for the World War, who cannot qualify on account of being unable to read or write. Meritorious cases should be carefully dealt with, but they are few in comparison with the wholesale unlawful entry of foreigners in this country.

It is claimed we have 10,000,000 unemployed in this country today. In my opinion, our labor condition in America is mostly caused from aliens performing tasks and labor which rightfully belongs to Americans. Even if these aliens are lawfully in this country, there is no reason why they should live at the expense of the Government, and, in my opinion, most of them could and would be taken care of by their relatives.

This is a question of policy, and the real question is, Shall we take our American people's money for relief dole for foreigners when we are not financially able to appropriate as much as we would desire to take care of the poor and distressed Americans in need?

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, it is difficult for me to understand how Members of Congress, whose constituency supported them and sent them here, made up of American citizens, can fail to support an amendment to a bill which provides simply that the benefits of the legislation shall go to American citizens. I am willing to go that far myself. Certainly no one can fail to support the committee amendment which simply says that those people who are not American citizens and who are here illegally cannot have any of this money that should go to American citizens. This money comes from American citizens and, therefore, I cannot for the life of me see why anyone could fail to support the Stubbs amendment in the first place, and if not that amendment the committee amendment. I heard only yesterday a statement made on the floor to the effect that probably the billion and a half dollars provided for in this bill will not be sufficient to take care of the unemployed of the United States. If it is not, every nickel of this money that is spent on an alien, to that extent you take relief and assistance away from destitute American citizens.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope the House will adopt the Stubbs amendment, and if not that amendment, then the committee amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, let me submit to you as a practical proposition that Harry Hopkins was probably right when he said to the Committee on Appropriations that he could do little in this matter of discriminating against aliens on the W. P. A. rolls.

We may look at it in this way. If an illegal entrant into this country is single and unencumbered with a family, he will find a job and he will find some bread and beans somewhere without resorting to W. P. A. If, however, such an alien has a family consisting of an American wife and American children, what are you going to do about him? If, within the tenor of this amendment, you strike his name from the relief rolls, you have left a wife and her children, who are American citizens, high and dry and hungry. On the other hand, if you say to me that the wife can apply for relief, then I will say to you that you will have the spectacle of having stricken an alien from the rolls whose wife goes on in his place to get the same kind of relief, so that he will be eating the bitter bread of charity along with his family when he would rather work for it. What an anomalous situation this is, and I do not believe you are going to deal with it by any categorical legislation.

I am entirely in sympathy with the idea of giving preference to American citizens but, in practice, Mr. Hopkins ran into all kinds of difficulties and I concluded that he was right, after I read the testimony last night. I think our futile efforts will come to naught.

There is a curious lot of confused thinking on this whole subject of aliens on relief and I trust that I can make several points clear.

As a general proposition, I heartily favor the idea of giving preference to citizens as against aliens. In general, I can agree that aliens are here by sufferance and that there is no obligation to provide relief or relief work for them at the expense of the taxpayers. It would therefore seem to be a simple thing to make them prove their citizenship and in the absence of proof, strike their names from the rolls of relief eligibles. What a pity that in practice it is not so simple.

The amendment pending before us is plausible enough and doubtless will be passed. Yet, if labor, if the veterans, if citizens generally could foresee all the implications of that amendment, they probably would be opposed to it in its present form.

First of all, it contains some political aspects. Do not forget that if you charge a relief supervisor with the responsibility of striking the names of aliens from the rolls, you also provide him with a weapon which in indiscriminate hands, could be an instrument of grave abuse. If the relief supervisor decided for political or personal reasons that he did not like the accent, the color of the hair, the slant of the nose, or the color of the skin of a relief applicant who was actually a citizen, he could cause so much trouble, so much inconvenience and so much delay by demanding undue proof of citizenship that the whole relief program purpose would be perverted or destroyed. The gains made by taking alleged aliens from the rolls would be offset by the trouble and distress caused to those who are not aliens but who might be politically persona non grata. In those areas peopled by folks of foreign extraction, the possibilities for abuse would be grave indeed.

Next comes an administrative difficulty. When you state in a legislative enactment that no part of the appropriation shall be used to provide relief for aliens, you place a personal responsibility upon supervisors, district directors, and others. If they make payment or provide relief work in violation of the statute, they become personally responsible. If they have any lingering doubts or suspicions about the citizenship of any relief worker, they would obviously hold up his pay, and the annoyance that can and will result will be tremendous.

Third, there are and have been so many loose statements bandied about this Chamber as to the number of aliens on relief that some of these indiscriminate remarks should be analyzed. Probably the most zealous crusader against aliens was Secretary Doak, who was Secretary of Labor under President Hoover. His zeal was so great that many people believed it to be a kind of persecution. It is not likely, therefore, that Secretary Doak would understate the case. Now, if you examine Senate Document No. 257, third session of the Seventy-first Congress, you will find a letter written by Secretary Doak to the Secretary of the United States Senate to the effect that in his opinion there were not to exceed 400,000 aliens here who were without proper certificates of arrival or registration cards and who could therefore be classified as illegal entrants. He estimated also that of that number, not to exceed 100,000 were deportable as being unlawfully here. If from that estimate there is deducted the number who have been deported since that time and the number who are self-sustaining, the problem of relief to aliens who are unlawfully here appears to be greatly magnified.

Fourth, the question of whether an alien is illegally in this country is always a matter of controversy. The immigration laws, for one thing, are rather confusing. Through the years they have been patched up with liberalizing or restricting amendments to the point where a vast amount of data and dates and laws and regulations must be examined before the matter can be determined. By the time that the status of many aliens alleged to be illegal entrants and on relief is determined, the need for relief may be over. Meanwhile, they are subjected to the distress of hunger and suffering.

I subscribe to the general import of the amendment, but I fear that it was prepared without having in mind the many ramifications that are involved and trust that in conference at least, some provision can be made to prevent discrimination against dependent wives and children of aliens who are citizens of this country and as much entitled to relief sustenance as any other person.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein some extracts from a statement before the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I favor the Stubbs amendment. One of the most important problems facing the Congress today is the urgent necessity for the passage of legislation which will prevent the employment of aliens who entered America illegally. As long as we have American citizens who are unemployed and who are forced to ask the Federal Government and local agencies for relief, aliens who entered America illegally should not be employed, particularly by the Government. Neither should the Government uphold their illegal entry and illegal residence by granting such persons relief or loans.

I have introduced H. R. 12083, which prohibits such employment and the administering of such relief. It is estimated that we have now in America more than 16,000,000 persons of foreign birth, over 7,000,000 of whom are illegally in this country. This bill, H. R. 12083, would not only prevent the employment of these aliens but provides for their immediate deportation. If we have 10,000,000 people in America unemployed and almost 4,000,000 deportable aliens, it is obvious that if these aliens can be promptly deported, then the unemployment-relief problem in our country would become negligible.

I have also pending H. R. 7079, which would not only deport habitual aliens, habitual alien criminals, enemies of our Government, dope peddlers, alien smugglers, aliens carrying machine and sawed-off shotguns, as practically all racketeers and gangsters do, but it would further restrict immigration by reducing existing European quotas 75 percent and applying the quota system of restrictions to countries of this hemisphere, reserving 75 percent of those quotas for the very near relatives, such as aged parents and the like, of naturalized foreign-born and foreign-born residents lawfully in the United States able to support them.

Daily aliens are entering illegally. The Immigration Service reports a 50-percent increase in alien stowaways, deserting seamen, and the like over the previous year, and that alien smuggling is on the increase—boats, automobiles, and even a number of airplanes being apprehended smuggling aliens into our country. A current release of the Department of State on the immigration work of the Department calls attention to the startling facts that our consular offices report a waiting list of over a quarter million and that there are in 47 of the 68 European quota countries alone about 1,000,000 aliens desirous of coming to the United States.

The last census reveals a large number of foreign-born over 14,000,000; a large foreign-stock population, over 40,000,000; and aliens, over 6,000,000. What we need is an immigration holiday; and my bill's enactment would give it to us by reducing existing quotas 75 percent, reserving them practically for parents and other near relatives, and extending quota restrictions to countries of this hemisphere whose immigrants are not now numerically limited and which countries absolutely exclude our nationals from entry for permanent residence or to work. We have over 10,000,000 unemployed and do not need and ought not to have the hundreds of alien skilled and unskilled workers and job hunters that are entering our country. We have too many unemployed as it is, without importing another one. Not only have we too many unemployed, but we have too many applicants for relief, too many dependents, defectives, and delinquents without allowing another one to be imported. Each country should care for its own unemployed and dependents. Charity should begin at home. Immigration should be further restricted and entirely suspended.

DEPORTS ALIENS

If enacted, the bill will not only really restrict immigration, but it will deport the three or four million aliens illegally and unlawfully in the country, and by so doing go a long way toward solving our unemployment and relief problems, because the bill expressly provides that all aliens must get naturalized forthwith or get out, and aliens illegally here cannot produce the necessary certificate of legal entry absolutely necessary for naturalization.

STOP IMMIGRATION ENTIRELY

I would go further than H. R. 7079 provides by the enactment of H. R. 11741, which I have introduced. This bill provides for the suspension of immigration of aliens into the country. In other words, under its provisions immigration would be stopped altogether. Our country would be far better off to stop absolutely immigration of foreigners into our country until we can Americanize foreigners who are now here. I introduced this bill and earnestly advocate its passage, but it appears that many of my colleagues feel that its provisions are too drastic. Surely such colleagues could not object to the provisions of H. R. 7079.

FINGERPRINT ALIENS

I would call your attention also to H. R. 11740, which I have introduced, and which is a bill to provide for the registration of aliens and a certificate of identification. I quote from this bill, as follows:

That every alien in the United States shall, within 3 months after the enactment of this act, apply to the Bureau of Naturalization for an identification certificate. Every alien, after the enactment of this act, before being admitted into the United States for temporary stay or permanent residence, shall apply for an identification certificate at the port of entry, and such application shall be a condition of admission.

Application for identification certificate shall be in duplicate and sworn to or affirmed by applicant. It shall state place and date of birth, sex, nationality, married or single, dependents, occupation, height, weight, fingerprints, and such other descriptive facts as may be required by the Secretary of Labor. A photograph shall be attached to each copy of application, and an additional photograph shall be furnished by applicant for certificate. Every alien under 18 years of age shall be registered by parent or guardian.

A certificate of identification upon proper application shall be issued to each alien who is above 18 years of age. It shall contain a photograph of alien furnished by him, signature, fingerprints, age, height, weight, and other apparent distinguishing characteristics of alien, with address which shall be on card of suitable size for carrying in pocket or purse. Every immigrant shall have his address entered upon his certificate within 3 months after entry by an officer authorized by the Secretary of Labor.

SEC. 2. Every alien shall, on demand, exhibit his certificate of identification to a representative of the Department of Labor and to any court of the United States, of any State, or subdivision of any State, or to any constable, sheriff, police officer, or other peace officer, local, State, or National. Refusal or failure of alien to produce and exhibit said certificate of identification shall be prima-facie evidence of illegal entry and such alien shall be deported.

If the Congress will pass this bill, our immigration and unemployment problems will both be settled favorably and permanently. It will cause the registration of every alien in the country and the immediate deportation of everyone who has entered illegally or who, although entered legally, commits any crime after his or her entrance into the United States. All lawfully entered aliens in our country who desire to become American citizens undoubtedly should have no objection to this registration.

I call the attention of my colleagues to these bills which I have introduced and which are now before the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, and urge your cooperation in my effort to obtain the passage of these bills before adjournment. The passage of either one of these bills will be a great step toward making and preserving America for Americans. My position on immigration matters is well known to my colleagues. Ever since I have been a Member of the House I have worked consistently for restriction of immigration and for the deportation of undesirable aliens. Since I have been a Member of the Congress, immigration has been restricted by about 90 percent, but our laws, particularly deportation laws, are too lax and must be better enforced if we are to stamp out communism and other "isms" which are contrary to the principles upon which our Government is founded.

No legislation of greater importance to our country can claim our attention, and no other measure is quite as important as a relief measure. I urge your support and cooperation in the passage of this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I have already addressed the House once today urging legislation for the restriction of immigration, for the deportation of aliens, and to prevent Federal W. P. A. and relief agencies from giving loans, grants, and employment to illegal aliens. I called your attention to H. R. 7079, which I have pending and which would deport aliens; also, H. R. 11741, which would suspend all immigration; and H. R. 11740, which I have now pending and which would register, thumbprint, and identify aliens and compel them to carry their identifications with them or be deported. H. R. 12083, which I have introduced and which is now pending, will absolutely prohibit Federal agencies from giving relief and employment to aliens.

The amendment to the W. P. A., which is now before the House, will prevent giving relief and W. P. A. employment to aliens. It is not as far as I would go on this subject, but seems to be the best obtainable as an amendment to this relief bill; therefore I urge all friends of restricted immigration to vote for the amendment.

We have possibly 16,000,000 persons of foreign birth in our country and several millions of them here illegally. Also, hundreds of thousands of them have been getting W. P. A. employment and Federal relief. If you will adopt this amendment to prevent such Federal assistance in the future, you will go a long way toward relieving the unemployment of Americans in this country, and it will be one of the best votes you ever made in the interest of true Americanism, and I urge your vote for the amendment. [Applause.]

FLORIDA CANAL

Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, I can only briefly discuss the Florida canal because time is too limited today. I have heretofore on a number of occasions discussed the project at length before the House and also the Appropriations Committee. I would particularly call your attention to the fact that 2 days ago the House voted by a vote of 210 to 84 to approve three projects which bear the same legislative history as the Florida Canal. I have reference to the projects in West Virginia, Mississippi, and New Mexico. These three projects, together with the Florida Canal and Passamaquoddy, were several weeks ago recommended by the Bureau of the Budget and certified to the House Committee on Appropriations for inclusion in the War Department appropriation bill. They carried a total item of $29,000,000. The House Appropriations Committee declined to include them in the War Department bill. The bill was sent to the Senate. The Senate did not include the Florida Canal and the Passamaquoddy projects but did include the other three projects.

None of the five projects were authorized directly by a special act of Congress, but were all begun by President Roosevelt under the general authority given him in the work-relief bill passed the last session of Congress, and which carried an appropriation of $4,800,000,000. Parliamentary and legal authority hold that the Florida Canal is in fact authorized. He began all five of these projects in good faith and according to authority given him by the Congress. Now, the House and Senate have both approved appropriation for these three projects above referred to, and it is the duty of the Congress likewise to appropriate for the Florida Canal project. It is undoubtedly of far greater general importance than either of the five projects. It is giving more employment directly and indirectly than either of the five. It is the only one of the five which will carry permanent benefits in the future to practically every State in the Union.

The Florida canal when completed will save in operating costs of ships $8,000,000 annually. It will save to shippers of America in transportation charges over $30,000,000 annually. It will handle one and one-half times the tonnage which now transits the Panama Canal. It will eliminate existing storm hazards incurred by ships passing around the Florida Peninsula. It will be a great asset to our national defense. It will save 700 or 800 miles shipping distance between New York and New Orleans.

The Chief of the Army Engineers, after a thorough survey, has concluded that no serious damage will be done to Florida's underground water supply or to Florida's fruit and vegetable growth. After thorough study the Chief of the Army Engineers and other eminent engineers and engineering boards have concluded that it is economically sound, is justifiable as a river and harbor project, and is in the public interest. We are spending billions of dollars for unemployment relief and for public improvements. Thousands of the projects upon which work has been done are of far less general importance and general benefit than the Florida Canal. In fact, this project is the banner project, and will ultimately stand out as a lasting monument of real achievement and public improvement of President Roosevelt's administration. I cannot see how any Member of the House can conscientiously object to applying funds for the completion of this project. Federal funds cannot be expended on any projects quite so meritorious as this one. It is the duty of our administration to complete the project, and I cannot believe that in duty you will fail.

I include herewith a portion of a statement which I made before the House Appropriations Committee on April 10, 1936:

Mr. GREEN. The Board of Engineers, which was appointed by the President and a special board to iron out any differences which might exist between the Public Works engineers' report and the Army Engineers' tentative report, made an exhaustive study of the project, and recommended that it was sound; that it could be built; and that it would return more than 6-percent interest on the investment in actual saving in the operation of ships. They recommended that it could be, and should be, constructed and that it was in the public interest. The way they scaled it was this: They figured that it would require $143,000,000 to construct it, and they figured that it would save to shipping, or in the actual operation of ships, approximately $8,000,000 a year, or a little more than that. But say a saving of $8,000,000 a year, and that would be a return of about 6 percent on the investment. The standard yardstick for the majority of river and harbor projects is about 4-percent return, so that the return on this investment would be 33⅓ percent greater than the usual standard set for river and harbor projects. So far as the percentage of saving is concerned, it is probably better than any project the Army Engineers have ever reported.

AUTHORITY AND ESTIMATES FOR THE CANAL

Mr. TABER. There are two questions I would like to hear you discuss: In the first place, is there a Budget estimate for this?

Mr. GREEN. Yes; there is a Budget estimate. The Bureau of the Budget has recently favorably recommended $12,000,000 appropriations by your committee to continue work this year.

Mr. TABER. In the second place, is it authorized by law, and, if not, why do you not go to the committee that would have authority to report such a bill?

Mr. GREEN. The Bureau of the Budget recommended to the Appropriations Committee of the House that funds be appropriated by this Congress in the amount of $12,000,000 for the continuation of this project; so I consider that as a Budget approval. As for authorization by Congress, it was one of those projects that the Engineers had agreed upon. They determined the feasibility of it and the desirability of it and the economic soundness of the project. By that I mean the Army Engineers, or the Chief of Army Engineers. The board had never made a full report on it, and pending that report Congress passed the emergency relief bill last year, and in that bill they gave the President authority and direction, or, as I see it, an order to use this money for the relief of unemployment in America, and to embark upon such projects as he deemed to be in the public interest. Regarding it as a mandate, and it was a mandate, this was one of the projects he embarked upon.

He began work on the canal last September and allocated to it from W. P. A. funds $5,000,000. Since that time another five or six hundred thousand dollars have likewise been allocated. He put it in charge of the Board of Army Engineers, and they have it now under actual construction, with about 6,500 men employed. This project has taken up the main portion of the unemployed in my State. They are getting more value in that respect than they could have received under any other plan, because they are paying P. W. A. wages. They are paying unskilled workmen, who are working on the project, I understand, $26 per month, and, in addition thereto, they give them bed and possibly food. I believe they get food.

Mr. TABER. That is more than the going wage in that locality?

Mr. GREEN. I believe in this locality in Florida is paid from $1 to $1.50 per day. That is for common labor.

Mr. TABER. They do not work every day for W. P. A.

Mr. GREEN. I think they pay for 5 days per week on the canal; so they are complying with the usual prevailing rate in that locality.

Mr. TABER. The usual rate is $1 for a 10-hour day.

Mr. GREEN. It is $1 to $1.50 for an 8-hour day. That is what we usually pay. They are making unusual strides on this work.

Now, as to whether or not Congress has approved it is a question for each one to decide for himself. I say that it has approved it, because it was approved in the general works bill that passed with the authorization of $4,800,000,000, and the President began it under this express authorization and direction.

The Chief of the Army Engineers has approved it; the Public Works engineers have approved it; the special board of review appointed by the President approved it. This board consisted of two Army engineers, two P. W. A. engineers, and one engineer from civilian life, and it has had every approval except the direct passage of a bill by Congress, the naming of the project.

BENEFITS TO BE DERIVED FROM THE CANAL

There is one thing, gentlemen, that I would like for you particularly to bear in mind.

This project is of general benefit. Thirty-nine States in the Union are directly interested in it. It will save to the shipping public in transportation costs $30,000,000 to $32,000,000 a year. Those figures have been given by the Department of Commerce under Secretary Roper. That does not mean the cost of operating the ships; that is eight million and something. It will save the Government in mail contracts alone $800,000 a year. It will save in distance time almost 3 days round trip in traveling from the east coast of the United States—Philadelphia, for example—to New Orleans. That saving is enormous. It has been estimated—not by me, but by commerce experts; the Department of Commerce and the Board of Army Engineers made this estimate—that one and one-half times the tonnage which now goes through the Panama Canal each year will pass through this canal. This tonnage will be procured from all the States of the Mississippi Valley, and the tonnage going the other way will be procured from all the East Coast States and foreign countries. Ports like Philadelphia and New York will experience a decided increase in their water-borne tonnage. Every State in the Union, practically, will share in the benefits in producing the material that goes into construction.

Men today, not only from Florida but from practically every State in the Union—I am referring to skilled labor—are now working on this canal. They the taking them from the civil-service rolls—all skilled laborers and office personnel—and they are drawn from all over the United States. The steel that goes into the dredges—and they now have a large number of dredges operating there—comes from the iron-producing sections of our country; cement likewise, and all of the material.

Now, then, I say the Congress is morally bound to carry on this project. My people a year ago—a little less than a year ago—when the project was ready to be initiated, bonded themselves for a million and a half dollars to purchase the right-of-way. That bond has been voted by a vote of 27 to 1. A large block of the bonds has been sold; the money has been exchanged and paid for the deeds to the land, the right-of-way, and that has been turned over to the Federal Government.

That was one of the stipulations made to the President—an oral stipulation; do not misunderstand; an oral stipulation—that I, for one, promised the President would be carried out if he would embark upon the construction of this canal; that Florida would furnish the right-of-way. Our people have done this now, and this Government, by this act of the Chief Executive beginning construction on the project, is morally bound to my people to complete it. We have done all that they have asked us to do.

ARGUMENTS IN OPPOSITION TO CANAL

Now, there has been in the State a little opposition to this canal. There has been some propaganda sent out to the effect that this canal, if constructed, will have a detrimental effect upon the water supply and upon the vegetation of that area south of the canal. The Board of Army Engineers, through the Chief of Engineers—and I will put that in the record—concludes that he has examined it and that no adverse effects will accrue therefrom. No board of engineers, no engineer, that has made a careful survey, says that it will have any serious adverse effect.

There are 30,000 lakes in the State of Florida. This canal route has two large rivers, one from either direction—one from the Atlantic and one from the Gulf—feeding this canal and beginning and ending it. The engineers have estimated and found that there is a sufficient volume of water which will flow into the canal from the midsection of it so that there will be a continuous current to the Atlantic and a continuous current to the Gulf of Mexico of fresh water, and that the salt water, in fact, will never get to the interior parts of the State in this canal. Therefore, if the salt water cannot get there, the underground fresh water could not be contaminated. But even granting that the salt water could get there, the engineers have found that where salt-water streams impregnate our State, all along by those salt-water streams, fresh-water springs are found. Orange groves and groves of other trees and general vegetables grow on the very bank of the salt-water stream, out from St. Augustine some 3 miles; in the Atlantic Ocean there is a huge spring that yields so much fresh water, away out in the ocean, that the shrimping boats, instead of going to St. Augustine to refill with water, go to this spring, throw out their buckets, fill up their tanks, and other receptacles, and go back to fishing, and do not go ashore for days. You can go anywhere, almost on the edge of the Florida salt water, the edge of the coast, bore down a few feet, and get a fresh-water—sometimes artesian water.

The engineers claim—and they know; and if they do not, common sense would lead us to know—that if this canal would contaminate the spring water and the underground streams in our State, the salt water adjacent to the shores of Florida—and it is enveloped all the way around by salt water; you cannot get more than 50 or 60 miles from salt water in Florida—if that should obtain, every foot of Florida land today would be spoiled by salt seepage from the ocean.

So that is a smoke screen put out by the opposition. The opposition to this canal is the usual opposition to practically all water improvements. It is the railroad opposition. They fear that they may haul less tonnage and that the transportation rate charge may be reduced. My contention is that the transportation charge will be reduced, but the tonnage hauled by the railroads will be so greatly increased that the railroads will produce more revenue every year after the canal is constructed than they are producing today—every railroad going into that territory. These common carriers will thus be enabled to employ more people and also pay greater dividends on their investments.

So the argument relative to contamination of water and our vegetation has been disproven, and is absolutely without foundation, according to the superior engineering figures and conclusions in the matter. If we cannot trust the Chief of Engineers of the Army, after he has carefully examined the project—and he has; he has appointed a special committee of his engineers to examine it and to determine these questions—I do not know whom we could trust. That is the highest authority we have, and they say that it will not contaminate the water and the vegetation will not be seriously affected.

I do not believe that 2 percent of the people of Florida oppose this canal. There was some opposition in Tampa to it, and I find in my records here a letter from Tampa, from the chamber of commerce or some organization there, indicating that if they could get the canal routed through Tampa they were for the Florida canal. They did not get the route through Tampa, and in that part of the State of Florida a few of them are opposing the canal—very few. There is always a certain rivalry and jealousy in every State relative to where a great improvement or a great project shall be located. So that minor rivalry has existed in our State.

There is also a slight opposition from a few shipowners; not those who operate their own ships but the shipowner who sublets his ship to another man and reaps his pay for that ship by the number of miles that the ship makes. He leases his ship out; that ship goes all the way around the Florida Peninsula and does that extra 3 days' time and mileage in going to New Orleans and back. Naturally he would get more mileage for his ship, having made this trip, and that man naturally would be against shortening of the distance of transportation from New York City, we will say, to New Orleans. That is only to be expected. However, the man that operates his ship himself naturally wants to see this saving in coal, this saving in operating expense, and this shortened mileage obtained.

UTILIZATION OF CANAL

So when this canal is opened I believe that 99 percent of the shipping interests that now ply the lower Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico will utilize this canal. It has been estimated by careful surveys—surveys by the Department of Commerce and specially employed engineers—that 10,000 ships per year will go through the canal carrying the usual tonnage carried by boats in the Gulf of Mexico and the lower Atlantic. You can very well see that within 32 years the canal would liquidate its cost of construction, at a 4-percent bond, and pay for the cost of operation.

Another great reason why it should be completed is because of the storms that boats run into in going around the peninsula of Florida. We had last year some disasters down there from storms. The boats will cut through this canal and absolutely eliminate any serious danger from storms. The storm insurance to the boat owner will be lessened. His premium will be smaller; casualties will be practically eliminated, and citizens traveling from every State in the Union will be benefited and protected by it.

Another thing: Suppose you wanted to empty your fighting craft from the Atlantic to the Gulf of Mexico, or vice versa, in time of war. The next trouble we have that is serious is going to come from south of us. You have got here an outlet that will put every one of your fighting vessels from the Atlantic to the Gulf of Mexico, or vice versa, in only a few hours. You have there a defense that cannot be paralleled anywhere else in the United States. If this canal is completed—and it will be—your Navy will forever be secure. It could never be captured. Our Navy sometime may have to retreat into the Gulf of Mexico from the Pacific Ocean through the Panama Canal or from the Atlantic Ocean through the Florida canal. You have enough natural resources to feed your Navy and to feed your people in the Mississippi Valley and to maintain and rebuild your Navy there. As a national-defense feature alone it warrants a $143,000,000 expenditure. It will not require that much. They have already spent about five and one-half million on it. It probably will be completed for $125,000,000.

Now, gentlemen, when we are spending these moneys as we have been—and I feel gravely the responsibility of it, the indebtedness that we are incurring as an absolute condition of necessity, brought on by conditions that this present administration inherited—as we are spending these moneys, undoubtedly they should be spent on projects which are of lasting improvement to the American people. And this one is a lasting improvement to the American people. Eighty percent of the money that has gone in the project and will go to complete this canal goes directly and indirectly into the hands of labor.

I do not see what better project could be developed. The Chief of Engineers of the Army has repeatedly told me that as a straight Army engineering project alone, as a river and harbor project alone, it justifies an expenditure of over $100,000,000. If we are going to develop our national waterways, why not put this main link in there that will link up the Gulf commerce with the Atlantic commerce, and thereby enhance the value of every dollar we have expended in the Mississippi Valley and on the Atlantic coast?

We have developed an intercoastal waterway from Boston to Jacksonville, Fla., and we have jumped right across and on the other side of Florida we have developed it on to the Rio Grande. Now, why not put in this further link there? I cannot believe that this committee will permit the matter to be tied up here, and the money that you have already put in thrown away.

Do you think Congress is going to appropriate money to fill up that 16-mile ditch that the Army engineers have dug there? The Army engineers have a canal there today approximately 16 miles long and 30 feet deep. You can land an airplane in it, and it is the best landing field you ever saw—the bottom of that canal. They have it in some places down almost to sea level. Now, then, are we going to be an unwise Congress and go there and fill up the hole that we have already dug, or are we going to do what the engineers say is prudent, what the Department of Commerce says is prudent, and what the shipping companies that are not selfish say is prudent, and go on and complete it? Are we going to help the east coast of the United States all the way down from Boston by completing a project that is really worth something, or are we going to abandon it, blow off the hounds, and quit the drive, and say that we will boondoggle around and throw the taxpayers' money away on projects of little or no permanent benefit? It is a grave responsibility that the Congress has in this matter. It is a project that the American people practically everywhere want. Every water organization in the United States has endorsed it and passed resolutions for it. Every engineering authority that has examined it has approved it. And yet there is some hedging around because Congress has not directly passed a bill for it. We must not hide behind technicalities to try to defeat this, the banner project of the New Deal.

In the former committee, the subcommittee on the Army bill, they did not turn down this project in actuality. It is true they declined to include it, but the report transmitting the bill to the Congress cited that the item could be taken care of in the deficiency bill. But the matter that I am trying to bring to the attention of the committee is this: If your deficiency bill contains your W. P. A. funds, there is ample room for this canal appropriation therein. A clause can be put in directing that this project be carried on in your recommendation to Congress; and I do not believe this committee would want to see five and one-half million dollars spent on a project like this, that is of national interest and national importance, not only to us but to the American people for all time, and then have it abandoned. It cannot be abandoned.

The reason Europe today has economy in transportation, gentlemen—and you have studied the figures, I know—is because she has developed her waterways. According to her area of land, she has developed her waterways a number of times, probably six or seven times, more than the American people have. But we have now got to come to waterway development. Our volume of commerce demands it. More commerce is hauled every year than was hauled the previous year. The building of this canal is not going to lessen your transportation by bus or your transportation by rail. It is going to increase it, because it will increase the general volume of commerce.

Take this example, for instance, if you will—and this is something that all you gentlemen are interested in. Your constituents ship apples; they ship cotton; they ship vegetables. In Florida we have to pay, we will say, 80 or 90 cents to ship a crate of vegetables to the East. That crate of vegetables has got to bring that 80 or 90 cents plus the commission cost and enough to put it in the crate. When it ceases to do that, the grower ceases to ship it. If that could be transported there for 30 or 40 cents, that other 50 cents would enable the grower to market half of the crop now that decays in the field.

Not long ago I passed through a tomato field in Florida, and I saw the alleys filled with edible tomatoes that should have been canned or should have been shipped. I inquired why. They said, "We pay a dollar express on them. We cannot get this for them." This Florida canal, when constructed, could put them in New York for probably 30 cents.

I went on to a little town 3 miles farther and ate tomatoes that were canned in Italy.

Now, gentlemen, it is our duty to develop our waterways. With the opening of this Florida canal, Florida tomatoes and Florida oranges that are now rotting in the fields and on the trees will be transported to the eastern market at a price at which they can afford to eat them. It is a matter of volume. They will transport three crates where they transport one crate now, and for those three crates they will get about $1.20 or $1.50 to transport it, and for one crate they get about 90 cents now. Over half of the States in the Union will share in these benefits accruing from this canal.

It is obvious that it is in the public interest and for the public welfare to go on with a project like this.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would love to talk more, but I will not bore you too much with it. I know you have been liberal, and I appreciate it, and if I may have permission to extend my remarks, I may put in one or two brief items of interest. The same arguments that obtain against this project obtained against the Panama Canal, and today the tolls on that Canal bring from twenty to twenty-eight million dollars into the Federal Treasury a year. We do not want a toll canal across Florida, but if by chance tolls should be charged, this canal will pay for itself, and pay 4-percent interest, in 32 years.

Our duty in this matter, as I see it, is obvious. It is clear to me. It will enhance the value of your Panama Canal and its usefulness; and I hope your committee will provide funds that will be used for work on this project for the next 12 months.

The CHAIRMAN. You may have permission to revise and extend your remarks.

Mr. GREEN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman; and I appreciate your letting me come before you. I hope that the committee will consider it that way and not permit technicalities or minor things to stand in the way of the completion of a project that will stand out as the principal achievement in the way of public construction benefit of the first half of this century. Each generation in the future will reap benefits most justifiable.

I thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia and the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk again reported the Woodrum amendment and the substitute amendment.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TARVER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] has been referred to by the Chair as a committee amendment. I wish to inquire what it takes to constitute a committee amendment. This amendment has never been submitted to the committee, and, so far as I know, is the handiwork of the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not consider that a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully insist, in all seriousness, that the inquiry is made in good faith and affects parliamentary procedure and should receive courteous consideration by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. While the Chair does not consider that a parliamentary inquiry, having reference to the actions of a committee——

Mr. TARVER. The question is simply whether the Chair is correct or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend until the Chair completes his statement.

Proceedings in committee are something about which the Chair has no knowledge. However, the Chair will ask the gentleman from Virginia whether the amendment is a committee amendment or an amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] offers the amendment, and it is offered with my approval. The gentleman from Virginia did not put anything on the amendment that stated it was a committee amendment. Because the amendment comes from a member of the committee, the Clerk simply read it as a committee amendment. It was not offered by us as a committee amendment, but it is approved by both of us.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from California to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and there were on a division (demanded by Mr. MCFARLANE and Mr. FULLER)—ayes 45, noes 93.

So the substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

The question was taken; and there were on a division (demanded by Mr. BOILEAU)—ayes 136, noes 19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BACON: Page 21, line 12, after the word "Administration", strike out the comma and insert in lieu thereof the following: "cooperatively under State and local nonpartisan boards to be appointed by the Governor of, or, as may be determined by each State and Territory, and the personnel thereof to be composed of citizens of the United States residing in the respective areas of administration."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, a little while ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] offered an amendment to this whole paragraph which would have returned the control of relief, aided by the expenditure of Federal money to the respective States. That amendment was defeated.

This amendment has for its purpose the elimination of politics in the administration of this fund. It does not in any way disturb the W. P. A. set-up, except this: Instead of a political administration in the several States, who have used relief funds for political purposes, it substitutes for this political administration a nonpartisan board to be set up by each of the States.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman think that at this time there can be a nonpolitical, nonpartisan board?

Mr. BACON. If it is a nonpartisan board, or a bipartisan board, at least the minority party members would have full knowledge of any attempt to play politics with the taxpayers' money and would be able to resist it.

This amendment sets up a nonpartisan board in the different localities. It is an attempt to cooperate with the present W. P. A. by nonpartisan boards in the States, counties, and several political subdivisions of the States. It continues, however, the present organization in Washington.

Mr. CURLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACON. No; I have but 5 minutes. It is an attempt to give the States, counties, and smaller political units a "say" about the expenditure of this money and not only Mr. Hopkins' bureaucratic administration. It is an honest attempt to eliminate politics from relief. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment close in 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman withdraws his reservation of a point of order?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] undertakes to set up what he calls nonpartisan boards in the States, to work in a cooperative effort with the W. P. A. Administrator. It will just be another hurdle, another impediment, another stumbling block in the way of quick administration of this relief fund. We can sit here for days and figure out ways in which we think we might improve on this program, but after all we must either go forward or junk the whole thing. For my part, I think Mr. Hopkins is doing a good job. I think he is doing as good a job as any man could do with the problem he has to handle. He does cooperate with State agencies and works in cooperation with those agencies as far as he can. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHURCH: Page 22, line 8, after the word "appropriation", insert the following: "Provided, however, That no part of the funds herein appropriated shall be used for the continuation of the activities of the Resettlement Administration."

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, I feel so keenly against the Tugwellian philosophy of government, his state capitalistic theory of regimentation and control, that I am submitting this amendment in an effort to make absolutely certain that none of these funds will be at the disposition of Dr. Tugwell and the Resettlement Administration.

To indicate the attitude of Dr. Tugwell toward our democratic system of government and the Congress of the United States, which is the very nucleus of that system, I wish to call your attention to the form of lease used by the Tugwell Resettlement Administration, which makes the licensee or homesteader a mere instrument of the Government. He virtually contracts away his individual freedom. I have already spoken about this matter this afternoon, but I again call your attention to one section of that homestead lease or license which should be of special interest to us as representatives of the people. I read from one of the homesteaders' contracts, form RA–MA 12, revised January 15, 1936, and approved by Administrator Tugwell:

6. Noneligibility to benefits: No Member of or Delegate to Congress or Resident Commissioner shall be permitted to any share or part of this license or to any benefit that may arise thereupon.

No Member of Congress wants to share in these benefits. He speaks as though there really were some benefits, but I personally resent the implication which such a provision in a contract makes. Remember that this contract form is sent to at least the 500,000 people he refers to as likely homesteaders, indirectly expressing to them a bureaucrat's opinion of their representatives in Congress.

I have presented this amendment to give you an opportunity of expressing your convictions on this matter by your vote. I want to give you an opportunity to stop Tugwellism in the United States as a growing theory of government under the New Deal which can certainly be said to be communistic.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I am sorry, I cannot yield. The gentleman has plenty of time and has control of it. Mr. Chairman, I ask Members of Congress to express by their vote in favor of this amendment their resentment of this insult. It is an unwarranted reflection on Members of Congress sent throughout the United States and its Territories, scattered broadcast, by Tugwell and his resettlement organization.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, not one cent of this money can be allotted to the Resettlement Administration. It has all to be spent by the Works Progress Administration, except as we otherwise specifically provide in the bill.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. CHURCH. I say that under the wording of this bill every nickel of the billion and a half dollars can be used by the President's turning it over to any department and then turning that department or bureau over to Tugwell; the so-called restrictions are not restrictions.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, if this bill passes in its present form the President will not have any authority or power to allot one cent of this money. The appropriation is made by Congress to the Works Progress Administration, to be expended by the Works Progress Administration, and not one iota of authority is carried to the President or anybody else to allot any of this money. Even Mr. Hopkins himself cannot allot it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULL: On page 22, line 8, after the word "appropriation", insert: "Provided further, That there may be apportioned from the amount herein included for rural rehabilitation and relief to farmers an amount sufficient to provide work-relief projects which will enable farmers indebted to the Farm Credit Administration or the Resettlement Administration for feed and seed loans, to pay such loans from the proceeds of such employment."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I should like to explain the situation which brings forth this amendment.

During the terrific drought which affected the dairy region of the Northwest, thousands of dairymen had their crops destroyed. Not only in 1 year but for several years a large portion of that section of the country had suffered from dry weather, and for a number of years the farmers were on a steady decline so far as financial and other resources were concerned. Then came the drought year of 1934. The Government purchased thousands of head of cattle from those dairymen to keep them from starving, depleting the herds, and then furnished feedstuffs to take care of other cattle. Last year was not a good crop year in many of the counties in that dairy region. In consequence, the amount of the seed loans has grown to a considerable amount. In one county in my district the amount is over $100,000.

There are many farmers who want to pay, and they cannot pay their feed and seed loans. The Resettlement Administration has endeavored to work out a plan whereby a portion of them can have work on work-relief projects, such as farm-to-market roads. There are loans, however, which were obtained from the Farm Credit Administration. The Farm Credit Administration has manifested no similar interest in the farmers. Its agents have pressed farmers on their seed loans and continue to harass them, even though the situation is plain that payment should not be expected at this time.

I, therefore, present this amendment with the hope that it may have favorable consideration, even though technically a point of order may lie against it. Unless something can be accomplished under this measure and the farmers afforded some relief, the hardships under which they are laboring will become greater instead of lessened. Certainly the farmers who have so long suffered because of conditions over which they had no control are entitled to a full measure of consideration.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I must insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCORMACK). The Chair is prepared to rule.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL] proposes a new subject not included in this paragraph, relating to loans, and the Chair holds that the amendment is not germane, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEITER: Page 21, beginning with line 9, strike out all down to and including line 8, on page 22, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"WORKS PROGRESS AND PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATIONS

"To provide relief, and work relief on useful projects, in the United States and its Territories and possessions:

"By the Works Progress Administration, $1,075,000,000, to remain available until June 30, 1937 (except as herein otherwise authorized): Provided, That this appropriation shall be available for the following classes of public projects, Federal and non-Federal, and the amounts to be used for each class shall not, except as hereinafter provided, exceed the respective amounts stated, namely:

"(a) Highways, roads, and streets, $311,850,000;

"(b) Public buildings, $118,450,000;

"(c) Parks and other recreational facilities, including buildings therein, $118,400,000;

"(d) Public utilities, including sewer systems, water supply and purification, airports, and other transportation facilities, $129,250,000;

"(e) Flood control and other conservation, $96,900,000;

"(f) White-collar projects, $64,300,000;

"(g) Women's projects, $64,300,000;

"(h) Miscellaneous work projects, $53,600,000;

"(i) National Youth Administration, $53,600,000; and

"(j) Rural rehabilitation and relief to farmers, $64,300,000: Provided further, That the amount specified for any of the foregoing classes may be increased by not to exceed 15 percent thereof by transfer of an amount or amounts from any other class or classes in order to effectuate the purposes of the foregoing appropriation.

"By the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works $349,950,000 to remain available until June 30, 1937 (except as herein otherwise provided): Provided, That this appropriation shall be available for the following classes of public projects, Federal and non-Federal, namely:

"(a) Highways, roads, and streets;

"(b) Public buildings;

"(c) Parks and other recreational facilities, including buildings therein;

"(d) Public utilities, including sewer systems, water supply, and purification, airports, and other transportation facilities; and

"(e) Flood control and other conservation."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment, to let the gentleman make a short statement.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, you have heard of Custer's last stand—well, this may be BEITER's last stand! In offering this amendment I promise not to bore you any further with figures, statistics, or numerical facts of any kind concerning the merits of the public-works program. I do not know, of course, what the ultimate fate of my amendment will be, but I know that whatever the outcome I shall continue to believe in and uphold the public-works plan of permanent improvement. I am thoroughly convinced that the formula is not only practicable but for many reasons far more desirable than any other method. This is my conviction, and recent developments have only served to further my belief.

The newspapers would have us believe that the main issue in this campaign is a personal feud between the heads of the W. P. A. and P. W. A. agencies. This, of course, might make interesting reading, but personalities are in no way involved. I ask that you consider the amendment I have proposed, and vote for it if you believe in a well-planned program of useful permanent public improvement, and against it if you approve of a program of temporary relief.

I have no quarrel with W. P. A. and admire the way in which that agency has taken men and women from the relief rolls and created jobs to fit their capabilities. However, the qualifications of a great proportion of the people on the relief rolls do not fit them for work on construction projects.

Unemployed clerks and destitute seamstresses cannot be converted into stonemasons, steel workers, and cement finishers overnight. Whether we want to continue a program that was originally intended to be used for a short time only and as an emergency measure of abolishing unemployment must be decided here and now. Three years have passed since the first emergency-relief measure was proposed and enacted and the extent to which private industry can reemploy men and women who are without any means of earning a living is still problematical. We can help industry expand its pay rolls if P. W. A. is continued. You are well acquainted with the facts and with what has happened during the past 3 years. What might be expected from both the W. P. A. and P. W. A. is well known to all of you. Let us strike a balance between a rational program and one characterized by sentiment.

If you believe in the old-fashioned and still popular theory that a better life for the American people is available when factories are going full speed, and mills are operating at the highest capacity, then give industry a break! Vote to continue the public-works program.

In brief, this amendment sets aside $349,950,000 for public-works projects that have been submitted by municipalities in good faith, at the invitation of the Interior Department. Many of them have gone to considerable expense in the preparation of plans, have hired architects and engineers, and sent them here to Washington, only to be told that there were no further funds.

These projects include such things as schoolhouses, waterworks, and sewer systems, and the like of that. This amendment, if adopted, would permit 1,500 projects that compare favorably with W. P. A. projects, to be completed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BEITER. I do not.

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment presented by the gentleman from New York makes no change whatever in the class of work that is to be done. The same language that applies to the various items of this work which the bill provides shall be done under the direction of the Works Progress Administrator is employed in the terms of the amendment which provide for the manner of expenditure of a certain part of those funds which are by this amendment allocated to the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works. The paragraph begins with the identical language employed in the Work Relief and Employment Relief Act of 1935, except the act of 1935 applied to both these Administrators, while the bill under consideration mentions only one. The amendment, therefore, provides for the transfer of the authority over part of this work, or a division of the authority over this work, leaving, roughly, about 75 percent of the fund to be administered by the Works Progress Administrator and transferring approximately 25 percent of it to the Federal Emergency Administrator of Public Works.

In making this transfer—this is an important point of which I ask the Chair to take notice—in making this transfer the amount of the entire appropriation is reduced by $50,000. It is, therefore, a retrenchment in expenditures; and even if it were legislation on an appropriation bill it would be proper because of the retrenchment if it be germane to the subject matter of the bill. The question under consideration is whether or not the amendment is germane. I have pointed out that the work to be done is the same work provided to be done by the bill itself by the Works Progress Administrator.

A transfer of authority from one department to another, not merely from one relief agency to another relief agency, but from one executive department to another executive department has been held to be germane. I refer the Chair to Hinds' Precedents, volume IV, paragraphs 3885 and 3887, cited on page 394 of Jefferson's Manual; and I am going to read the digest of those decisions:

To a bill making appropriations for the Indian Service, an amendment transferring the management of Indian affairs from the Department of the Interior to the War Department, but providing no reduction of expenditures, was held to be germane as an amendment, but subject to the point of order, as being a change of law, and no retrenchment appearing as the result of the proposed change.

The amendment here under consideration, however, proposes a retrenchment, and this makes it germane.

In the second decision I cite to the Chair the retrenchment was made, and I read the digest of the decision:

To the pension appropriation bill, a proposed amendment transferring the Pension Bureau from the Department of the Interior to the War Department; also providing that the offices of Commissioner and Deputy Commissioner of Pensions be abolished, and that the duties of those offices be performed by Army officers, to be designated for that purpose, without additional pay, was held to be in order, being germane and retrenching expenditures in the manner provided in the rule.

The pending amendment goes nothing like as far as the amendments discussed in those two decisions, because the pending amendment provides for no new duties to be performed, for no different class of work to be carried out, but simply in form establishes, and in fact continues, a division of responsibility in the administration of the fund, transferring a portion of it from one administrator to another, and providing a reduction of $50,000 in the amount required to be expended.

Upon this authority, Mr. Chairman, I submit this amendment is in order and not subject to either of the criticisms pointed out.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think so, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

The bill before the Committee provides—

To continue to provide relief and work relief on useful projects in the United States and its Territories and possessions by the Works Progress Administration.

A certain sum of money is appropriated and allocated for the purposes therein stated. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York strikes out this section and substitutes not only provisions which refer to the Works Progress Administration but also inserts new language referring to the Federal Emergency Administrator of Public Works, which is a separate and distinct governmental agency from the Works Progress Administration.

The Chair has before him a decision in a case where it being proposed that the Secretary of War issue medals to personnel of the Army, an amendment was offered proposing that Secretaries of other departments issue similar medals to personnel of the Navy, the Coast Guard, as well as the Army. This was held to be not germane.

It does not necessarily follow that two subjects are germane because they are related to one another.

There is a long line of decisions supporting the fundamental proposition that it is not in order to propose to amend one individual proposition by another individual proposition, even though they may be of the same class.

It appears to the Chair that the proposed amendment seeks to amend one individual proposition by the addition of another individual proposition. They may be in the same class, but the pending paragraph relates to the Works Progress Administration, while the proposed amendment attempts to amend it by bringing within its provision an allocation of funds to be utilized and expended through the Public Works Administration.

It therefore seems to the Chair that the amendment is not germane for this reason, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McLEAN: On page 21, line 19, after the word "roads", strike out the word "and", and after the word "streets" insert "and elimination of railroad grade crossings."

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is perfectly clear, and there should be no objection to it.

No one will deny the necessity for the elimination of railroad grade crossings, and the necessity becomes greater as time goes on and speed and use of automobiles increase. Much work is being done by the Public Works Administration in this regard. In many sections of New Jersey, by reason of our proximity to the cities of New York and Philadelphia, there are many grade crossings which must be eliminated. Much progress has been made along this line by the cooperation of State, counties, cities, and railroads. Many projects were under way when the depression developed and had to be abandoned, and now remain in an unfinished state. They offer excellent opportunity for relief employment, mostly manual labor being all that is required. I send to the desk and ask that it be read and printed as a part of my remarks a telegram from the Hon. Edward Nugent, city attorney of the city of Elizabeth, N. J., which explains the situation in my own city, and except for the number of crossings in the single projects is typical of many others throughout the State. No better use can be made of a portion of the money provided for public works under this bill. I strongly urge the adoption of the amendment.

By direction of Mayor Joseph A. Brophy, Elizabeth, N. J., your attention is respectfully called to the imperative requirements of our city and its peculiar situation respecting elimination of grade crossings accompanied with municipal request for your aid and official support in presenting Elizabeth's claim for priority in the Public Works allocation of Federal money for eliminating grade crossings in New Jersey. Utility commissioners March 11, 1915, initiated proceedings to hear and determine whether or not 22 highways at Elizabethport intersected by the main line of the Central Railroad of New Jersey were dangerous to public safety. Fourteen years were consumed taking testimony. Experts of national reputation assisted the commission. Exhibits, maps, and detailed drawings were filed, and on May 7, 1929, the board determined as facts that "each of the 22 public highways named in the proceedings crossed by the railroad should be altered, that all the crossings are dangerous to public safety", and work was ordered to begin January 31, 1931, to be continually carried on to completion within 3 years, or by January 1, 1934. Concrete abutments, retaining walls, and filling for railroad embankments was begun before 1931, but in 1932 financial conditions prevented the railroad from proceeding, and Governor Moore was obliged to use State contribution for emergency relief. Result, work at standstill approximately 3 years. Present status work approved by Board of Utility Commissioners of New Jersey, and well advanced on list of recommended projects. Plans completed in conjunction with board engineers. Work eliminating main-line dangerous crossings in city of 114,000, where labor, skilled and unskilled, available and every detail complete for instituting project.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the purposes sought to be accomplished by the amendment just offered are already contemplated in the break-down which is carried in this bill. It is purely surplusage, and I do not think the bill should be loaded up with things already in it; therefore I ask that the amendment be defeated.

Mr. SHANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHANNON. Is it the purpose to carry on until the final vote on this bill this evening?

Mr. WOODRUM. It is the intention to complete the bill this evening, and I may say to the gentleman that we are making splendid progress.

Mr. McLEAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. McLEAN. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the provisions of this bill contemplate a portion of this money will be allocated for the elimination of grade crossings?

Mr. WOODRUM. It is not specifically earmarked, but it is set out in the break-down that a portion of it may be used for this purpose by the Works Progress Administrator.

Mr. McLEAN. And the gentleman has reason to believe it will be so used?

Mr. WOODRUM. It was specifically so stated in the hearings.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. I understood Mr. Hopkins to say he did not intend to use this money for grade-crossing elimination. I may be mistaken, but that is my understanding.

Mr. WOODRUM. I think the gentleman is mistaken. He said it would not be used for "major" grade-crossing elimination.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does the gentleman consider the language "highways, roads, and streets" is broad enough to cover the construction of bridges?

Mr. WOODRUM. I think so.

Mr. WHITE. Is it the intention to take a final vote on this bill tonight?

Mr. WOODRUM. We want to take the bill up to the final vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McLEAN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 22, line 8, after the word "appropriation", insert "Provided, That no part of the appropriations contained herein shall be used for the construction or operation of transient or hobo camps."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this was one of the great abuses of the P. W. A. and the W. P. A. These camps were erected in communities and large numbers of transients gathered there, and then the camps were taken away and the communities left to provide for them. I think the Congress should provide against a recurrence of that abuse, and, therefore, I hope the amendment which I have just offered will be adopted.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I may say to the gentleman that the hearings show that none of those camps are now in operation, and the program has been entirely abandoned. This amendment, if adopted, would simply amount to surplus, and I ask that the Members defeat the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MARTIN of Colorado: Page 22, after line 8, insert the following: "all rehabilitation loan payments to farmers in the drought area during the period May 1 to November 1, 1935, be, and the same are hereby, canceled and held for naught as obligations against the said farmers and their property: Provided, That this act shall not apply to standard rehabilitation cases designated by the Resettlement Administration as class 30 cases."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment, which is copied from my H. R. 12415, for the purpose of exhibiting the gross injustice and discrimination which has been worked against relief farmers in the drought area of parts of eight States. Prior to May 1, 1935, all needy farmers in the drought area who could not qualify for bona fide or standard rehabilitation loans were on direct relief and were direct-relief cases just the same as in the case of city dwellers. In April 1935 the relief administrator issued an order putting all these farmers under a mortgage-loan system. They were offered a loan, and they had to take the loan or else they were out. Under this order perhaps 8,000 farmers in my State, most of them in my district, were required to take loans whether they had any security or not, whereas a similar case in the city was continued on direct relief. Most of them had been burnt out until they had nothing. The result is that those farmers are mortgaged whether they have any security or not. They continue to owe this debt to the Government. The Resettlement Administration, recognizing the injustice of that situation, on November 1 last substituted for the loans a system of subsistance grants, meaning direct relief.

But the fact remains that all these farmers for the period of May 1 to November 1, 1935, were under loans and mortgages to the Government for what was really simply direct relief, and in all justice and fairness these loans ought to be canceled.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Is not the gentleman afraid that this would be the beginning of a campaign to create a paramount issue in the Presidential election of 1940 to surrender all the Federal land bank and home owners' loans and all other similar loans that have been made?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Not at all; and let me say to my friend that when the Resettlement Administration canceled the loan system and put these farmers under subsistence grants on November 1, 1935, he recognized the injustice of having placed them under a loan system in the first place. The account is now closed and all it could cost the Government would be the amount of the alleged loans made to these farmers during that period of time from May 1 to November 1, 1935.

And, may I ask in fairness and justice, why should a farmer—a tenant, we will say, on a drought-burned farm and having a family—be arbitrarily shifted from direct relief and put under a mortgage loan which in 9 cases out of 10 he could never repay, although it would hang over his head, while if the same man with his family lived in town he would be continued on direct relief and owe the Government nothing? Why, Mr. Chairman, even farm hands, even ex-farm hands, people living in small towns who had an agricultural background, even coal miners—were arbitrarily swept under this loan system and budgeted for a year's necessaries and made a loan accordingly on a monthly installment plan. I feel fully justified in saying that it presents a clear case of gross injustice and discrimination. These alleged loans were and are nothing but relief grants and ought to be so treated, and the loans canceled and these poor farmers absolved from the knowledge that they are indebted to the Government, which may yet fall upon them to collect. I can see no precedent in such action for cancelation of farm and home loans.

Now, understand, I am not charging the Resettlement Administration with creating this situation. It was handed over to them ready made when Resettlement was set up last summer. I deeply appreciate the action of the Resettlement Administrator in changing these farmers from loans to direct relief the 1st of last November.

I spent nearly all of my alleged congressional vacation last summer working for this change, and I have felt that its accomplishment was the most worth-while thing I have done since my return to Congress. But justice will never be fully done until these alleged mortgage loans are charged off the books. I shall ask leave to insert as part of my remarks a letter written by me to the Resettlement Administrator proposing this cancelation. In response to the letter I have been given to understand that the Government will not press for repayment, but I have deemed it advisable to introduce the bill I referred to, which, stripped of the whereases, is embodied in my amendment. Some day, in one way or another, these alleged loans, 90 percent of which can never be paid, must be charged off the books, and it ought to be done by act of Congress, which is the only authority that can do it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein the letter written by me to the Resettlement Administrator, already referred to, covering this matter much more clearly and fully than I have been able to do under the 5-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the following is the letter to the Resettlement Administrator:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1936.

Hon. REXFORD G. TUGWELL,
Resettlement Administrator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. TUGWELL: At this time I feel it incumbent upon me as a Representative of the farm drought area, endeavoring to bring about an adjustment or equality of treatment between rural and urban populations on relief, to burden you with a review as briefly as possible of the rehabilitation activity in that region and what further I think ought to be done about it.

To begin with, rehabilitation loans were limited to that type of farmers who gave promise of being able to carry on if refinanced on the ground and who were able to give reasonable security for the loans. This class proved to be a minority, perhaps not 15 percent of the farmers in southeastern Colorado and portions of adjoining States. (Now still further reduced, and properly so, by transfer to subsistence grants.)

On April 17, 1936, Mr. R. E. Kiely, director of Rural Rehabilitation for Colorado, acting on instructions from F. E. R. A., Washington, issued Bulletin No. 654 to all county administrators. The first paragraph of instructions reads as follows:

"First. All farmers who are receiving feed will be transferred to rural rehabilitation rolls. This applies to those clients working on a farm, for a farmer, and to farmers, whether they be renters, lessees, farm owners, or hired help."

Under this order some 8,000 cases were arbitrarily swept under the rehabilitation loan plan. Rural Rehabilitation had to accept them without question and they had to accept the rural rehabilitation loan or go without relief.

Budgets for the ensuing year were made up for these cases, to be paid in monthly installments, and the farmers were required to execute mortgage notes to secure payment. I may say here that, perhaps, not 10 percent of these farmers had any substantial security. Perhaps half or more of them were merely tenants. In many cases they were merely farm hands. In some cases they were merely ex-farm hands. The classification included persons living in towns and villages who had an agricultural background or had worked on a farm. Colonies of coal miners who lived on small owned or rented tracts of land were classed as agricultural. In the great majority of cases it was obvious that there was no possibility of repayment.

The new status became effective as of May 1 and the first loan checks were paid in May. So far as I could learn, the May payment was satisfactory. The applicants received maximum monthly payments for May. But from May on, the following is a typical case: The farmer got $43.50 in May; $17 in June; $10 in July; and at the time I saw him, the first of October, he had received no further payments. I believe the record will show it to have been the rule that the great bulk of the monthly payments were materially reduced after the first one. In addition, there were several serious delays in payment, involving 1 to 2 months' time. Two of these delays occurred between May 1 and November. The delay in November and December 1935 payments grew out of the transfer of these cases from loans to subsistence grants.

I went through the district early in October and found universal dissatisfaction with the plan. The chief grounds of dissatisfaction were: Cutting of the monthly amount from month to month and delay in payment; distress among merchants who had begun giving these farmers credit on the basis of their supposed monthly allowance; distress among banks carrying the merchants; and, later, disqualification of the farmers for works-progress projects.

Another distressing feature involved a considerable percentage of farmers who, after receiving their May check, refused to sign the mortgage note, and thereby became disqualified not only for the rehabilitation loan but for all other forms of Government relief. There were 200 such cases in Baca County, Colo., which is the heart of the Dust Bowl in Colorado. These families lived in a state of semistarvation.

As the result of my investigation I sent a number of telegrams to you, to Mr. Hopkins, and to the President. I may say here that as to nearly every statement I made in those telegrams or elsewhere concerning the plan, I first checked up with rehabilitation agents, who almost invariably verified the information which had been given me by farmers, merchants, bankers, and others.

During my investigation, I came to the conclusion that the farmers swept under the loan plan by bulletin no. 654, were in fact purely relief cases and not loan cases in any true sense. The bulky file I have accumulated on this matter shows that this is the view of the Resettlement Administration from the Washington offices down to the county agents.

And this is not all. I have seen official correspondence showing clearly that the representative of F. E. R. A. who caused this change to be made was advised by both F. E. R. A. and R. R. A. directors that these were relief cases and not loan cases, and predicting some of the chief evils which have developed in the plan.

Now for the question. If the farmers transferred to loans under the bulletin no. 654 were relief and not rehabilitation cases, why should not the loans be canceled or charged up to relief where they properly belong?

This question arose in my mind before there had occurred to me possibilities of new difficulties which I now foresee. I very deeply appreciate the action of the Resettlement Administration in transferring these farmers from loans to subsistence grants. And also the action of the Works Progress Administration in qualifying a large percentage of them for work, which process is now under way. But I am apprehensive that the farmers who are given work will be confronted with the requirement of surrendering their pay checks in satisfaction of loans or advances made them between May 1 and November 1.

In my telegrams to the President, to yourself, and to Mr. Hopkins, I have stressed the fact that the farmer with a family on relief who owned no lands, had no crops or income or means of support, was in a condition entirely comparable with the city worker on relief. The farmer was forced under a mortgage loan for his subsistence. The city worker was granted relief gratis. When Works Progress came, the city worker on relief was qualified for employment at $48 to $62 per month and owed the Government nothing. But the farmer who has now been qualified for work will owe the Government for what was really direct relief. It is my firm conviction that equity and fair dealing would dictate the cancelation of these specific loans or their conversion into relief by some proper order.

I am not here mentioning seed or feed or stock or any other form of loans made to farmers prior to the Bulletin No. 654 but only to the loans made them under the budgets executed pursuant to said bulletin.

In conclusion, I would very much appreciate the opportunity of going over the question with you personally at your convenience. If this audience can be had, I would consider it helpful if you were to cause to be prepared a table or statement showing the number of cases under classes 40 and 41 as they are known of the rehabilitation loans and the approximate total amount advanced by the Government to these classes.

Very respectfully,

JOHN A. MARTIN,
Member of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado relates to a new subject matter and is not germane, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, a little more than a year ago the President requested of the Congress an appropriation of $4,800,000,000 to carry on a work-relief program. At that time representations were made that employment would be provided for 3,500,000 of our people and the impression prevailed that the program would stimulate private industry and result in a material diminution of the unemployment load. Broad discretionary powers were delegated to executive agencies to carry on the program. Unlimited funds enabled excursions into all fields of experiment. Professors vied with politicians in providing ways to spend money. The speculation spree of the late twenties was imitated by the spending spree of the past year as the urge was given to spend our way into prosperity. What a lovely dream it proved to be, but what a sad awakening.

Today another blanket appropriation is being pushed through the House. It comes as a result of the President's message in which he said in part, "There are at present approximately 5,300,000 families and unattached persons who are in need of some form of public assistance." This is a startling confession of failure. Based on a minimum estimate of three to a family it means that more than 15,000,000 persons must be maintained at the expense of the Government. It means that after 3 years of experiment, extravagance, and exploitation, the present administration comes to the American people and admits the futility of its efforts. It means that the experiments with everything from pigs to parlors are but the nebulous creations of theorists. It means that the extravagances of all the newly created Federal bureaus regulating and ordering the food, clothing, and shelter of the American people are shameful wastes and riotous profligacy. It means that the exploitation of those in distress for purely political purposes constitutes one of the most shocking episodes in American history. On the eve of a national election the New Dealers admit defeat. They blandly tell the American people that even though we have prostituted public office by casting aside civil-service requirements; even though we have created political sinecures for hundreds of thousands of our henchmen and vassals; even though we have penalized businessmen and punished wage earners by the imposition of an unbearable tax burden; even though we have made no appreciable reduction in the unemployment load after spending billions of dollars in fantastic schemes and on fanciful projects, nevertheless they request a further appropriation in order to carry on their program.

It is not hard to find the cause for the defeat which the New Dealers have suffered in their efforts to put potential American wage earners back to work. The reason can best be given by quotations from men who have been identified with, at one time or another, the New Deal program. No more ardent, loyal, and faithful disciple could be found than Gen. Hugh Johnson, who is quoted as having said, in referring to the Works Progress Administrations' program:

> Sixty percent of this invented work is a needlessly expensive and fatuous gesture. The only argument is that it preserves pride against humiliation of home relief. Yet to go on work relief the rules require that a man first go on home relief. To get there he must submit to the equivalent of a pauper's oath and a most humiliating inquisition. More than one-half of all this effort is prodigal pretense justified by nothing.

That statement constitutes a strong indictment. It goes to the heart of the issue. It indicates definitely that the concept and motive of the program is wrong. The American wage earner still desires to preserve his dignity and self-respect. He resents both the necessity for a pauper's oath and the inquisition attendant upon investigation. There can be little doubt that the quotation to which I have just referred is tenable, justifiable, and honest. But others have also brought their contribution. Robert L. Johnson, a former Relief Director of Pennsylvania, referring to the change in administration at the time of the introduction of the Works Progress Administration, is reported to have said: "I can't speak for the Nation, but I do know that one unwise move in Pennsylvania, against which I fought, resulted in $7,000,000 being wasted—wasted just as truly as if someone had taken 7,000,000 dollar bills and used them to light cigars."

Further observation of a similar character might be added which would indicate that New Dealers themselves are disappointed and chagrined over the ineffectiveness of the program. The chief cause for the defeat of the New Dealers program and the waste of billions of dollars can be laid at the door of political manipulators. The attention of the American public has been called to the glaring irregularities in many States. Work relief is honeycombed with politics. Honest men seeking an honest day's work for an honest dollar's pay should not be required to enlist in any political party. Efforts of large industrial employers to coerce, intimidate or compel their employees have been denounced on all sides. I submit that the same standard should apply and even more care should be exercised when the Federal Government using taxpayers' money employs those who are in distress on public-works projects. Unfortunately, however, such has not been the case. It has come to the attention to those in Congress that county administrators have declared that workers who were not in sympathy with the W. P. A. program and the political administration in power would be eliminated from the W. P. A. pay roll, and in order to bring about a compliance by the unfortunate workman, the demand has been made that supervisors and foremen should report those who might be critical without delay. Our attention has been directed to measures of penalty and punishment visited upon those who refused to become a part of the political party presently administering relief. Workmen on W. P. A. projects have been required to purchase tickets, secure subscriptions, and in other ways lend their aid to the highly specialized political machine which seeks to perpetuate itself at the expense of the American taxpayer. In almost a literal sense we have witnessed a program by which bread was to be bartered for ballots. The American people had been told that the exploiter in business was to be banished. I submit that the exploiter in human distress and misery is far more reprehensible than the exploiter who confines his efforts to other channels.

The money changers have been driven from the temple, but the ballot traders had an invitation extended to them and a warmth of welcome assured them as a part of the New Deal hospitality.

Our more abundant life seems to consist chiefly in abundance of evidence that ballots can be bought and that human distress can be put on the auction block to the highest political bidder. The administration in power should invite a searching inquiry into the whole Works Progress Administration in order that its true purposes might be carried out. Reference should be made to the costs of operation which result from the methods presently pursued in handling the problem at Washington rather than permitting its administration in each of the States. The same amount of money, if allocated to each of the States on a basis by which the States would contribute a share of the expense, would enable worth-while projects to be developed and carried on under local supervision and would provide for the employee a living wage rather than a pauper's pittance. Let each of the States be charged with the responsibility for its relief program. Let each of the States receive from the Federal Government a contribution in proportion to the contribution which the State makes in Federal taxes. Let each of the States insist upon an honest day's work for an honest day's wage. We owe no responsibility to those who do not want work but who are anxious to live at the expense of a paternalistic government. The old Colonial New England standard is still applicable, "He that will not work, should not eat." Our sympathy goes out to those who by reason of physical disabilities, old age, or other circumstances prevent the acceptance of employment. To these the Federal Government as well as the State governments owe a duty. For this group everything should be done which will provide security and livelihood.

My conviction is that America will respond to this challenge for the care of those unfortunate unemployables, but I am equally convinced that there should not be saddled upon the shoulder of the energetic, ambitious workman of America the tax load to provide for their neighbors who are slothful, shiftless, and indolent. In view of the fact that public-works projects and human misery have been seized upon by dictatorially minded political craftsmen to secure absolute loyalty from the distressed and unemployed, it is but natural that protests from all sides have been raised against the Works Progress Administration. To support the present measure would be to condone, excuse, and even approve that which has been condemned by impartial, nonpartisan observers throughout the land.

These are the conditions which have brought about the admitted defeat of the New Deal program for unemployment. I believe that the majority of American workmen desire to dignify their work by engaging in worth-while projects. I believe that there is still present in America a spirit of industry and thrift. I believe that if the opportunity were offered to those who are anxious for employment, that they would respond by applying themselves energetically to the tasks assigned to them. I believe that there are still avenues of usefulness open to the American workman in which he may demonstrate his ability and his willingness to work. I believe that the Federal Government's funds could be used by proper allocation, divorced from political control, toward this end. I believe that industry could more readily absorb millions of unemployed if the vacillating, inconsistent, and uncertain policy of the present administration were to be replaced by one of definiteness which would encourage confidence. This faith gives me my only hope for the future.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEFAN: Page 22, line 8, after the word "appropriation", insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

"No part of the appropriations herein authorized shall be expended in industrial-plant training programs, except such industrial-plant training be bona-fide vocational training, and not a device to utilize the services of vocational trainees for private profit."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is anything controversial about this particular amendment. It is simply an amendment offered for the purpose of safeguarding public funds from exploitation by private industry. This matter came to the attention of the House Committee on Education sometime ago when we learned from the representatives of labor and the representatives of the Bureau of Education that the reports that the Members had read in the newspapers that public funds had been exploited by private industry in plant training were true.

The question came before the Committee on Education, and we adopted in the Deen bill the very amendment I am offering to this particular bill in order to safeguard these public funds.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEFAN. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. Is this an amendment to take care of the situation about which we had so many complaints in the Committee on Labor about private employers taking learners, under the plea it was vocational education, and putting them in plants that were making dresses and shirts under sweat-shop conditions and then selling them in the open market in competition with goods made under decent conditions?

Mr. STEFAN. I want to tell the gentleman from Massachusetts that these goods were sold in competition with merchandise produced in bona-fide factories where the American standard of living was being maintained.

We want to protect public funds from being exploited by private industry exploiting and enslaving the labor of America.

Mr. CONNERY. If the gentleman will yield further, we had many, many complaints of that sort, and I referred them to Mr. Hopkins, and without mentioning the States I may say that he went into certain States and investigated matters and cleaned up conditions there. However, I am in favor of the gentleman's amendment in order to see to it that this does not happen again.

Mr. STEFAN. The gentleman will agree that this would safeguard the matter and prevent such exploitation of labor.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. STEFAN. There is, in my opinion, today a unified effort, backed by tremendous capital, to turn down and destroy the high standard of American living. If that effort succeeds today it will require the same amount of effort, the same amount of sacrifice, and the same amount of time to bring it back as it is today.

The past history of organized labor to give to the American working man and the American working woman a high standard of living is a pathway strewn with a story of great tragedy and great sacrifice on the part of those Americans who wish to give an equal chance to all Americans to share alike the blessings of this land of the free and the home of the brave.

If nothing is done at this time, when millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money is being used in an effort to keep idle people employed, to safeguard the exploitation of that money, I predict that we will soon be confronted with an era of slavery among American men and women workers.

The movement to enslave the American man and woman once more is Nation-wide, and, in my opinion, it is backed by a powerful organized minority in our country.

Today American industry is exploiting slave labor, not only in the Far East but in other parts of the world, by forcing the products of this labor into the salesrooms of American places of business. Here this foreign-made merchandise, because it is cheaper in price, also attracts the attention of the multitude of unemployed, who, because they have little money with which to buy, are forced to buy merchandise made by slave labor. As a result, merchandise made by American workers, whose wages are necessarily higher, due to our determination to maintain our high standard of American living, is left on the shelves unpurchased, with the result of more and more unemployed American men and women.

It is no longer any secret that certain American industry is now, and has been for many years, profiting greatly by the exploitation of so-called slave labor in foreign lands, and that this industry is ever on the alert to exploit low-cost labor or slave labor in our own land.

To allow this to continue will bring but one result—enslavement of the American man and the American woman and the breaking down forever of the high standard of American living.

It is because I have given this matter much personal study; because I have visited the factories in other lands from which this foreign merchandise is made; because I have followed that very merchandise back to our own country and into our stores; and knowing the story first-hand, I have taken much personal interest in the protection of the American labor market for the American workers.

I call attention of Members of this House to H. R. 12120, a bill to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories.

This is a good bill and provides that the Government shall appropriate a certain sum of money to aid the several States in teaching men and women how to earn their own living. It is endorsed by farm organizations. Our committee has held many hearings on this bill. These hearings developed that through the aid of vocational training some communities, by taking advantage of its benefits, have not applied for Government relief.

Our bill is changed somewhat since its first writing, due to these interesting and lengthy hearings. It was passed unanimously out of our committee after these changes had been made. A similar bill has passed the Senate, but I am advised that no hearings have been held by the Senate on that bill.

While I favor the principles in the Senate bill with some reservations, I shall oppose it vigorously if certain sections of our House bill are not retained; especially if one section is not retained. The section is one of which I claim authorship and which section I hope the House will help me in retaining.

The section, which is no. 6 in the House bill, reads as follows:

No part of the appropriations herein authorized shall be expended in industrial-plant training programs, except such industrial-plant training be bona-fide vocational training, and not a device to utilize the services of vocational trainees for private profit.

The purpose of this section is to protect American labor from enslavement by those industries which would exploit cheap labor with the taxpayers' money. Its ultimate purpose is to maintain the high standard of American living by protecting the American man and the American woman from exploitation by so-called sweatshops.

The taxpayers' money has already been exploited. Investigations have been made and certain recommendations have been made to stop this exploitation of taxpayers' money. In this new section in the vocational education bill we members of the House Committee on Education feel that we have a sure safeguard against any future or possible use of taxpayers' money by private enterprise which has as its purpose the enslavement of men and women by certain industries who have been driven from their old locations by the principles of high standards of living.

Investigations show that certain Southern States are the targets for scouts seeking cheap labor. People living in the Northern and Eastern States, where many factories have closed down, will be interested to know that the taxpayers' money has in some cases been used to induce the moving away from their localities into fresher fields by certain industries who have one objective in mind today—"capture cheap labor in order to secure greater profits."

Members of this House should know that a series of complaints were made within the last year to various departments of our Government regarding the labor standards of plant-training programs conducted under public-school offices and reimbursed from Federal funds. Certain investigators made visits and investigations in at least a dozen plants and trade schools under public supervision and control in various cities, and also to plant-training programs supervised and financed by certain firms. Members of this House should know that as a result of certain investigations, it has been found that the cotton-garment, rayon, and silk industries are migrating, and that certain powerful agencies are stimulating this migration. Chambers of commerce, which wish to improve local business conditions; power companies, which wish to secure clients for sale of power; agents of railroad companies, who wish to secure transportation orders; owners of unoccupied factory buildings, who wish to secure a return on their investment, are among the stimulating factors which are resulting in this migration. The industries which are seeking new locations are lending a willing ear to these agencies because they claim they are facing labor difficulties; because they find that the passage of the Cooper-Hawes bill does not give them the advantage of low-cost prison operation; because they wish to expand their production; and most of all because they want locations where they can secure an abundant supply of cheap labor.

Various communities are aiding in this migration of factories from their old location by offering tax exemptions for as much as 5 years. In some cases factories are secured by gifts, city bonds, and city funds. Some contributions are made toward pay rolls for limited periods of adjustment. An abundant supply of workers with high-school education have been trained for these factories at public expense. It is known that workers have been trained for the new industries in plant training programs conducted under public supervision and control, and that applications for reimbursements from State and Federal funds have been made for seven plant training programs in operation at the time of the survey.

I am sure that most Members of this House object to irregular practices such as those in production where workers are trained on production without pay up to as many as 12 weeks, and then transferred to the pay roll at learners' wages, and goods produced without payment of regular wages being sold on the open market to compete with merchandise made by workers on regular wages, based on the high standard of living.

That taxpayers' money has been used for private profit by these industries is known, and even the superintendent of the factories or the foremen were appointed as teachers and paid at public expense.

I know Members of this House will object when the good name of the public school is used to cloak certain schemes for commercial gain and to cover practices contrary to Government regulations.

I believe in the use of these vocational-education funds in teaching men and women skilled labor insofar as they are not being exploited in mass production for the private benefit of sweatshops, and it is for that reason that I hope Members of this House will work with me in the retention of this section 6 of the House bill for vocational education.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

This whole question was developed in the colloquy between the gentleman from Nebraska and the gentleman from Massachusetts. There were abuses of this kind, like there were other abuses in this program. They were called to the attention of the Works Progress Administrator. He investigated them, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has said, and they have been entirely cleaned up. We could stay here from now until the crack of doom and continue to write inhibitions into this bill.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. STEFAN. The gentleman would approve an amendment to safeguard and prevent such enslavement of American labor happening again?

Mr. WOODRUM. I will say to my friend that we could write any number of amendments here that nobody could object to, but the condition the gentleman refers to does not now exist, and to put such an amendment in the bill is simply shadow-boxing. There is no use of cluttering up this bill with perfectly useless provisions. I may say to my friend from Massachusetts that whatever the merits of the amendment may be Mr. Hopkins has cleaned the situation up and we should not now slur him by writing something into the bill.

Mr. CONNERY. You are really doing a favor to Mr. Hopkins by helping him out, because they are still at it; and if we put this in the bill, it will give Mr. Hopkins a chance to wipe it out.

Mr. STEFAN. I wish the gentleman would not construe my remarks in a partisan way to the detriment of Mr. Hopkins.

Mr. WOODRUM. I acquit the gentleman of any partisan motive.

Mr. BOILEAU. Let me say that I have heard within a month of conditions at present such as the gentleman from Nebraska has stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEFAN) there were 37 ayes and 61 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 8, after the word "appropriation", insert a new proviso, as follows: "Provided further, That the Administrator may certify out of the funds made available by this subsection grants to States applying therefor to aid needy persons who have no legal settlement in any one State or community, and to aid in assisting cooperation and self-help associations for the barter of goods and services."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is legislation on an appropriation bill and not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California desire to be heard?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment clearly is not germane, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 4, after the word "farmers", strike out "$85,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$160,500,000."

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, in offering this amendment I am fully conscious that the Republicans will vote against it 100 percent and the Democrats about 98 percent. [Laughter.]

I do it to make a record because the matter it concerns is extremely important.

THREE PHASES—DAM, PATRIOTIC HEAT, AND ISM—BUT NOTHING SETTLED

What have we done today? We have gone along in an easy way on three major phases. In the first phase we spent 40 minutes naming a dam. I think that was all right because it was named for a distinguished gentleman, but if this is not congressional boondoggling, I will eat my hat. [Laughter.] And we spent about 45 minutes in being horror-struck over the alien situation——

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman says his amendment is going to be voted against 100 percent on our side and 98 percent on his side. Then what is he doing now?

Mr. MAVERICK. Maybe I am boondoggling, but if I am, I ought to have the right to do so, because there has been so much of it here that I should have my portion of the time allotted to me for that purpose. But let me proceed on the second major phase of today's business. We were horror-struck over this alien situation, and we made speeches on "Americanism" and got full of patriotic heat. But neither in the naming of this dam nor in excluding aliens from the relief rolls have we settled any economic question whatever. Then the third was the usual thing, Tugwellism. It came up, and that was spoken of in a horror-struck way by a Republican colleague. And by denouncing "Tugwellism" no economic question was solved and nobody got jobs or bacon and beans.

Let me discuss this amendment, which is in the nature of agricultural relief, and leave Tugwell out for a minute, and I hope not to mention him again for a while. We are absolutely passing over the fundamental question of the agricultural population of the United States. We have a situation in reference to tenants and sharecroppers and agricultural workers, where people are being dispossessed all over the United States. We are doing nothing about it. The Rural Resettlement Administration is an organization which puts people back to work on the farm and leads them into landownerships, or at least into making a living.

SO CERTAIN AS THE RISING OF THE SUN

I have said here many times that I am in favor of this program for Mr. Hopkins, and I think it is absolutely necessary. But I do think that some day we are going to have to get down and talk about the real economic questions that we have before us. That is all I have to say. I do not suppose there is any necessity for anybody to speak against the amendment because I know it will be voted down. But I have made a record, and, so certain as the rising of the sun, some day we must meet the issue.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Eighty-five million dollars in the bill for the farmers; and if that should be increased by 15 percent that would amount to $95,000,000. Mr. Tugwell now has over $100,000,000 unexpended for that purpose.

Mr. MAVERICK. I know, but that is allotted.

Mr. BUCHANAN. There is $200,000,000, and yet you say nothing has been done for the farmers.

Mr. MAVERICK. I repeat, it has been allotted. Rural rehabilitation must now practically stop, one of the most necessary for America. We cannot pass this over forever.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not want to take up the time of the Committee at this late hour, but there are a few facts and figures I want to have before the Committee before the vote takes place Monday. They have been ably set out in a letter written to me by an able and distinguished gentleman from Iowa, a State administrator, Mr. L. S. Hill, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this place by the insertion of the letter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION,
ROYAL UNION LIFE BUILDING,
Des Moines, Iowa, May 1, 1936.

Hon. FRED BIERMANN, M. C.,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Enclosed are the latest break-downs by counties of W. P. A. employment in your district.

It is probably unnecessary for me to remind you that continuous employment of these people is of serious consequence, or to point out again that the Iowa W. P. A. has been the only Federal work agency which has successfully met this problem in our State.

It has been brought to my attention that a determined drive to earmark $700,000,000 of the proposed work-relief funds for next year for other Federal work agencies is in process.

You will recall at a conference a month or more ago we discussed the unemployment problem and considered what should be done to take care of it in Iowa during the next year.

Figures then showed that W. P. A. was employing approximately 36,000 people, while all other agencies were employing less than 1,700. There is no quarrel between the Iowa W. P. A. and other agencies. W. P. A. would gladly surrender the burden of providing employment, even to the point of closing up all W. P. A. activities.

The fact remains, however, that other agencies have not provided employment, and indications are certain they will not during the coming year. The enclosed tabulation, by counties in your district, reveals that despite reductions in the number of W. P. A. employees and despite several weeks of spring weather, other agencies are still far below the number of relief people at work that they were expected to take care of.

A list of 12 reasons why you should approve a $700,000,000 allocation of relief funds to P. W. A. for next year is before me. Let me, in the light of experience during the last 6 months, try and give the W. P. A. side of this vexatious problem. The P. W. A. statement of "brief reasons" and the W. P. A. side, as I see it, are as follows:

1. Projects definitely relieve unemployment by placing men to work in their proper trades.

There are an estimated 40,000 people in Iowa who, because of lack of opportunity during the last 15 years, when no apprentices were hired in Iowa, are without skilled training and whom P. W. A. contractors will not hire. These must be trained somehow, and in the meantime, constituting the bulk of our unemployment load must be placed on jobs at which they can earn security wages.

2. One and one-half to three men are put to work indirectly for every one employed directly on construction site.

This is a debatable point, and even though true, as reflected in improved business conditions, still has not, and most certainly will not, solve the apparent permanent unemployment problem we have in this State.

3. Direct and indirect employment will equal at least 1,140,000 men employed per year at current wages and salaries.

Granting this figure to be true, there will remain a monthly average of 30,000 workers in Iowa who would not be taken care of by private contract work.

4. The per capita cost to the Federal Government per man employed per year will not exceed $615, direct and indirect.

The per-capita cost of W. P. A. employees has been less than this amount during the last 6 months in Iowa, including all overhead.

5. Public Works projects materially stimulate industry by multiplying business value from two to three times the original transaction.

Worth-while public works built in your district, and which I again urge you to inspect when you return, have exactly the same effect.

6. Projects can soon be started and completed within a year.

Projects approved for P. W. A. a year ago are just starting in Iowa, and many have not yet been started. W. P. A. projects were started almost overnight.

7. Projects are economically sound, and of permanent nature.

Again I ask you to visit W. P. A. projects in your district and arrive at your own conclusion as to their soundness and permanency.

8. Projects constructed by contract yield $100,000,000 in taxes to various governments, most of which would be lost if work done by Government agency.

Taxes affect all wage earners and all sellers of building materials. What is true here in connection with P. W. A. applies equally to W. P. A., whatever the figure may be.

9. P. W. A. is smooth-running organization having public confidence and noted for its integrity.

There has never been any question as to the integrity of W. P. A. in Iowa, and, if there were rough spots in the process of putting 36,000 people to work on worth-while jobs in a period of weeks, certainly W. P. A. is a smooth-running organization in Iowa now.

10. Over 6,130 approved projects are on file. Projects submitted in good faith by political subdivisions scattered throughout the United States only to find funds were not available.

More than $64,000,000 worth of projects in Iowa, asked for and sponsored by local subdivisions of government, have been approved by the President and the Comptroller General of the United States. (It might be noted here that, on the 45–55 grant basis under which P. W. A. operates, projects are possible only in those communities where local governments can raise the necessary 55 percent of costs. In at least 50 Iowa counties local governments cannot do this, and it is in these counties where unemployment loads are heaviest.)

11. When depression is over all of the public dollars expended will still be paying dividends in socially valuable, Nation-enriching works.

We believe the depression is over, and we also believe that, despite business recovery, a permanent unemployment load, particularly in the poorer counties, will be with us next year and for some years to come.

12. Sudden abandonment of P. W. A. now would kick the props out from under construction and affiliated industries, precipitating further unemployment.

Revision of regulations governing W. P. A. expenditures to permit the employment of some nonrelief, skilled workers would take care of whatever real element of fact lies in this statement.

In conclusion, may I reiterate that if we are to avoid confusion of past in meeting the Iowa unemployment problem, "earmarking" of funds appropriated for that purpose to agencies, which have proven that they cannot take care of it, must be avoided.

In another letter I shall discuss nonconstruction activities of W. P. A., pointing out those which have proven of value and those we think are unessential in taking care of unemployment.

Sincerely,

L. S. HILL, State Administrator.

The Clerk read as follows:

The President shall require to be paid such rates of pay for all persons engaged upon any project under the foregoing appropriation, as will, in the discretion of the President, accomplish the purposes of such appropriation and not adversely or otherwise tend to decrease the going rates of wages paid for work of a similar nature: Provided, That the President may fix different rates of wages for various types of work on any project, which rates need not be uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: Page 22, strike out lines 9 to 17, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The rates of pay for persons engaged upon any project under the foregoing appropriation shall be not less than the prevailing rates of pay for work of a similar nature as determined by the Works Progress Administrator, and in the employment of such persons upon such projects, preference shall be given to unemployed citizens of the United States residing in the community within which such project is carried on."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman should make the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, on the last part of the amendment. We have already settled the question of citizenship.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The gentleman from Texas raises the point of order on that portion of the amendment which is as follows:

And in the employment of such persons upon such project, preference shall be given to unemployed citizens of the United States.

That portion of the amendment the Chair rules is not germane. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: Page 22, strike out lines 9 to 17, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The rates of pay for persons engaged upon projects under the foregoing appropriation shall be not less than the prevailing rates of pay for work of a similar nature, as determined by the Works Progress Administrator."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, this is what was known as the Connery-McCarran amendment on the original relief bill providing for $4,800,000,000 that was passed last year. It is the same amendment which I introduced on the floor of the House at that time, which was defeated by a small vote. Then Senator MCCARRAN put in the same amendment in the Senate, and the Senate was held up in session 3 months on that proposition alone. The McCarran amendment finally was defeated in the Senate by a small vote. You will remember the result of the nonpassage of that Connery-McCarran amendment. There was a general strike threatened in the United States. In New York City at a mass meeting in Madison Square Garden it was suggested that there might be a general strike in the United States because of the resentment of organized labor due to the results of the wages paid on W. P. A.

I am striving, both for the sake of my own party as well as the whole country, to prevent any such recurrence of that situation in New York, Chicago, Atlanta, San Francisco, Detroit, Dallas, New Orleans, or anywhere else in the United States. The prevailing rate of wage is being paid in many instances on W. P. A. projects. It came as a result of the situation primarily in New York City, when General Johnson, who was W. P. A. administrator in New York City, brought it to the attention of the President and Mr. Hopkins that unless something was done in regard to that situation, unless the prevailing rate of wage was paid, we would have trouble, if not bloodshed, in New York City and in the large cities of the United States.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; I yield gladly to my friend from Texas.

Mr. BUCHANAN. As I understand it, the prevailing wage has been followed.

Mr. CONNERY. In many instances.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In many instances and in many places, but the length of time they gave employees at the prevailing wage only produced a total amount equal to a security wage.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. In other words, in some cases they got 3 days' work at the prevailing rate of wage. I am perfectly willing to go along on those 3 days at the prevailing rate of wage, because that gives other men work at the prevailing rate of wage and keeps up the wage standard.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And 3 days' work at the prevailing rate is all they could earn in an entire week?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. They would get, for instance, $20 for working 3 days a week instead of working 6 days a week for $20.

Mr. BUCHANAN. With the understanding that they will be paid the prevailing rate of wage, but that they will be employed only a sufficient number of days so that the total amount earned would be a security living, then we have no objection, with that understanding.

Mr. CONNERY. I am glad my friend accepts my amendment, and I congratulate the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. BUCHANAN] upon doing a fine service both to our party and the entire Nation in accepting this amendment which means so much to the workers of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Works Progress Administrator is authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of the foregoing appropriation.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANHAM: Page 22, line 20, after the word "appropriation", strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following: "Provided, however, That in the employment of persons on Works Progress Administration projects, applicants in actual need of such employment, whose names have not heretofore been placed on relief rolls, shall be given the same eligibility for employment as applicants whose names have heretofore appeared on such rolls."

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, there are in this country many classes of worthy people actually in need who today are not eligible for employment under Works Progress Administration projects. A number of them are those who have been unwilling to go on relief as long as it was possible to hold out on their own resources, and they have shown the stamina of the old pioneers. There are many others who have been working in mills and factories, often on part-time, eking out a precarious existence, who have plodded along without relief on the little they were able to earn, but the closing of shops, mills, and factories placed some of them in actual need.

The present rules and regulations with reference to the employment of people on Works Progress Administration projects prescribe that they shall have been on the relief rolls for a certain length of time before they may be given this work. That is actually a discrimination against the man who has had sufficient stamnia to fight it out to the best of his ability and earn his own way and make his own livelihood as long as he possibly could. Certainly these unfortunate men and women who now, at the end of their row, find themselves in need of employment should not be discriminated against in favor of those whose names were placed on relief rolls long ago. It is nothing but fair to the upstanding men and women of America who have gone on as long as possible under their own power that now, when they are in actual need, they be given the same eligibility with reference to employment as those who took advantage of relief in the first instance.

I hope the amendment will prevail. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, the question raised by the amendment, of course, is one that appeals to all of us. In the hearings you will find that Mr. Hopkins was asked specifically about this large group of citizens who, fighting a losing fight, tried to keep off the relief rolls and were not on the relief rolls, in the fall of 1935, when those rolls were frozen for the purposes of W. P. A. projects. Mr. Hopkins stated to our committee that his administration recognized the fact that there would have to be a restatement of the rules and entitlements to employment on W. P. A. projects.

I do not know exactly the form of the amendment, but the principle is good, and, speaking for myself, I have no objection to the amendment. If there is any administrative problem in it, that can be perfected in the other body.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. The amendment was hurriedly drawn, but it does state the principle that to me seems to be so fair that if it is not now in proper form it should be put in proper form in the other body.

Mr. WOODRUM. I have no objection to it.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this is a matter for which I have been working and pleading very hard for a good many weeks because there have come to my attention so very many worthy cases that cannot get any kind of relief owing to the ruling of the W. P. A. Administrator. I believe the Members agree with me that the amendment should be adopted—the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHRISTIANSON: Page 32, strike out lines 18, 19, and 20.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment, in the first place, because on principle I am opposed to delegation of power; and, specifically in this instance, because I am opposed to the delegation of any power to the present head of the Works Progress Administration. The last man in the world to whom I would give a blank check for $1,425,000,000 is Harry L. Hopkins. I have nothing against him personally; he is a charming gentleman. I do not impugn his motives; I am sure he is honorable. But Mr. Hopkins does not know the value of a dollar, and therefore is not the right person to whom to intrust the spending of billions of dollars. Although perhaps not personally actuated by political motives, he has shown a ready willingness to cooperate with those who are, and a reluctance to interfere when proof of the use of relief funds to influence elections has been brought to his attention.

It is our responsibility to place proper restrictions upon the expenditure of the money we are now appropriating instead of writing a blank check. The people can talk back to us; they cannot talk back to Mr. Hopkins. We cannot talk back to him; if you think we can, try it. We did not hire him; we cannot fire him. Therefore, unless we want him to continue to run hog-wild, we must ourselves write the regulations by which he shall be governed, and write them into the law so that no New Deal ukase can repeal or modify them.

The bad judgment that has been used in the past in spending the billions appropriated for relief has become notorious. The administration has wasted the people's hard-earned money conducting research into the history of the safety-pin. To children who needed bread it has given eurythmic dancing. It erected a $25,000 municipal dog kennel at Memphis, Tenn. It copied Chick Sales' designs and erected 600,000 outhouses at the expense of the Federal Treasury. It allocated $500,000 for training housemaids, overlooking the probability that by the time Mr. Hopkins gets through spending the money there will be nobody left in the country who can afford to hire one.

While decrying rugged individualism, the administration induced a whole shipload of farmers to leave established communities in the agricultural Middle West to found a precarious colony in far-off ice-bound Alaska, where they will compete with the Eskimos in coaxing a precarious living from an unwilling soil.

It projected a timber belt in a part of the country where for countless ages nature had tried to make trees grow and had failed—as futile a gesture as that of the scoffer who spat at Olympus to show his contempt for the gods.

It picked up King Canute's discarded broom and undertook to control the tides of Passamaquoddy. The project was to cost scores of millions, and there was no market for electricity within several hundred miles; the situation was so unique that it could hardly serve even as a yardstick. But such considerations did not daunt the playboys who have billions of other people's money with which to play, and whose obsession is that they were born to reconstruct the world.

It undertook to dig a canal across Florida from the Atlantic coast to the Gulf of Mexico, at a cost running well into nine figures, and was checked in the grandiose scheme by indignant farmers, who, more far-sighted than the New Deal planners, realized that introducing salt sea water into the soil of the Everglades would destroy one of the most productive citrus-fruit growing regions in the world.

It exhausted half of a billion dollars of the Government's credit—credit that will be sorely needed for other and more vital needs before the sun goes down on the Roosevelt regime—in buying up the world's silver at two or three times the world's price, not to use it as a circulating medium but to put it in huge vaults constructed for its reception in the fastnesses of Kentucky. There, put back in the ground, it will be just as useful and no more so than it was in the ground from which it originally came. Hoisting the price of silver has depressed price levels in the Orient and wrecked the economy of China—but what of that? The juvenile passion for experiment, the desire to pick the clock to pieces to see what it is made of, has been satisfied. Somebody, some day, will put the wheels back, but it is common experience that a clock reassembled never runs the same again.

Surely this record of blundering incompetence should convince us of the necessity of resuming our responsibility and our duty to specify how the money we appropriate shall be spent. We should stop the official arrogance that caused $238,000,000 of P. W. A. funds to be diverted to the Navy and put through the Reedsville project after Congress had turned it down.

Members of the majority who have spoken on this bill have been careful not to justify the mistakes of the administration. They have sought refuge in the plea that "to err is human", to which our answer is that it is not always true that "to forgive is divine." Very little has been said in defense of boondoggling even though the President said that the word would be "enshrined in the hearts of the American people."

The strategy of the majority has been to try to make the people forget the tragedy of errors and the shameful record of shameless politicians who have profited from human misery by making the claim that there has been economic recovery.

Whether there has been recovery is beside the point. All depressions in the past have come to an end, and it has always been supposed that this one would. What the people are interested in knowing is why the present depression has lasted twice as long as former similar visitations; why we have still made less progress than England, Australia, Japan, and Scandinavia; whether such increase in the volume of business as we have had has not merely reflected Government spending and whether much of it will not disappear when the Government's ability to support business artificially is exhausted; and, finally, whether the improvement is not due to a better world situation and has been retarded rather than advanced by New Deal policies.

There is no occasion for joining in paeans of praise and singing "Happy Days Are Here Again" while 12,600,000 men are out of work and the Nation's relief roll is lengthening beyond 24,000,000 names. There is no cause for exulting in prosperity so long as one-fifth of American families have incomes of less than $1.36 a day and another fifth of less than $2.72.

There can be no recovery so long as Government deficits run from $3,500,000,000 to $6,000,000,000 a year, threatening not only crushing taxes but ultimate repudiation or inflation. Today the national debt is $31,500,000,000; with contingent liabilities and the soldiers' bonus debt added it is $39,000,000,000, and the end is not yet.

Thus far $11,732,000,000 has been appropriated for relief, beside additional billions appropriated to the lending agencies of the Government. Much of it has been spent for wasteful projects which returned but little to labor. Huge sums have been paid out to political spoilsmen who, although in most cases utterly without experience, have been put in charge of relief activities. Other huge sums have been translated into profits. It has been estimated that on the whole perhaps not over one dollar in three has reached the pockets of those whom we have tried to help.

I submit the question how long the Government can stand the drain upon its resources imposed by such wasteful and profligate methods. The Treasury is not a bottomless barrel.

We may be forced eventually to resort exclusively to direct relief. It has been said that it destroys morale to be on the dole. Perhaps it does. Perhaps boondoggling destroys morale, and something else too. However, the argument that we save men's pride by giving work relief has lost its point since the administration put into effect the regulation that one must go on relief, and in effect take a pauper's oath, before he can become eligible to a work-relief job. In that connection I want to condemn with as vigorous words as I can command the order preventing those whose sense of personal dignity had caused them to stay off the relief rolls up to November 1 last, from getting relief jobs thereafter. That was punishing rugged individualism with a vengeance!

I shall vote for this bill, but only because a better measure is not offered. If I had my way there would be a census of the unemployed. That census would be taken by requiring every relief applicant to register for work at a Government employment agency. The Federal relief appropriation would then be apportioned among the States in proportion to the number of unemployed in each State, upon the condition that the States and their municipal subdivisions match every $3 supplied by the Federal Government with one State dollar. I would turn the administration over to the States and municipalities, substituting State departments of public welfare, long established and functioning well, for the politically motivated and hastily improvised Federal agencies now in control. I would let the States adopt appropriate rules and regulations and take the responsibility, and make Harry Hopkins a bookkeeper.

I shall vote for this bill because so long as there is a single mouth in this country to be fed, a single body to be clothed, a single family to be housed, and a single home to be warmed, there lies upon the Federal Government a responsibility it must not and cannot shirk.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have found in my experience here that I have always profited by "looking over the neighbor's fence" to ascertain his experience with any subject with which we are called upon to deal. This is especially true when the subject matter is new in our experience. Surely what the Congress is finding it necessary to do now with reference to millions of their helpless citizens is such an experience. The awful depression has been common to all intensely industrialized nations, including the great trilogy of States, Germany, Great Britain, and our own country. Under like general conditions, to what extent has each of these countries undertaken to shield its citizens against physical suffering and want?

Well, sir, I find that Germany expends a much larger amount, that the country over which the flag of Great Britain waves has been expending a much larger amount than we on this humane and Christian object. I find that during a 3-year period of comparison, in terms of our population, England expended $10,815,300,000; Germany expended $15,968,580,000, as compared with an expenditure of $6,605,356,775 in the United States, including city, county, State, and Federal contributions, for these great purposes of public relief. The figures represent money payments to the unemployed, work projects initiated to employ them, pensions to the indigent and dependent aged. The gross payments to Great Britain exceeded ours during the period by 64 percent, while those of Germany also exceeded ours by 141 percent. In terms of the burden accepted in each country during this period, the annual burden in the United States was $18.05 per capita of population; in England, $29.55; and in Germany, $43.63.

Mr. Chairman, I now present a table showing these payments in per-capita figures for each country and specifying the respective years involved.

Summary of public expenditures for social relief services in the United States, Great Britain, and Germany

(Dollars per capita)

	United States	Great Britain (converting at old par, 4.86)	Germany (converting at old par, 0.2385)
1935	$23.24	$29.26
1934	20.81	28.94	$32.84
1933	10.09	30.44	36.63
1932		30.36	44.29
1931		27.64	49.97
Annual average, 1933 to 1935	18.05	29.55
Annual average, 1931 to 1933			43.63

Mr. Chairman, it is a common saying that misery loves company, and all surely find company for our financial miseries, if a comparison of expenditures for social-relief purposes is a test of misery. In no years has our highest burden been so high as their lowest burdens in the years of the depression. Nevertheless, it will be argued that an expenditure of $6,605,356,775 during the 3 years 1933–35 is an egregious sum to ask, even for such a purpose. It is a large sum, I grant you. It should have been set aside in better times by adequate social-insurance systems. Corporate thrift did not fail to make such provision for its dependent investors.

I hold in my hand a statement showing the dividends paid in the United States during 4 years of the depression. Altogether, for the years 1930 to 1933, inclusive, $21,214,925,000 have been paid. Of this sum, $17,267,920,000 have been paid by those companies out of their reserves built up from the profits of previous years. Compare this seventeen billions with the total sums paid in relief, including R. F. C. and Public Works, and the comparative numbers of people involved.

Sir, I do not think this fact should be taken as a matter of reproach to the employers of the country. It may have been high prudence on their part to have set aside some $17,000,000,000 in the years of their good fortune to protect their stockholders when the day of misfortune should come. But when the charge of extravagant and needless expenditure is made as to our relief expenditures, I want to challenge it and say that if it was natural for these financiers to set aside $17,000,000,000 of reserves to protect their stockholders it would be unnatural for us to overlook the millions of human beings in their employ who possessed no organized method of thrift which might control savings at their source. The practical circumstance, is this, that, with respect to the owners of our industrial system, boards of directors had control of the dividend funds at their source and were able to establish a system of enforced thrift for the stockholders. They did not put the question to a vote of the stockholders. They simply set the funds aside, from abundant profits, in the form of reserves.

Now, the workers were not in a position to control such funds at their source and say, "So much of this excess shall be set aside for our day of tribulation—for the day when they think our arms are not as swift as others to turn the great wheels of competitive industry."

Sir, I hope that very soon our industrial order, like the industrial orders which have preceded it, will act on its obligation to meet the primary needs of the human race dependent upon it. Previous systems have not denied such duties. Under the feudal system a place was found for the humblest villein. Even under slavery the owner failed not in his obligation to feed and clothe and doctor the slaves, no matter what might happen to crops or to markets. So long as it does not, and until it does, a less efficient and surely less satisfying Government assistance must be employed to meet these elemental needs. The world does not owe a man a living, I grant you, but it does owe him a chance to make a living; and it is the duty of our industrial order to so administer the employment asset that any man willing and competent to work may secure a just share of the employment available.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS ON APPENDIX I

It should be emphasized that these data do not include private expenditures for relief and other social services. They include only expenditures under public control. However, in the case of Great Britain and other foreign countries, such expenditures include contributions of employers and beneficiaries to various insurance plans.

Thus the figures given in Appendix I are larger than the amounts actually paid out by the exchequer and local governments.

While the question may be debated, it is a tenable position, I think, to hold that contributions of employers and beneficiaries are a form of taxation and are, for our purpose, not different from other public expenditures.

Surely this is the case when the security or insurance program is compulsory. In the case of voluntary plans, the point is more questionable. But it can be pointed out that if the voluntary plan operates in lieu of a compulsory plan, then again there is justification for inclusion of such payments on the same basis.

There are three totals and three corresponding per-capita figures; the first includes all items listed, the second excludes Housing (F), and the third excludes both Housing (F) and Public Health (E).

In expenditures under the public-health acts there are items such as maternity aid and lunacy treatment, which doubtless should not be included, because they are not included in the data for the United States. But there is also included medical aid to poor and welfare work, which should be included, since relief expenditures in the United States covered similar services. The total under public health can be broken down, but unfortunately not in a manner to include only the items we want. Strict accuracy is not possible in making such a broad comparison. But it would appear that the figure most comparable to the United States data is some place between the two lower per-capita figures; that is, between $32.75 and $30.44 for 1933.

As to the exchange rate, I am of the opinion that the old par presents the fairest picture for comparison. But it is a simple matter to convert on any basis wanted since all three totals are given in pounds.

A hostile critic can object with plausible reasons to any conceivable manner of conversion.

During the years of violent fluctuations, such as 1931, 1932, and 1933, I do not know how strict accuracy could be obtained in any average figure. But suppose, roughly, a figure of 3.75 for 1932, 5 for 1933, and 4.92 for 1934–35. Conversion at these different figures would present a changing picture of what the British are spending that is entirely false.

If conversion is made at the actual rate of recent months, the British expenditures are made to appear even higher.

In obtaining the per-capita expenditure the same population figure has been used for the different years, 122,000,000 for the United States, and 44,800,000 for Great Britain. If allowance were made for an increasing population, the per-capita figure would be slightly lower.

The sources for the data regarding foreign countries are: The Economist Budget Supplement, April 14, 1934, page 10; December 28, 1935, page 1308. Total Expenditures under Certain Acts of Parliament (official), November 1934–November 1935. International Survey of Social Services, 1933. Published by International Labor Office, 1936. World Economic Survey, 1933–34, 1934–35. Great Britain House of Commons Sessional Papers.

The most useful and reliable source is the official publication, Total Expenditures under Certain Acts of Parliament. In addition, the Economist Budget Supplement and the publication of the International Labor Office, International Survey of Social Services, 1933, were helpful.

Unemployment and Insurance Act (a) covers unemployment insurance acts 1920–33 and the large State assistance provided in the transitional payments scheme (National Economy Order No. 2) of 1931, revised 1934.

Health Insurance (B) is under the compulsory act of 1911, which was frequently amended, codified in 1924 and further amended in 1926, 1928, and 1932. The source of income is the contributions from employers and insured, State subsidy, and revenue from investments.

Pensions (C) include widows', orphans', and old-age contributory pensions (act of 1925). Income spent is from State subsidy and contributions of employers and insured. Also included are the noncontributory old-age and blind pensions subsidized entirely by the State (act of 1908, last amended 1929). Seamen and some public-utility employees have special plans.

In order to obtain data comparable to the British total excluding housing, expenditures under Public Works Administration (N. I. R. A. and act of 1935) were not included.

Item 5, Other Federal (act of 1935), covers funds allotted to other agencies for expenditures, such as Resettlement Administration, Commerce projects, Navy projects, etc.

The expenditures for the United States include not merely relief in the sense of direct grants but conservation work, education, and other valuable work. While men may differ as to the exact value of the conservation and educational work, it is indisputable that a vast return to the public welfare and public economy was secured.

The expenditures for Great Britain do not include similar returns.

Subject to these limitations, the comparison between per-capita expenditures are: $10.09 in the United States against $30.44 to $32.75 in Great Britain for 1933, $20.81 in the United States against $28.94 to $31.40 in Great Britain for 1934, $23.24 in the United States against $29.26 to $31.81 in Great Britain for 1935.

Due to the rapid change in expenditures for United States between 1933 and 1935, it is interesting to compare the average annual expenditure per capita for the 3-year period, 1933–35; for the United States it was $18.05 against $29.55 to $31.99 for Great Britain.

Of course, there are some other factors which are relevant to this comparison we have made. For example, we have not dealt with the comparative cost of living between the two countries, nor with changes in the cost of living during the period covered.

Also the per-capita wealth and per-capita income has not been considered, although it might be argued that a wealthier country can well afford to spend more for social services. But the comparison at best is a rough one, and I doubt the prudence of too much refinement of data which in their nature are approximations.

The following items include contributions from the Federal Government: Unemployment insurance; unemployment relief; invalidity, old-age, and survivors' insurance (for Federal employees on railways, for seamen and miners); general invalidity, old-age, and survivors' insurance. The other items are contributed by employers and beneficiaries only.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS ON APPENDIX II

These data do not include private expenditures for social services. It is assumed in this table that contributions of employers and beneficiaries are a form of taxation and are, for our purpose, not different from other public expenditures. This is certainly the case when the security or insurance program is compulsory.

In no case are expenditures of individual or corporate philanthropies included.

There are two estimates in the data for Germany. Unemployment relief in 1929 was put at Rm. 2,500,000,000 on the supposition that the 1929 needs and expenditures were slightly below the corresponding figure for 1930. Public welfare and youth aid for 1934 was put at only a trifle less than the 1933 expenditure.

The expenditure for public welfare and youth aid was contributed in part by local governments.

The population estimates for Germany are based on the assumption that there was an annual increase of about 300,000 from 1930 to 1934. Only in the case of Germany has a different population been used in obtaining the per capita expenditure for the different years.

Converting at par the per-capita expenditure for social services in 1933 were Germany, $36.63; United States, $10.09; in 1934 Germany spent $32.84 and the United States $20.81.

Because 1935 data are not available for Germany, and because the United States expenditures increased rapidly from 1933 to 1935, it is interesting to compare the average annual expenditures per capita for the high 3-year period; it is United States, $18.05 for 1933–35, and Germany, $48.63 for 1931–33.

If conversion is made at the recent figure of $0.40336, the German expenditures are increased more than 60 percent. This is shown for 1934, but is not used in the comparison.

EXPLANATORY REMARKS ON APPENDIX III

Appendix III does not include the small amounts paid in old-age pensions by the State and county governments. Since similar expenditures were included for foreign countries (in their case the contributions were by the central government), these items should be included. However, their inclusion does not materially change the comparison as the following data show:

The expenditures of State and local governments in the United States for old-age pensions were $16,173,207 in 1931, and $31,192,492 in 1934. On a per-capita basis this amounts to $0.13 in 1931 and $0.26 in 1934. The corresponding figure for 1935 is definitely not yet available, but my guess is that it will be at least 20 percent above the 1934 figure.

The result is to increase the per-capita expenditure in the United States by $0.26 from $20.81 to $21.07 for 1934. The 1935 figure of $23.24 would be increased by a somewhat larger amount.

Railroad and private pension plans are not included because no expenditures under private control were included in the data for foreign countries. Only expenditures under public control were included for the purpose of the comparison.

There were no expenditures under the Social Security Act in 1935 except small allotments covered under W. P. A. funds.

Since British expenditures for housing were not included, the P. W. A. (N. I. R. A. and act of 1935) expenditures were not included.

The following is a brief identification of the agencies referred to in appendix III:

EMERGENCY RELIEF AND WORK PROGRAMS

I. Federal Emergency Relief Administration (F. E. R. A.): Two main types of relief have been provided by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration since its organization in May of 1933. These are direct relief and work relief. Under both the direct- and work-relief programs F. E. R. A. granted funds to the States to aid the States in caring for their destitute unemployed. The funds once granted became the property of the States, subject only to certain general Federal requirements necessary in order to insure the proper use of Federal money.

Direct relief under this program was given to the destitute jobless in the form of an outright gift of money or goods. No service or work was required of the relief recipient. The amount of money or goods given each relief client was determined by the degree of need of each relief case as discovered after detailed investigation by social-service workers. Thus a man with a large family of dependents would need and receive a larger amount of relief than that needed or received by a single person. Direct relief is thus comparable to the "dole" in England. The number of resident cases (families and single persons) receiving direct relief ranged from nearly 2,000,000 to a peak of over 3,400,000 a month, the latter number reached in March 1934.

Work relief under F. E. R. A. was granted in a manner similar to that of direct relief, but wages paid for work performed were substituted for outright gifts. Work relief thus possessed the advantages over direct relief of aiding in the maintenance of the worker's skill and morale and of providing the community with useful services. However, the amount any worker could earn on work relief was, like direct relief, limited by his budgetary need for bare living. Hourly wages were paid at the prevailing level, as determined by local committees in each community, but the number of hours of work each week varied with the need of each relief worker. The type of work performed by relief workers under this program varied widely in order to meet the varying needs of the widely different occupational experience of the relief workers. The projects were largely light construction ones although nonconstruction ones were provided for women and white-collar workers. In any case, the emphasis was on the relief of destitution among the unemployed rather than on the value of the completed projects. Material costs in relation to labor costs were kept at the lowest level practicable. The number of resident cases receiving work relief varied from 1,500,000 to more than 2,400,000 persons a month, the latter number being employed in January 1935.

II. Civil Works Administration (C. W. A.): The Civil Works Administration began operations in the middle of November 1933 and practically stopped operations in the first week of April 1934. The C. W. A. program provided work for more than 4.1 million persons at its peak in January 1934, but it differed from work relief under the F. E. R. A. in several important respects. C. W. A. was a Federal program and the workers on it were Federal employees, whereas both direct and work relief were essentially State programs helped with Federal funds. Wages on C. W. A. were paid at prevailing hourly wage rates and the number of hours of work per week was a flat amount applicable to all workers of a particular type regardless of variations in the amount of individual need for income. No investigation by social-service workers was required for C. W. A. employment. Of the 4,000,000 persons employed on C. W. A. at the peak about 2,000,000 were taken directly from F. E. R. A. relief rolls and 2,000,000 from the unemployed not receiving relief. Projects carried on under C. W. A. were of a wide variety of types designed to meet the occupational needs and abilities of the unemployed. The major emphasis was on giving jobs to the unemployed rather than on the value of the completed projects. The projects covered both construction and nonconstruction occupations, the construction projects being chiefly on the lighter type of projects which could be completed quickly and which did not require heavy expenditures for materials.

III. Emergency conservation work (C. C. C.): The emergency conservation work, which directs the Civilian Conservation Corps (C. C. C.), was created in March 1933 to provide employment in a healthful outdoor atmosphere for war veterans and for young men from relief families. Unemployed unmarried youths between the ages of 17 and 28 are enrolled in forest camps to do work of a conservation and reforestation nature. Enrollees are given room, board, clothing, and medical attention free in addition to a basic cash allowance of $30 a month, of which about $25 is sent home to aid in the support of their dependents. Employment on C. C. C. reached a peak of nearly 600,000 enrollees and other employees in August 1935.

IV. Public Works Administration (P. W. A.): The Public Works Administration was organized under the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act in June 1933, and continued under the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935. By making loans and/or grants to other Federal agencies and to non-Federal public bodies, P. W. A. provides for the construction of heavy engineering types of projects. Unlike F. E. R. A., C. W. A., and W. P. A., in which the emphasis is on providing a living to the needy unemployed, the emphasis in P. W. A. is on the value of the completed project and the "pump priming" of private industry. P. W. A. carries on types of projects such as the construction of dams, roads, low-cost housing, school buildings, and other public buildings of all sorts, on which the cost of materials in relation to the cost of labor is high.

P. W. A. (under the N. I. R. A.) differs from F. E. R. A. and W. P. A. in that it sets up no relief standards. No investigation of need is made, any unemployed worker is eligible for a job. Prevailing wages, rather than "security wages", are paid. Under the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, however, P. W. A. is required, like the other agencies participating in the works program, to employ chiefly workers from the relief rolls. Employment on P. W. A. projects reached a peak of slightly more than 600,000 in July 1934.

V. Works Progress Administration (W. P. A.): The Works Progress Administration was organized under the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 to provide the bulk of employment for the existing 3,500,000 employable relief persons. W. P. A. is replacing the work-relief program under the F. E. R. A.; the direct relief of unemployables formerly cared for by F. E. R. A. is being transferred back to the States. W. P. A. differs from the old F. E. R. A. work relief in that the amount of wage payments to workers are based on occupational and geographical differences rather than on the budgetary deficiency of each worker. Also, W. P. A., like C. W. A., extends the area of Federal control to provide for much closer supervision of Federal funds than existed under F. E. R. A. W. P. A. employees are Federal employees and all expenditures are made directly from the Federal Treasury. W. P. A. differs from P. W. A. in that W. P. A. pays a security wage, averaging about $50 a month, whereas P. W. A. pays prevailing wages. A more important difference, however, lies in the type of projects carried on. P. W. A. carries on heavy, expensive engineering construction projects which take a relatively long period to get into operation and to complete, and in which the cost of materials is high relative to the cost of labor. The emphasis in P. W. A. operations is on the value of the completed project in terms of capital additions to the country rather than on the provision of jobs to the maximum number of unemployed. W. P. A., on the other hand, carries on both nonconstruction and construction jobs to fit the occupational characteristics of the unemployed. The construction projects, which constitute the larger portion of W. P. A. projects, are of a lighter type that require less time to get under way and to complete and in which the cost of materials is relatively small compared to the cost of labor. W. P. A. emphasizes the need for providing the maximum number of socially useful jobs within the limits of the available funds rather than the value of the completed projects. W. P. A. carries on such construction projects as the construction of farm-to-market roads, of parks, playgrounds, swimming pools, airports, and repairs and improvements to all types of public buildings. At the peak of W. P. A. employment in February 1936 more than 3,000,000 workers were employed on W. P. A. projects.

[2] Deficit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Any person who knowingly and with intent to defraud the United States makes any false statement in connection with any application for any project, employment, or relief aid under the foregoing appropriation, or diverts, or attempts to divert, or assists in diverting for the benefit of any person or persons not entitled thereto, any portion of the foregoing appropriation, or any services or real or personal property acquired thereunder, or who knowingly, by means of any fraud, force, threat, intimidation, or boycott, deprives any person of any of the benefits to which he may be entitled under the foregoing appropriation, or attempts so to do, or assists in so doing, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than 1 year, or both.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BACON: On page 23, line 7, after the word "doing", strike out the comma and insert the following: "; or any administrative officer of the Works Progress Administration who shall influence or attempt to influence, through fear or intimidation, the vote of any person who is an applicant for, or who receives, relief or work relief under the provisions of this act, in connection with any election at which Presidential and Vice Presidential electors or a Senator or Representative in, or a Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, Congress are to be voted for; or who violates or consents to the violation of the provisions of this paragraph, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than 1 year, or both."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard?

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, this covers individuals who may be guilty of intent to defraud or who knowingly by means of any fraud, force, threat, intimidation, or boycott deprives any person of any of the benefits to which he may be entitled, and so forth.

I merely add to the list of people mentioned in this section another clause, namely, that if any one of the administrators of this fund shall by intimidation or threat try to influence a man's vote he shall also come within the penalties provided for in this section.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is the provision which makes it not germane, because the penalty provided in here is against a person who undertakes to prevent the application of these funds. The gentleman brings in an entirely different matter and sets up an offense and provides a penalty for something entirely separate from this and not provided for in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

The paragraph to which the amendment has been offered relates to fraud against the United States. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York relates to an entirely different subject. For this reason the Chair rules the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] is not germane and sustains the point of order.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the particular amendment I have just offered and which has been declared out of order by the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that in the revision of my remarks which I made this morning I may include certain documents that I referred to in those remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Municipal architect's office: For an additional amount for personal services, fiscal year 1936, $566.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear page 25 read, and I ask unanimous consent to return to that page for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MAVERICK: Page 25, line 6, strike out all of lines 6 to 18, inclusive.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I hope to win this particular fight, and I am serious about it. I want the Members to listen so they may know to what this amendment refers. At the present time the Senate confirms the holders of jobs paying $5,000 or more. The Constitution of the United States does not have any such requirement, but it does say that all other officers in certain cases shall be approved by the Senate, and so forth.

Mr. Chairman, I do not see any reason why when we make an appropriation, and we go ahead and make the appropriation for the people of the United States, that we should then let the Senate control how that money should be spent. That is not done in any other parliamentary body on the face of the earth.

What is the Congress? The Congress has been considered, and sometimes rightfully so, as a door mat, and particularly of the other body.

I am not speaking disrespectfully of the other body, but why should we give the Senate of the United States the right to pass on all of these matters? I understand there is bound to be a certain amount of partisanship here, but I want the Republicans to listen also. At the present time the Democratic Senators control relief; in any event, Congress in this respect has little power. If the Republican Party should ever get into power, then the Republican Senators would have that power.

Mr. Chairman, the point I am making is that from a nonpartisan viewpoint and from the viewpoint of the Republicans on that side and the Democrats on this side, we, as Representatives of the people and with parliamentary self-respect, should not give this power to the Senate. What is the result going to be if we do not give them this power? The result will be that if a Congressman goes down there and says something to Harry Hopkins or the President, he may get some attention, and I imagine Hopkins and the President will be glad of it. What happens now? You go down to see Mr. Hopkins and he says, "I cannot pay any attention to you because a Senator said so and so." The Senate controls the matter. We go ahead and give away our powers. We abrogate our powers and throw them into the lap of the Senate. Why?

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a favorable vote on the amendment I have just offered.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will not adopt this amendment. This identical amendment caused the bill to be held in conference last year for a long, long time. The Senate will put the provision in the bill anyway and will not recede.

Mr. MAVERICK. Why should they have that right any more than we should have it? Let us stand up for our rights here.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am not going to cause the defeat of this bill with the resulting effects upon the suffering people of the country over the question of whether or not the Senate shall confirm one or two or half a dozen appointees of the President.

We have taken great pains in drawing this provision. If you will read the language you will see the Senate will have the right of confirming only those administrators who will be appointed, in addition to the ones they now have, and they now have them all over the Nation.

Mr. MAVERICK. Why should we surrender in advance to the Senate? Why should we give up the fight and run away in advance?

Mr. BUCHANAN. We are putting something substantial in here that your conferees can stand on, and not only can stand on but will stand on.

Mr. MAVERICK. We ought to stand up for equal parliamentary rights.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I hope you will not adopt this amendment so that when the bill goes to conference we will have no trouble about getting an agreement and passing the bill, because there are many items in the bill seriously needed now.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MAVERICK) there were—ayes 23, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Printing and binding: For an additional amount for printing and binding for the Department of Labor, including the same objects specified under this head in the Department of Labor Appropriation Act, 1936, $10,000.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, appropriations for the Department of Labor should be increased. This will aid the activities of this Department in government. Anything along this line, I believe, deserves the support of the House. Whatever aid is given labor in this bill can very well be further expanded. I have always supported this sort of activity. We need the machinery for employing more people. The unemployment problem is pressing. However, the employment provided should be spread, not piled up by overtime on a few, as proposed in one section.

LUNDEEN BUREAU OF UNEMPLOYMENT BILL

Back in 1918 and 1919 I engaged in some activities along this line. On January 2, 1919, I introduced a bill to create a bureau of unemployed in the Department of Labor. On November 21, 1918, 10 days after the armistice was signed, I introduced a resolution directing certain committees of the House to provide work for the unemployed. Our returning veterans were not provided for and my bill sought to aid our unemployed, including our unemployed veterans. We had hearings before the House Rules Committee in December of that year. Had this resolution been passed by Congress it would have given us surveys and intelligent national planning for the handling of unemployment.

LOUISIANA LEGISLATURE ENDORSES FRAZIER-LUNDEEN SOCIAL-SECURITY BILL

The Legislature of the State of Louisiana has recently memorialized Congress to pass the Frazier-Lundeen social-security bill.

Of the young people who have reached working age since the depression began, nearly four and a half million are looking for work, according to the American Federation of Labor. The American Federation of Labor estimates that even if business again reaches normal there will be a job shortage of more than 7,000,000. Giving work relief at relief wages does not solve the problem. Millions of American citizens will not indefinitely submit to enforced poverty. This country is able to produce enough to furnish all its citizens an American standard of living. The Frazier-Lundeen bill is the only adequate social-security measure before Congress today.

UNEMPLOYMENT STILL OVER 12,000,000

Here are the latest unemployment figures of the Alexander Hamilton Institute.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON INSTITUTE ON UNEMPLOYMENT

These Hamilton Institute estimates for 1935 and 1936 are more recent estimates than those for the years 1929 through 1934. Slight changes are made in unemployment estimates from time to time as additional information becomes available. For instance, the American Federation of Labor estimates published last year are higher for the year 1933 than the estimates published this year for the year 1933. The American Federation of Labor has revised its estimates on the basis of additional information secured from Government sources. This must be remembered in comparing these various unemployment tables:

RELIEF ESTIMATES

The Federal Government's estimates of people on relief are not available for 1936. This is for the reason that since last year the relief problem has been thrown back on the States. The Federal Government has gradually withdrawn from the picture, and the burden of direct relief is now upon the States. Apparently the sharp drop in the Government's relief estimates from November to December 1935 resulted from the Federal Government's withdrawal from the direct relief picture and the disbanding of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, succeeded by the Works Progress Administration.

NATIONAL UNION FOR SOCIAL JUSTICE PROGRAM

The entire 16-point program of the National Union for Social Justice is worthy of support. For years I have fought for these same principles. I wish to mention the 16 points, one by one, and call your attention to the fact that 4 points in Father Coughlin's program are recognized in the Frazier-Lundeen social-security bill.

1. I believe in the right of liberty of conscience and liberty of education, not permitting the State to dictate either my worship to my God or my chosen avocation in life.

This is a constitutional guarantee and must be upheld.

ADEQUATE UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

2. I believe that every citizen willing to work and capable of working shall receive a just and living annual wage which will enable him to maintain and educate his family according to the standards of American decency.

In the entire program of the National Union for Social Justice there is no plank more important than this. It recognizes a fundamental principle embodied in the Frazier-Lundeen bill: That all capable and willing workers who are unemployed through no fault of their own shall receive a just and living income. Today millions of American citizens, capable and willing to work, are unemployed through no fault of their own. Each of these citizens must be guaranteed an American standard of living. Point no. 2 of the social-justice program guarantees these workers a fair living wage.

The Frazier-Lundeen social-security bill sets forth this same guaranty in practical legislation that has been approved by experts in the field. It has been endorsed by thousands of labor unions, church and fraternal societies, civic bodies, State and local governments. No man or woman who refuses to work can secure the benefits of the Frazier-Lundeen social-security bill. Provision is made for all who are capable of working and willing to work, unable to obtain employment.

PUBLIC OWNERSHIP

3. I believe in nationalizing those public necessities which by their very nature are too important to be held in the control of private individuals. By these I mean banking, credit, and currency, power, light, oil, and natural gas, and our God-given natural resources.

The Farmer-Labor Party has for years endorsed this demand, and I have fought for it in and out of Congress.

4. I believe in private ownership of all other property.

I am convinced that we must do all in our power to save the independent merchant and small business. They have helped to build this country. I am a member of the steering committee for the Patman-Robinson anti-chain-store bill.

5. I believe in upholding the right to private property, yet of controlling it for the public good.

The fairness of this plank is obvious.

CONGRESS SHOULD COIN AND REGULATE VALUE OF MONEY

6. I believe in the abolition of the privately owned Federal Reserve Banking System and in the establishing of a Government-owned central bank.

7. I believe in rescuing from the hands of private owners the right to coin and regulate the value of money, which right must be restored to Congress, where it belongs.

8. I believe that one of the chief duties of this Government-owned central bank is to maintain the cost of living on an even keel and the repayment of dollar debts with equal-value dollars.

These three points are essentially the Farmer-Labor program which we all advocate. Congress must take upon itself its constitutional duty to coin money and regulate the value thereof. Banking is a public not a private function. The poor have been made to care for the poor, while bonds and interest take care of the rich.

FRAZIER-LEMKE FARM-REFINANCING BILL

9. I believe in the cost of production plus a fair profit for the farmer.

This same plank forms a part of the Farmer-Labor platform. The farmer will never receive justice until he is given cost of production plus a fair profit.

In addition to cost of production for his products, the farmer must have a means of refinancing mortgages without paying tribute to large banking chains. The Frazier-Lemke farm refinancing bill is part of an intelligent farm recovery program. My name was fifth on the Frazier-Lemke petition to bring this bill before the House for a vote, and I worked to secure the signatures of other Members on that petition. I supported and voted for the Frazier-Lemke bill.

RIGHT OF LABOR TO ORGANIZE

10. I believe not only in the right of the laboring man to organize in unions, but also in the duty of the Government which that laboring man supports to facilitate and to protect these organizations against the vested interests of wealth and of intellect.

It is certainly the duty of government to protect labor's right to organize. I have supported every bill before Congress that strengthened the rights of labor.

OPPOSE TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES

11. I believe in the recall of all nonproductive bonds and thereby in the alleviation of taxation.

12. I believe in the abolition of tax-exempt bonds.

Government securities, whether issued in the past or the future, should be taxed. The super-rich invest their excess income in tax-exempt securities. They must not be permitted to dodge their just share of the tax burden. There is nothing new about this. I have advocated it for years. On June 29, 1935, I introduced a resolution (H. J. Res. 341) to permit taxation of tax-exempt securities.

LUNDEEN BILL TO TAX TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be a valid part of the Constitution when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The Congress of the United States and the legislature of any State shall have the power, after the ratification of this article, to lay and collect taxes on gains, profits, and incomes, from whatever source derived, including gains, profits, and incomes derived from securities issued, whether before or after the ratification of this amendment, under the authority of the United States, the authority of any of the several States, and the authority of any subsidiary government of any State, including municipalities.

"SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified by three-fourths of the several States within three years from the date of submission hereof to the States by Congress."

TAX THE SUPER-RICH FOR SOCIAL SECURITY

13. I believe in the broadening of the base of taxation founded upon the ownership of wealth and the capacity to pay.

14. I believe in the simplification of government and the further lifting of crushing taxation from the slender revenues of the laboring class.

As a member of the Minnesota State Legislature from 1910 to 1914, and as a Member of Congress, 1917 to 1919 and 1933 until the present time, I have fought for higher taxes on gifts, inheritances, and incomes over $5,000.

These points in the social-justice program are recognized in the Lundeen resolution to permit taxation of tax-exempt securities and in the Frazier-Lundeen social-security bill, which specifies that funds for social security shall be raised by taxation on gifts, inheritances, and incomes over $5,000. Social security will have plenty of funds when we tax these sources of wealth.

IF YOU CONSCRIPT MEN FOR WAR, CONSCRIPT WEALTH FOR WAR

15. I believe that in the event of a war for the defense of our Nation and its liberties, there shall be a conscription of wealth as well as a conscription of men.

On April 6, 1917, I voted against America's entry into the World War. I voted against conscription for foreign service, and I said on the floor of the House on April 6, 1917, "If you conscript men for war, conscript wealth for war." That statement may be found on page 363 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the Sixty-fifth Congress, first session. Many organizations, including the American Legion, now stand where I stood alone in 1917.

If this point is carried out, it will help us stay out of foreign conflicts—conflicts which we do not understand. Why should we become involved in the quarrels of the Old World?

HUMAN RIGHTS ABOVE PROPERTY RIGHTS

16. I believe in preferring the sanctity of human rights to the sanctity of property rights. I believe that the chief concern of government shall be for the poor, because, as it is witnessed, the rich have ample means of their own to care for themselves.

The sanctity of human rights above property rights is the foundation stone upon which the whole social-justice program rests. It is the basis of the Frazier-Lundeen social-security bill, which proposes to tax the superrich to take care of the poor, the unemployed, the sick, and the aged. It is the firm foundation of our Farmer-Labor Party program. Governments are instituted to protect the weak and restrain the strong.

LUNDEEN MOTION ON THE PATMAN ADJUSTED-SERVICE-CERTIFICATE BILL

Another measure advocated by the National Union for Social Justice is not included in the 16-point program. This is the Patman adjusted-service-certificate—bonus—bill. This bill has been for years a part of the Farmer-Labor platform.

In 1933 the Patman bill was buried in committee. On April 27, 1933, I placed a petition on the Speaker's desk to get it out of committee. For 10 months we worked until we secured the names of 145 Congressmen on that petition. It was on the Lundeen motion that the Patman adjusted-service-certificate bill was brought up for a vote on March 12, 1934, when it passed the House by an overwhelming majority. It helped to bring about the payment of more than $2,000,000,000 to the veterans of the World War. I have supported payment of the adjusted-service certificates throughout the past two terms of Congress, and I placed the first bonus bill before Congress in 1919—a bill drafted by the Private Soldiers and Sailors Legion.

PERMANENT UNEMPLOYMENT SOLUTION

We will appropriate more billions of dollars for public works to put the unemployed to work at useful projects. I will vote for more appropriations for this noble purpose. But we can never permanently solve our unemployment problem until we have enacted into law a thoroughgoing planned program. We must guarantee security to the worker, cost of production plus a fair profit for the farmer, justice for the veterans of all wars, freedom from crushing monopolies and financial tyranny for all our citizens.

On August 17, 1935, I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the entire 16-point program of the National Union for Social Justice. This program is consistent with the platform and principles of the Farmer-Labor Party. Our program is based on the Christian principle that human rights are more sacred than property rights.

Surely the unemployment and relief situation demands vigorous action today, and surely we must act before we adjourn. I am opposed to adjournment of this Congress sine die until these vital principles have been enacted into law, to the end that America once again may know prosperity and happiness for all her people.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks to include therein extracts from certain unemployment records.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contract air-mail service: For an additional amount for the inland transportation of mail by aircraft, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the Post Office Department Appropriation Act, 1936, $1,300,000.

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOBBINS: Page 64, line 25, strike out "$1,300,000" and insert "$1,800,000, any unexpended balance thereof, not exceeding $250,000, to be available during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937."

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, let me say, is very necessary if we are to maintain during the balance of the present fiscal year the Air Mail Service of this country at its present standard of efficiency.

The deficiency appropriation bill provides, for the Air Mail Service, $1,300,000. Every cent of this amount is required for the retroactive increases in air-mail pay, which have been allowed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I am informed today by the Second Assistant Postmaster General that unless additional appropriations are made for the maintenance of this service for the current fiscal year, it is going to be necessary to reduce schedules on some of the lines in order to keep within the existing appropriation limits. This ought not to be done.

While air-mail travel is very rapid through the air, it is not going to do you any good to have this speedy service if you have to wait 24 hours from the time your letter is posted until the plane flies to carry your letter.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Would the figure the gentleman has proposed here keep up the present standard of efficiency or increase it?

Mr. DOBBINS. The figure proposed here will keep the service up for the remainder of the current fiscal year at its present standard of efficiency.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I think that should be done, I will say to the gentleman, and I would be in favor of an increase.

Mr. DOBBINS. A greater increase might well have been requested.

The sum of $250,000, half of the additional appropriation proposed by my amendment, is required to keep the service up to its present standard of efficiency until July 1, and it is expected that $250,000 will remain unexpended at the end of the current fiscal year which will allow for certain very much needed extensions of existing air-mail routes.

Our Air Mail Act of 1935 provided for a considerable amount of expansion and extension in the Air Mail Service of the country. It has now had a year's trial, and there are certain extensions needed and needed badly. Yet the appropriation provided for the next fiscal year was limited to the same amount as this year and would not have allowed any extension whatever.

I want to say for the special benefit of the members of the Appropriations Committee that this $250,000 contemplated for next year, as proposed in this amendment, was approved by the Director of the Budget and was included in the Budget message, but was left out of the regular appropriation bill.

Our Air Mail Service has been conducted on a very efficient basis. We have decreased the cost of this service by many million dollars, notwithstanding that the revenues from the air mail for the present fiscal year are going to be a million dollars more than they were last year.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOBBINS. The Air Mail Service is going to increase. It is increasing in popularity more rapidly than any other feature of the service ever has gained in the public favor. The 6 cents you spend on an air-mail stamp, if you are sending a letter more than 1,000 miles, or more than 500 miles, is ordinarily worth a dozen special-delivery stamps, and you get that expedited service for 6 cents.

The public is getting to realize that fact. This added $250,000 ought to be allowed.

I can say this—and I would rather not disclose my authority for the statement—that while $250,000 of this proposed increase was included in the Budget message the other $250,000 will not be objected to by the Budget. Without disclosing my source of information I predict that this sum or a greater increase will be included in the Budget next year. I hope the committee will adopt this amendment.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, the committee is not unsympathetic with the purposes and efficiency of the air mail. The committee has allowed in this bill every penny that the Budget estimate called for. We have no knowledge of the need that the gentleman speaks about.

I will say that the Second Assistant Postmaster General, since we have been reading the bill in the House, did speak about the matter to me over the telephone. If we are to proceed in an orderly way, the Post Office Department must get a Budget estimate and have it sent to the Senate and included there. We cannot legislate by a Member getting up on the floor and saying that the Department needs another $500,000 and just put it in the bill.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Has the Department requested this additional sum?

Mr. WOODRUM. Over the telephone.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Then, the Post Office Department has asked for it?

Mr. WOODRUM. I could be at the telephone all day and talk with the heads of departments and get requests for additional appropriations.

Mr. DOBBINS. The Budget did estimate for $250,000.

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; for 1937; and the Subcommittee on Post Office Appropriations cut it out during consideration of the regular 1937 supply bill, and the House sustained the action. Now, the gentleman wants us to put that amount back in the deficiency bill. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman on the Appropriations Committee said that there is no reason advanced for the appropriation asked for in the amendment. I will give him some reasons. When the air-mail contracts were canceled, Tulsa had the largest airport in the world. We had five airlines through there, and this mix-up left us with one line from Dallas up to Oklahoma City, and then to St. Louis. For $50,866, which could be used here, with the line already partly lighted from Kansas City to Tulsa, we can have a line extended from Kansas City down to Tulsa. The line already exists from Sioux Falls to Kansas City, the line being partly lighted from Kansas City to Tulsa. You ask us to come in an orderly way. We have approached every authority we know how to, to get this in. This is an orderly procedure, to do it by amendment here on the floor of the House. The Budget did recommend $250,000, and the gentleman says that the House cut it out. Here is the place, here in the House, to get this back, and if you Democrats will let me address myself to you, I may say that if you want to help carry a doubtful district down there, help us out now. This is the first chance I have ever had to talk where money was involved.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DISNEY. This is the only way to do it, and there are other necessary extensions. I do not know the details of them, but I say to you that we have not had a fair chance any place, at any time, except here to have this appropriation, and we are entitled to it. I am confronted in my district with red-hot editorials, every other day, that the air service for my district has been debauched, and I am asking you to furnish relief to us by this amendment. Orderly procedure is for Representatives to ask the House in which they appear to pass the appropriation and give it to them. You know that the Interstate Commerce Commission has enlarged the rates, and there is bound to be some kind of a deficiency, and here is the place to give us that relief.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I feel that it is my duty to support the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, in charge of the bill, who prefers that this amendment shall not be adopted. I happen to be the chairman of the Subcommittee on the Post Office and Treasury Departments' Appropriations which prepared the bill for the fiscal year 1937. That bill already already has passed the House carrying appropriations of $12,000,000 for domestic air mail. In the Senate that amount was raised, but in conference the Senate conferees agreed with the House conferees that our position is the correct position and the bill for the fiscal year 1937 as completed in conference carries $12,000,000. The conference report has been adopted by the Senate. It is still pending in the House.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LUDLOW. Very well.

Mr. DISNEY. As a matter of fact the $12,000,000 is $250,000 less than the Budget agreed upon. Is not that correct?

Mr. LUDLOW. The Budget submitted an estimate of $12,250,000, but our subcommittee considered it very thoroughly, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DOBBINS] is in error, I think, when he makes the statement that $12,000,000 would result in a restriction or an impairment of the service, because it was testified in the hearings before this deficiency subcommittee on page 561 that $12,000,000 would maintain all existing service for the next fiscal year without any diminution of service.

Mr. DISNEY. I can furnish some information if the gentleman desires.

Mr. LUDLOW. But it was testified to by Mr. Jesse M. Donaldson, the Deputy Second Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. DISNEY. In 48 hours from now the Post Office Department told me they would run into a deficit.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Donaldson appeared as the accredited representative of the Post Office Department, and I have in my hand his testimony, in which he said that that would maintain all existing service.

Mr. DISNEY. After the rates had been raised by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. LUDLOW. No. This pertains to the exact situation at the present time.

Mr. DISNEY. Another question, and I will quit. How on earth are we to get the air service we are entitled to except to come here and ask for it by an amendment?

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Donaldson testified as follows:

Mr. DONALDSON. If the Interstate Commerce Commission should raise no rates during the next fiscal year, and we would grant no increased schedules on the existing routes, holding the service to what it is now, and the volume of mail did not increase so as to make it necessary for us to run emergency or special schedules, we could probably come within the $12,000,000. But in that $12,000,000 there is not a dollar for any increased schedules, for emergency schedules, or for any extensions of existing service, or for any new service of any kind, and it does not include the $300,000 involved in the case pending.

That is to say, that the existing service could be maintained by the amount allowed here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes in order to clear this up.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. The action of our subcommittee was unanimous. The Members on both sides of the table, politically speaking, believed that $12,000,000 was sufficient to maintain this service. I wish to assert, and to emphasize, my great respect for Harllee Branch, the able Second Assistant Postmaster General, who has charge of air mail. There is no more conscientious or capable official in the Government service. He came before us and made a most impressive presentation of the needs of his Department. If we did not give him all the money his enthusiasm called for it was because we felt a duty in these times of depression to hew to the line of economy.

Under the law, the Interstate Commerce Commission must review these rates every year. The Interstate Commerce Commission, furthermore, on its own initiative may take up any route at any time for revision. The testimony all goes to show that these air-mail contractors are rapidly getting out of the red and into the black.

The mail is increasing; the passenger service is increasing; freight is increasing; their financial position is rapidly becoming very much improved. It was our thought that by maintaining the appropriation at $12,000,000 it would give an incentive, at least, to the Interstate Commerce Commission to look carefully into these rates, with the possibility of some revision downward on account of the improved financial condition of these different contractors. We believed and we still are inclined to believe that $12,000,000 is adequate, and that our position originally taken was correct. I have learned only today that the Second Assistant Postmaster General feels that the cut in domestic air mail may bring serious consequences. It was not in the minds of any of us to impair or penalize the service. As Mr. WOODRUM has suggested, the orderly procedure will be for him to present his facts and arguments to the Senate Committee on Appropriations, and I am sure that if he makes a good case the committee will give consideration to the adoption of an amendment to take care of the situation.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. May I direct the gentleman's attention to the fact that the amendment calls for $500,000 for the balance of this fiscal year. This bill cannot possibly become law before the 1st of June and there would only be 1 month left, and it would be impossible to use it in that time.

Mr. LUDLOW. I thank the gentleman for that information. I was addressing myself especially to the fiscal year 1937, which our bill covered.

Mr. DISNEY. But, Mr. Chairman, that is not a true statement. It is not just for this fiscal year.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment, and all amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. DISNEY. The statement made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] does not correctly reflect the facts.

Mr. WOODRUM. Let the amendment be reported.

Mr. DISNEY. Yes; that is satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOBBINS: Page 64, line 24, strike out "$1,300,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following "$1,800,000, any unexpended balance thereof, not exceeding $250,000, to be available during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. After June 30, 1936, advance payments under the provisions of section 601, title II, of the Legislative Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1933, shall have no longer period of availability for obligation than the appropriation from which such advance payments are made.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOODRUM: Page 100, line 2, strike out "section 601" and insert "title VI", and in the same line strike out the word "title' and insert the word "part."

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCCORMACK, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 12624, the deficiency appropriation bill, directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. TABER: I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: On page 21, line 10, strike out the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That for the purpose of providing direct relief in the United States, its Territories, and possessions, and the District of Columbia, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $1,425,000,000; and there is hereby reappropriated for the same purpose all unobligated and unexpended balances, with the exception of allotments to the Civilian Conservation Corps, of the amounts appropriated by the acts approved June 16, 1933 (48 Stat. 274); February 15, 1934 (48 Stat. 351); June 14, 1934 (48 Stat. 1055); and April 8, 1935 (Public Res. No. 11, 74th Cong.), and to remain available until June 30, 1937, to be allocated and disbursed by the President to the States, Territories, and possessions, and the District of Columbia, for relief according to their respective need: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be allocated or paid to a State, Territory, or possession, or the District of Columbia, or subdivision thereof which shall not contribute an amount equal to at least 25 percent of the total proposed expenditures, both local and Federal, and shall not administer such expenditures by and through a nonpartisan board."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, will the Speaker make the situation clear with reference to the legislative program for Monday?

As I understand it, it will be in order before we complete this bill to take up the question of the discharge of the Rules Committee from further consideration of the Frazier-Lemke bill. I would like to ask the Speaker if my understanding is correct, if consideration of the discharge petition would come up before the vote on this bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would unless there is a previous understanding. The matter of which shall take precedence can be fixed by consent.

Mr. BOILEAU. I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker. Many Members interested in the Frazier-Lemke bill are anxious to know just what the situation is going to be.

Mr. SNELL. It would seem to me, if the Speaker will permit, that the vote on the pending bill would be the unfinished business before the House on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that, by consent, an agreement can be made whereby the vote on the motion to recommit the pending bill, or a roll call on its passage, can be had first, and then to take up the motion to discharge the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I understand the parliamentary situation, there can be only one vote on Monday on the matter of the Frazier-Lemke bill, and that is on the motion to discharge the committee.

Mr. BOILEAU. I thought there would be two votes. I may be in error, but I thought the first vote would be on the motion to discharge the committee and then automatically on the adoption of the rule if the House decided to discharge the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will yield further, the rule provides that on the succeeding day after the vote to discharge the committee, in the event that motion prevails, that the bill shall be taken up.

Mr. BOILEAU. I hate to disagree with the gentleman from Alabama, but I think he is in error. The resolution provides that the bill shall be brought up on the following day.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. The first vote we will have, as I understand it, will be on the motion to discharge the committee; then, if the committee is discharged from further consideration of the bill, automatically we will have a vote on the adoption of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is correct.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Be the understanding of the gentleman from Wisconsin as it may, it would provide for only 20 minutes' debate.

Mr. BOILEAU. That is right, on two roll calls.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There might be two roll calls. So if we could get permission to have the vote on the pending bill first, we could devote the remainder of the day to those two motions and roll calls.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, the rules provide very directly that we shall take up the rule immediately after the vote if the House adopts the discharge rule.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is nothing possible except two roll calls on the bill now pending. I gave the gentleman some days ago the assurance that there would be no disposition on the part of Members on this side of the aisle to prevent your having full opportunity to consider the discharge rule and the motion to take up the Frazier-Lemke bill. This is just in the matter of expedition.

Mr. BOILEAU. With the assurance of the distinguished gentleman, I have no desire to object to his request, and with his further assurance that we will have cooperation of the gentlemen on that side, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The whole matter may be arranged by unanimous consent if the House desires to do so.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall submit a unanimous-consent request when the pending one is acted upon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Alabama state what his unanimous-consent request will be?

Mr. TABER. The pending request is to adjourn over until Monday.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will propound the other request when the pending one is acted upon. I will submit another unanimous-consent request and the gentleman may object if he sees fit to do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House meets on Monday the order of business shall be the motion to recommit the pending bill and the passage of the bill, and that thereafter the rule to discharge the Committee on Rules from consideration of the Frazier-Lemke bill shall be the next order of business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

VETO MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—BANKERS RESERVE LIFE CO. OF OMAHA, AND WISCONSIN NATIONAL LIFE INSURANCE CO. (H. DOC. NO. 491)

The Chair laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, H. R. 3155, "An act to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims of the United States to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claims of the Bankers Reserve Life Co. of Omaha, Nebr., and the Wisconsin National Life Insurance Co. of Oshkosh, Wis."

This bill confers jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims of the United States to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claims of the Bankers Reserve Life Co. of Omaha, Nebr., and the Wisconsin National Life Insurance Co. of Oshkosh, Wis., for a refund of income taxes paid by said companies for the years 1923, 1924, and 1925, in excess of the amount due, and pursuant to the provisions of section 245 (a) (2), Revenue Acts of 1921 and 1924, which section was subsequently held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of National Life Insurance Co. v. United States (277 U. S. 508), notwithstanding the bars or defense of any alleged settlement heretofore made or of res judicata, lapse of time, laches, or any statute of limitations. Suit thereunder is authorized to be instituted at any time within 4 months from the approval of this act, and proceedings in any suit brought in the Court of Claims under the act, appeals therefrom, and payment of any judgment therein shall be had as in the case of claims over which such court has jurisdiction under section 145 of the Judicial Code, as amended.

The bill would confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims notwithstanding the bars or defense of any settlement heretofore made or of res judicata, lapse of time, laches, or any statute of limitations. Thus, regardless of any final agreements executed by the claimants pursuant to the provisions of section 1106 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1926, jurisdiction is proposed to be conferred upon the Court of Claims to redetermine tax liability for the years covered by any such agreements, and to render judgments for refunds. There appears to be no valid reason why the claimants in this case should not be bound by the provisions of said section 1106 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1926, as are other taxpayers and the Government.

The bill goes still further and deprives the Government of the defense of res judicata, although other taxpayers and the Government are subject to such defense.

The Court of Claims is also authorized to disregard the defense of the statute of limitations. The bill would authorize such refund notwithstanding the fact that a claim for refund thereof was not filed within the statutory period prescribed for filing such claim.

Recently there have been submitted to me other bills which proposed to except certain taxpayers from the operation of the statutes of limitations pertaining to the revenue laws by extending the time for the refunding of certain taxes to such taxpayers. On those occasions I expressed my accord with the enacted policy of Congress that it is sound to include in all revenue acts statutes of limitations, by the operation of which, after a fixed period of time, it becomes impossible for the Government to collect additional taxes or for the taxpayer to obtain a refund of an overpayment of taxes. I pointed out in each instance that legislation such as the proposed bill selects a small class of taxpayers for special treatment by excepting them from that policy. Such legislation thus discriminates against the whole body of Federal taxpayers and establishes a precedent which would open the door to relief in all cases in which the statute operates to the prejudice of a particular taxpayer, while leaving the door closed to the Government in those cases in which the statute operates to the disadvantage of the Government.

In this regard the present measure, H. R. 3155, does not differ in principle from any of the above-mentioned bills which were under consideration by me on those prior occasions. I am not aware of any circumstances which would justify an exception to be made in this case to the long-established policy of Congress. I must reiterate my belief that the field of special legislation of this character should not now be opened to relieve special classes of taxpayers from the consequences of their failure to file refund claims within the period fixed by law.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 8, 1936.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread at large upon the Journal.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill and the message be referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered printed.

The motion was agreed to.

VETO MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—JOINT MEMORIAL DAY SERVICES AT ARLINGTON NATIONAL CEMETERY AND OTHER CEMETERIES (H. DOC. NO. 492)

The Chair laid before the House the following further message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, H. R. 10388, a bill entitled "An act to aid the veteran organizations of the District of Columbia in their joint Memorial Day services at Arlington National Cemetery and other cemeteries on and preceding May 30."

This bill provides—

That the sum of $2,500 be, and the same is hereby, authorized to be appropriated for the current and succeeding years to aid the Veterans' Memorial Day Corporation in its Memorial Day services and the decoration of the graves of all soldiers, sailors, and marines with flags and flowers in the cemeteries in the District of Columbia and in the Arlington National Cemetery in Virginia.

SEC. 2. That said fund shall be paid to the treasurer, or his successor or successors in office, of the Veterans Memorial Day Corporation, organized under the laws of the District of Columbia on or about November 17, 1928, and shall be disbursed by him or them for said memorial services, flowers, and flags: Provided, That no part of said fund be expended for salaries or compensation for services rendered by any member or officer of said corporation.

I do not feel justified in giving my approval to this bill for the following reasons:

It specifically authorizes appropriations in aid of the "Veterans Memorial Day Corporation" and provides that "said fund shall be paid to the treasurer, or his successor or successors in office, of the Veterans Memorial Day Corporation, organized under the laws of the District of Columbia on or about November 17, 1928." I am informed that no corporation of this name exists in the District of Columbia, and even if this bill were approved and an appropriation made in furtherance thereof, the Treasury Department would be unable to pay over any moneys because of this fact.

The Federal Government furnishes and maintains burial grounds for its veterans, furnishes each grave with a properly inscribed headstone, and, on Memorial Day, places an American flag at the foot of each grave. While sentiment properly favors the placing of flowers on the graves of those who have defended their country, it seems clear that if the Federal Government were to undertake this in the District of Columbia it would obviously be extended in future years, and at large cost, to the graves of all American veterans in the eighty-odd other national cemeteries in the United States, in Mexico, in France, in Belgium, and in England.

I am confident that a more personal and living commemoration would be maintained if in the future, as in the past, the many organizations of veterans of our former wars, in cooperation with other citizens, continue their responsibility for placing flowers on the graves of our veterans.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 8, 1936.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread at large upon the Journal.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered printed.

The motion was agreed to.

GREAT LAKES EXPOSITION—1936

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution (H. J. Res. 547) providing for the importation of articles free from tariff or customs duty for the purpose of exhibition at Great Lakes Exposition to be held at Cleveland, Ohio, beginning in June 1936, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution, as follows:

House Joint Resolution 547

Resolved, etc., That all articles which shall be imported from foreign countries for the purpose of exhibition at the international exposition to be held at Cleveland, Ohio, beginning in June 1936, by Great Lakes Exposition, or for use in constructing, installing, or maintaining foreign buildings, or exhibits at the said exhibition, upon which articles there shall be a tariff or customs duty shall be admitted without payment of such tariff, customs duty, fees, or charges under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during or within 3 months after the close of the said exposition to sell within the area of the exposition any articles provided for herein, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, That all such articles, when withdrawn for consumption or use in the United States, shall be subject to the duties, if any, imposed upon such articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of their withdrawal; and on such articles which shall have suffered diminution or deterioration from incidental handling or exposure the duties, if payable, shall be assessed according to the appraised value at the time of withdrawal from entry hereunder for consumption or entry under the general tariff law: Provided further, That imported articles provided for herein shall not be subject to any marking requirements of the general laws, except when such articles are withdrawn for consumption or use in the United States, in which case they shall not be released from customs custody until properly marked, but no additional duty shall be assessed because such articles were not sufficiently marked when imported into the United States: Provided further, That at any time during or within 3 months after the close of the exposition any article entered hereunder may be abandoned to the Government or destroyed under customs supervision, whereupon any duties on such article shall be remitted: Provided further, That articles which have been admitted without payment of duty for exhibition under any tariff law and which have remained in continuous customs custody or under a customs exhibition bond and imported articles in bonded warehouses under the general tariff law may be accorded the privilege of transfer to and entry for exhibition at the said exposition under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: And provided further, That Great Lakes Exposition shall be deemed, for customs purposes only, to be the sole consignee of all merchandise imported under the provisions of this act, and that the actual and necessary customs charges for labor, services, and other expenses in connection with the entry, examination, appraisement, release, or custody, together with the necessary charges for salaries of customs officers and employees in connection with the supervision, custody of, and accounting for articles imported under the provisions of this act, shall be reimbursed by Great Lakes Exposition to the Government of the United States under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that receipts from such reimbursements shall be deposited as refunds to the appropriation from which paid, in the manner provided for in section 524, Tariff Act of 1930.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, line 19, after the word "general", insert the word "tariff."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROTECTION IN REVERSE

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio speech which I delivered this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech which I delivered over the radio this afternoon:

This afternoon I shall discuss the tariff policy of the present administration and its effect on agriculture. I begin by quoting Mr. Roosevelt. In a speech at Baltimore in October 1932, when he was a candidate, he said: "It is absurd to talk of lowering duties on farm products. * * * I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered. To do so would be inconsistent with my entire farm program, and every farmer knows it and will not be deceived."

Certainly no one could make a more definite promise. It was unequivocal; it left no loopholes.

The farmers of the country took the candidate at his word and helped pile up the big vote by which he was elected President of the United States.

Looking back upon 3 years of Mr. Roosevelt's administration, what do we see? What is the record of performance? The tariff structure has been gutted, and there is hardly an agricultural schedule left that has not been seriously impaired.

From the standpoint of the farmer, the most destructive of all the reciprocal-tariff agreements was the one with Canada, which went into effect January 1. It reduced the duty on cream from 56.6 to 35 cents a gallon, and on Cheddar cheese from 7 to 5 cents a pound; on dairy cattle weighing more than 700 pounds, from 3 to 1½ cents a pound, and on beef cattle of the same weight, from 3 to 2 cents a pound. The tariff on calves weighing less than 175 pounds, on hay, and on apples, was lowered 40 percent. These are only a few of the reductions. Poultry, seed potatoes, and maple sugar; alfalfa, sweetclover, and timothy seed—the importation of all these was facilitated by the trade pact with Canada.

And let it not be overlooked that the concessions Canada received under this agreement are not limited to Canada alone. Every country that has a treaty with the United States calling for most-favored-nation treatment—which means every country in the world except Germany—can demand the same terms. Every time we make a trade agreement with one country, every time we pull out one brick, we bring down a whole section of the tariff wall.

It is significant that in the month of January—the first month the trade agreement with Canada was in force—the imports of Canadian cheese were 12 times as large as those of January 1935. The imports of poultry during the same period increased tenfold; of potatoes, elevenfold; of cattle, twelvefold. We imported 2½ times as much bacon and ham, 3 times as much milk powder, 6 times as much fresh beef, 17 times as much fresh pork, and 22 times as much wool, from Canada in January 1936, as we did in January 1935. The number of Canadian horses brought into this country increased from 15,315 to 98,500.

A few comparisons between all agricultural imports for the first quarter of this year and those for the first quarter of last year will prove interesting. Our total imports of canned meats doubled. Our imports of pickled pork increased three and one-half fold; of hams, shoulders, and bacon, eightfold; of fresh pork, fivefold; of poultry, fivefold; of milk, three and one-half fold; of condensed milk, fourfold; of dried and malted milk, sixteenfold, and of hogs, one hundredfold.

These things didn't just happen. They were the result of the policies of a President who promised not to lower agricultural tariffs, and kept his promise by opening our markets to all the world.

They were the result of writing tariff schedules in star-chamber sessions presided over by a free-trade doctrinaire, the present Secretary of State, in which the people most concerned have no opportunity to be heard and in which their interests are given scant consideration, instead of in the Congress of the United States, where issues are debated openly and publicly, by representatives of the people who must go back to the people at regular intervals for approval of their records.

The present administration has fastened upon the country a procedure that is undemocratic, unconstitutional, un-American, and unsound; and by that procedure it has deprived the American farmer of what is his due—a fair chance to supply the American market with American products grown on American land.

What the farmer should know is that his interests are being bartered away in order to secure concessions for industry. The manufacturers of automobiles, trucks, tractors, and farm machinery have fully exploited the home market and are looking for increased outlets abroad. They have motorized and mechanized America—now they must motorize and mechanize the world. The policies of the present administration are a concession to industrial greed. Those policies sanction and support the folly of sacrificing the buying power of farmers at home in order to provide buying power for farmers in Canada and Argentina—a purpose as stupid and short-sighted as that of the dog in Aesop's fable, who lost the bone he held in his mouth in trying to get the bone of another dog he saw reflected in the water.

The industrialist, if he were wise, would see that his interests would be best promoted in the long run by foregoing export outlets gained at the expense of the American farmer. If the industrialist can't see it, if he can't control his rapacity, the Government, which represents all the people, should see it; and should chart its course in such a way as to achieve a balance of agriculture and industry—a prosperous farm population capable of absorbing the production of busy factories, and thriving industry furnishing employment to millions of men and women, who in turn would be able to supply a profitable market for the products of the farm.

In order to achieve that balance, agriculture must be given the first call on the foreign market, the first chance to supply the wherewithal to balance the trade account with those foreign countries from which we buy what we do not ourselves produce.

The chief purpose of foreign trade is to accomplish an interchange of raw materials; the accomplishment of that purpose should be the first objective in our economic planning. Give the farmer opportunity to supply the home market and to pay for such noncompetitive agricultural raw materials as we must import, such as rubber, silk, sisal, tea, coffee, and cacao, and we shall be done with subsidies, acreage reduction, and the other dubious devices to which we have of late resorted—temporary expedients improvised to "relieve" 30,000,000 farm folk who would neither need nor ask relief if we only gave them justice.

The present administration promised the farmer protection. It has given him protection—in reverse. Its tariff policy has been designed to give away his home market to competitors who had already crowded him out of his foreign market.

To ask the American farmer to reduce his own acreage and then invite farmers abroad to increase theirs in order to make up the difference, and finally to open wide our own doors for the reception of the foreigners' increased production—that doesn't make sense. It may be a New Deal, but it is not a square deal.

I hope I shall not seem too partisan if I close by saying that what the American people most need, and should most desire just now, is a square deal—a square deal from a new deck!

FOLDING SPEECHES AND PAMPHLETS FOR THE SENATE

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. J. Res. 260) to provide an additional appropriation for folding speeches and pamphlets for the Senate for the fiscal year 1936.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 260

Resolved, etc., That for folding speeches and pamphlets, for the Senate, at a rate not exceeding $1 per thousand, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,000 for the fiscal year 1936.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE SISSON BILL

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a radio address delivered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SCOTT].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address of Congressman BYRON N. SCOTT, of California, broadcast from Washington, D. C., over a Nation-wide hook-up of the National Broadcasting Co., Friday May 8, 1936:

Last year when the House and Senate approved the conference report in the District of Columbia appropriation bill, they approved at the same time a piece of legislation that has been the cause of considerable discussion ever since. Many of us did not know we were approving in this conference report a proviso that hereafter no part of the money appropriated for schools in the District could be used to pay the salaries of teachers teaching or advocating communism.

I hold no one but myself to blame for allowing this measure to go through unopposed or unpublicized. I, of course, did not know the proviso was in the bill. I should have known it. But that is water over the wheel. It is a law. Now I want to help undo the mistake I made last year and help to repeal this provision.

I do not believe the provision was or is necessary. The school teachers of the United States, the school teachers in the District are not Communists. They are not trying to indoctrinate communism. Dr. Ballou is an outstanding example of the high professionalism of American educators. The members of the District Board of Education are splendid specimens of American citizenship. It almost seems silly to me to find it necessary to make this defense for them against the slanderous, stupid charge that they are indoctrinating our schools with communism. If you knew these people, you would realize immediately that the charges are fatuous and my defense redunant. This applies likewise to the entire teaching personnel of the Nation.

I do not believe the legislation is having the effect professedly desired by its authors. They are seeking to prevent the spread of communism in the District and in the Nation. Movements of this kind thrive on publicity and persecution. The so-called "red rider" has given more aid and comfort to this movement than anything that has happened in recent years.

I think the legislation endangers the civil liberties of all people, including members of the teaching profession. Without impugning the motives of the authors of the legislation, I call their attention to the fact that they have, I trust, unconsciously, played into the hands of a subversive, un-American group determined upon the throttling of freedom of expression, freedom of thought, and freedom of speech. This subversive element is seeking to terrorize the teaching profession, so that the schools may in time be forced to indoctrinate the subversive propaganda of the Facist element that is growing in our country. As aiders and abetters of this subversive practice the proponents of this legislation are guilty of being accessories both before and after the act. Those who propose this regimentation of opinion, those who insist on this terrorization of teachers, those who thus plan to scuttle the schools, are likewise the most persistent enemies of the attempts of the present administration to bring social and economic justice to those who have so long been denied those rights. It is the strategy of special privilege to brook no criticism, and by a reign of terror to force all molders of public opinion to serve their cause. The "red rider" is a strong weapon in the hands of this subversive element in its present reign of terror. Those who, by intuition, logic, or tradition, champion the cause of civil liberties should easily recognize in this academic restriction a threat to our democracy.

I think the legislation is a gratuitous insult to the teaching profession of America. This woefully underpaid, overworked, much-maligned group of loyal, patriotic men and women that has suffered so much from the malicious attacks of yellow journalism and their silly sycophants is entitled to the respect and defense of every right-minded, decent American. I think we would do much better to pay our respects to the school teachers than to pay lip service to their enemies, or to pay into the hands of this subversive element seeking the sabotage of American liberty and democracy.

I think the legislation is ambiguous. It says no teacher may receive a salary if that teacher has taught or advocated communism. Now, no good teacher advocates anything in the classroom. They are not advocates and must not be forced to become so. This legislation would put them into the business of advocation. That would be very harmful to our system of education. Since the legislation would force teachers to become advocates of the status quo, the legislation should be repealed. The scientific method of investigation for progress must be maintained.

The legislation says that teachers must not teach communism. What is communism? Some well-known daily papers have called certain high officials of our own Government, Communists. Does this mean that the speeches and writings of these individuals could not be quoted in the classrooms? Would the teachers be forced to refuse to tell students what our Government is doing?

The chief advocate of this legislation has declared war on all those officials of the Government who, according to his definition, are tainted with communism or radicalism. He has referred to a book called the Red Network as an authoritative source book on communism and Communists. He uses this book to prove certain well-known professors in certain well-known colleges and universities are Communists. He would ban their writings from the libraries. He would refuse to teachers the right to quote these books in the classroom. If he accepts the Red Network as an authority on the subject on Communists, he must accept it in toto. If he accepts as authoritative the charge that the teachers mentioned are Communists, then he must charge that the others mentioned are also Communists. He must insist that their writings and speeches be barred from the libraries. If all people mentioned in his authoritative source, the Red Network, are dangerous radicals, then under the terms of this legislation these people may not be quoted, their remarks may not be discussed by District teachers.

Let me pick some names at random. These people and their works are on the blacklist: Jane Addams, of Hull House fame. No teacher of sociology would dare quote from her voluminous and authoritative writings. Oscar Ameringer, the American Guardian who would have to be banished from the libraries; Thomas R. Amlie, Congressman from Wisconsin; William E. Borah, Senator from Idaho (newspapers carrying his speeches would have to go); ex-Senator Brookhart, Senator Costigan, of Colorado, ex-Senator Dill, of Washington, Senator Frazier, of North Dakota, Senator La Follette, of Wisconsin; Senator Norris, of Nebraska.

The inclusion of these names in the Red Network would, if we followed the letter of the law, take the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD out of the libraries, as subversive propaganda:

Sherwood Anderson; Norman Angell; Newton D. Baker; Harry Elmer Barnes; Carleton Beals; Charles A. Beard (the Rise of American Civilization would have to go); Supreme Court Justice Brandeis and his dissenting opinions; Heywood Broun and his column in the daily news; Earl Browder, of course; S. Parkes Cadman; Stuart Chase, Father James R. Cox; Clarence Darrow; John Dewey; William E. Dodd, Ambassador to Germany; John Dos Passos; Theodore Dreiser; Sherwood Eddy; Albert Einstein; Edward A. Filene; Irving Fisher; Harry Emerson Fosdick; Glenn Frank; Felix Frankfurter, professor at Harvard Law School; Zona Gale; Mahatma Gandhi; Maxim Gorki's books; Mrs. J. Borden Harriman; Fannie Hurst; Robert M. Hutchins; Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior; Edward Keating; the entire La Follette family; the mayor of New York City; Sinclair Lewis; J. Ramsay MacDonald; H. L. Mencken; Edna St. Vincent Millay; Alla Nazimova; the Governor of Minnesota; Elmer Rice; Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (would her column "My Day" be barred?); Margaret Sanger; George Bernard Shaw; James T. Shotwell; Lincoln Steffens (his autobiography would be consigned to a dark closet); Leopold Stokowski; Lorado Taft; Hendrik Willem Van Loon; Oswald Garrison Villard; James P. Warbasse, president of the Cooperative League of America; William Allen White—of all people; Rabbi Stephen S. Wise; Miss Mary E. Woolley.

There are many more just as well known whom I do not have time to mention. I have named these for one reason. The chief proponent of this "red rider" claimed there was communism in the schools of the District because a man mentioned in this book was a consultant on character education. He wanted this man and his books barred. Evidently he wants the works of all those mentioned in this book, which he calls authoritative, barred. What is this? Are we, in the twentieth century, to have an index?

In a system of free education in a democracy, who should determine methods and aims of education? Should we have this decision in the hands of those who have dedicated their lives to education for citizenship, and spent years in training for this profession, or should we turn it over to some penny politician from the prairie?

Am I not right in calling this thing absurd? Are we not making ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of thinking, intelligent people?

The Honorable FRED J. SISSON, of New York, has introduced a bill providing for the repeal of the "red rider." It has been heard and reported by the District Committee. It will come up for debate and action on its merits on the next District day. We must look to the Speaker of the House when we are asked, "Will there be another District day this session?"

Every lover of liberty, every defender of the decent, every enemy of subversive action should write in a demand for another District day. The sooner the better.

GOVERNMENT IN THE TERRITORIES

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a radio address I made some time ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alaska?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, under leave given to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the radio on March 11, 1936.

Ladies and gentlemen, the subject so ably presented by Senator GIBSON in the address which he has just made is one of outstanding importance. As he told you the plan embraces the creation of a new governmental department under a Cabinet head having supervision over all matters concerning the Territories and island possessions. Greater representation for the Territories and insular possessions is demanded not only for the welfare of the people residing therein, but more especially for the welfare of the 125,000,000 of people who reside in the several States of the Union.

It must be obvious even to those who know little, if anything, of the political status or economic development of the several Territories and insular possessions that the settlement and development and exploitation of the resources of those regions bring marked economic benefits to the people of the United States. Let me give an example as to the Territory which I represent in Congress as Delegate, the Territory of Alaska.

Alaska was acquired from Russia in 1867. Little was done with respect to the settlement or an investigation of the resources of the Territory until 1897, though for some years before that time salmon canneries had been operated in Alaska on a small scale. However, since 1867, the value of the fisheries of Alaska has exceeded a billion dollars. The Territory has produced furs of the approximate value of $125,000,000; minerals, principally gold and copper, in excess of the value of $700,000,000, including about $453,000,000 in gold. During that period the total exports of the Territory have reached the approximate value of $1,900,000,000 and its total imports during the same period have exceeded $990,000,000.

It is apparent from the figures just mentioned that although Alaska contains at the present time only about 62,000 inhabitants, it has been a source of very considerable wealth, not so much to the people of Alaska as to the people of the United States. This last conclusion is proved by the excess of exports over imports. An examination of the imports into Alaska from the United States and the exports from Alaska to the United States during the last 15 years has shown that he average yearly excess of exports over imports has reached the sum of $33,000,000. If the United States as a whole produced an exportable surplus in proportion to its population, it would have had during the same period the enormous exportable surplus of more than $66,000,000,000 each year.

And yet, administratively, Alaska is split up among the various departments of the Government in such fashion as to make impossible the best type of administration. Recently I had occasion to inquire as to the jurisdiction of the several departments over the hundreds of islands fringing the coast of Alaska, and I find that in 1913 all of the islands of the Aleutian chain, including Unimak and Sanak Islands on the east and extending to and including Attu Island on the west, were reserved and set apart for the preservation and breeding of native birds, for the propagation of reindeer and fur-bearing animals, and for the encouragement and development of fisheries, and jurisdiction was given to the Department of Agriculture, except as to the fisheries. Later, in 1928, the jurisdiction over a part of the islands of this group was transferred to the Department of the Interior. And to this day it is impossible for the average citizen to see why authority over some islands should be under one department and over others under another. As we come down to the eastern part of Alaska we find the jurisdiction over these islands and all matters concerning them, except the fisheries, to be in the Forest Service, or, as to game, in the Bureau of Biological Survey, in the Department of Agriculture. Each department is quite eager, and, indeed, insistent, upon maintaining its own jurisdiction and in preventing any other department from acquiring any part of that jurisdiction.

Obviously a concentration of authority under a Cabinet head in the Government will bring nearer the solution of the problem. It is to be remembered in this connection that the Constitution extends and applies to the Territories with full force and effect, and the unification of authority under one head such as a Cabinet minister would not and could not in any manner deprive the people of Alaska, or the people of Hawaii, of their constitutional rights.

In the past we have had the experience of one Cabinet member favoring the development of the Territories and island possessions, and the adoption of a liberal policy with respect thereto, finding his efforts largely negatived by another Cabinet member exercising some jurisdiction over affairs in the same regions.

The situation at the present time is very much improved by the recent erection in the Department of the Interior of the Division of Territories and Island Possessions, under the able leadership of Dr. Ernest Gruening, with a small staff of capable assistants. The creation of this Division has to some extent enabled a correlation of administrative agencies and has led to a unity of administrative policy not before known. The difficulty lies in the lack of authority in this new Division.

If for practical purposes all administrative jurisdiction were placed in a Cabinet head of rank equal to that of other members of the President's Cabinet, we should inevitably have a more nearly complete concentration of administrative power and a much greater degree of harmony in administrative policy with respect to the Territories and island possessions.

The proposal of Senator GIBSON to create a Cabinet post for the Territories and island possessions is wise and statesmanlike, and the sooner it is adopted the better, not only for the people residing in the Territories and possessions but for the people of the United States as a whole.

Good administration everywhere requires—and, indeed, demands—the concentration of administrative power and authority in one head, for only thus can efficient action be taken and only thus can responsibility be fixed.

Accompanying this unity of Federal administrative authority should be a delegation of greater power of home rule, as to Alaska at least. The people of Alaska should be granted full control of their fisheries and of their fur and game. Such local control would lead to a better administration than exists at present and would also give the people of the Territory valuable experience in self-government and governmental administration.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:
